

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

LAWYERS' REPORTS,

ANNOTATED.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

Robert MITCHELL, Plff. in Err.,

Eliza M. MARKER.

(62 Fed. Rep. 139.)

1. Passenger elevators are within the rule governing other carriers of passengers, which requires the highest degree of care.

2. Reasonable opportunity must be given a passenger on entering an elevator to obtain a balance before a rapid and sudden start of the elevator is made.

(May 8, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's servant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles T. Greve and C. D. Robertson, for plaintiff in error:

The general principle is stated in Wood on Railway Law, p. 1076, § 801, that "it is not meant that they (railway companies) are required to exercise superhuman care and vigilance, or the 'very utmost care,' but such care, in view of the circumstances, as a reasonably prudent man would exercise, in view of the consequences likely to ensue from a relaxation of such care and vigilance."

The terms in question (the highest possible degree of care) do not mean all the care and diligence the human mind can conceive of, nor such as will render the transportation free from every possible peril.

A carrier of passengers for hire is not held to take every possible precaution against danger.

Simmons v. New Bedford, V. & N. S. B. Co. 97 Mass. 361, 98 Am. Dec. 99; Arkansas Midland Railway v. Canman, 52 Ark. 517; Furnish v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 102 Mo. 438; Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Walsh, 45 Kan. 653; Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Thompson, 56 Ill. 138; Stokes v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 2 Fost. & F. 691; Ford v. London & S. W. R. Co. Id. 730.

Messrs. W. H. Jackson and T. F. Hallam, for defendant in error:

In order to show negligence on this particu-

NOTE.—Liability for injuries to elevator passengers.

Passenger elevators.

The obligation to passengers on elevators is the same as that of common carriers to passengers, and the case of MITCHELL v. MARKER is sustained by the cases infra. If the owner and operator of an elevator has taken the highest degree of precaution and is without fault, no recovery can be had for an accident; the contributory negligence of the passenger may defeat his right to recover in other cases.

In Goodsell v. Taylor, 4 L. R. A. 673, 41 Minn. 207, the rule is stated to be that "the relation between the owner and manager of an elevator for passengers and those carried in it is similar to that between an ordinary common carrier of passengers and those carried by him. The same reason exists for requiring on the part of the owner the utmost human care and foresight, and for making him responsible for the slightest degree of negligence, and also, in case of injury by the breaking or giving way of the elevator, for putting on him the onus of proving that it was through no fault or neglect of his."

And those operating and using passenger elevators are bound to use all reasonable means and efforts to furnish good and well-constructed machinery, adapted to the purpose of its use, and all reasonable means and efforts to furnish or provide it of good material, and of the kind that is found to be the safest when applied to use, and evidence of caution and notice in the use of the elevator is competent to show knowledge and carelessness in its operations, and the fall of an elevator is prima facie evidence of negligence. Treadwell v. Whittier, 5 L. R. A. 498, 80 Cal. 574.

And where the door of an elevator cage is thrown open, and the party having a right to use it has reasonable ground to believe that it was opened for him, and that the cage was opposite the door, the question of contributory negligence in stepping through the open door, where the light was insufficient, was properly submitted to the jury. People's Bank of Baltimore v. Morgolofski, 75 Md. 432; Dawson v. Sloane, 100 N. Y. 620, affirming 17 Jones & S. 804; Tousey v. Roberts, 114 N. Y. 812. See Patterson v. Hemenway, infra.

But a newsboy forbidden to ride in a passenger elevator cannot recover for injuries in attempting to board the car, unless he was willfully injured. Springer v. Byram (Ind.) 28 L. R. A. 244.

So where a person recklessly puts his head in the well-hole, he cannot recover, and the fact that the elevator boy failed to sound a whistle to warn passengers of his descent, is not negligence. Mau v. Morse, 3 Colo. App. 359.

And Mass. Stat. 1882, chap. 208 (Amend. Pub. Stat. chap. 104, § 14), providing that elevator cars shall have a safety device to hold the car securely lar occasion in the speed at which the agent started and ran the elevator, it was competent to show that he had previously been warned as to its speed.

Treadwell v. Whittier, 5 L. R. A. 498, 80 Cal. 574.

Argued before Lurton, Circuit Judge, and Ricks, District Judge.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action for personal injuries sustained by appellee while being carried in a passenger elevator in an office building in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, owned by the appellant. There was a jury, and a verdict for the appellee. The bill of exceptions is very meager, and was prepared chiefly with a view of presenting certain questions of law arising upon the charge of the court. There is, however, one error assigned upon the ruling as to the admission of evidence. To understand that assignment, and its bearing upon the other assignments which relate to the charge, we set out so much of the bill of exceptions as relates to the evidence submitted. It is as follows:

“The plaintiff, to maintain the issue on his part, offered testimony tending to prove the allegations of the petition, to wit, to prove that the servant of the defendant, while in the line of his employment, for hire, operating a passenger elevator in the Mitchell building, in Cincinnati, belonging to said defendant, was negligent in such a degree and manner as to injure the plaintiff, who was lawfully entering said elevator; and, in

in case of accident, does not mean that a device shall be used which will in all cases hold the car, but it is sufficient if it is provided with a suitable device approved by the state inspector. Bourgo v. White, 159 Mass. 216.

And a party who had taken goods up in the freight box of a passenger elevator, and left the door open and returning stepped through without looking, cannot recover although the elevator had been moved, where he knew that the elevator boy could not close the door from his position. Ballou v. Collamore, 160 Mass. 246.

The owner and operator of a hydraulic passenger elevator is not liable for accident caused from the air in the street pipe connecting with the water main, where the main was shut off without his knowledge and the elevator had all known safety appliances. Shattuck v. Rand, 143 Mass. 83.

And in Egan v. Berkshire Apartment Assn. 31 N. Y. S. R. 545, it was held where the visitor of a servant who entered an elevator used for freight, baggage, and servants, which had a sliding baggage door on one side, and who fell through and under the sliding door and into the shaft, that no recovery could be had, and this on the theory that her falling was caused by vertigo or stumbling, and her friend in attempting to rescue her had pulled her through the opening back into the well by catching her dress, and it was held not negligence to leave the sliding door open.

For liability of landlord for injuries in elevator, see note to Jones v. Millsaps (Miss.) 23 L. R. A. 155.

Freight elevators used by outside parties as passenger elevators.

A party operating and controlling an elevator is not liable to a person who has notice that he is forbidden the use, or is not privileged to use, the same, and who is injured in attempting to use it without the knowledge or consent of the owner or operator.

And the owner of a building is not liable for injuries caused to a fire insurance patrol man, who attempted to use a freight elevator in the night after he had broken open the building to save its contents from fire. Gibson v. Leonard, 17 L. R. A. 583, 143 Ill. 182, 87 Ill. App. 344.

And a person who has notice that the elevator is not for passengers, and attempts to use it, cannot recover for injuries caused by his stepping through the door which he has negligently left open, or from the effects of the elevator rope. Patterson v. Hemenway, 143 Mass. 94; Snyder v. Natches, R. R. & T. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 302.

In this note cases in regard to injuries to employes using elevators, and injuries to persons other than passengers, in stepping through an open door, are omitted.

the course of said testimony for plaintiff, counsel for plaintiff asked the following question, which was objected to by counsel for defendant, but said objection was overruled by the court, to which exception was then and there taken by counsel for defendant, and the question was answered as herein set forth, to wit: 'Q. You say that you frequently spoke to this man about the rate of speed at which he was running the elevator? A. Yes, sir; time and again' (the man referred to being the man whose alleged negligence in operating said elevator at the time of the accident is the cause of complaint herein). That thereupon plaintiff rested, and thereupon defendant offered testimony tending to contradict the evidence of plaintiff, and to prove the allegations of the answer, to wit, that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, causing said accident, and thereupon defendant rested; and thereupon plaintiff offered evidence tending to rebut the evidence of the defendant; and this was all the evidence offered by either party to the cause."

The first error assigned is as follows:

"(1) The court erred in allowing the asking of the following question of plaintiff: 'You say that you frequently spoke to this man about the rate of speed at which he was running the elevator?' (the man referred to being the elevator man, whose alleged negligence in operating the elevator is the cause of complaint herein),—and in allowing said question to be answered, as follows, to wit: 'Yes, sir; time and again.' The council for the defendant then and there excepting."

This assignment is bad. The ground of objection was not stated in the court below. The exception was a general one. The ground now assigned is that "the question was an improper one, as it tended to establish a habit of negligence on the part of defendant's agent, while the point at issue in this case was not the negligence of defendant in employing a careless servant, but the negligence of that servant at the time of the accident." What was said about the speed of the elevator man is not shown. We are left to speculate and conjecture as to whether it was a warning that his speed was dangerous, or a commendation as to his regulation of the speed, or a complaint that his speed was too slow. The cases are numerous which hold that, to avail on writ of error, an objection to evidence must be specific, and distinctly indicate the grounds upon which the objection is made. Noonan v. California Min. Co. 121 U. S. 400, 80 L. ed. 1068; Patrick v. Graham, 182 U. S. 627, 83 L. ed. 460. Aside from this, it is impossible for this court to assume that the court was in error in excluding the testimony now complained of; for its character is not sufficiently evident, and its bearing upon the issues by no means plain, in view of the meagerness of the bill of exceptions.

The second error is that the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "It follows that reasonable care, under those circumstances, is a high degree of care,—the highest degree of care consistent with the possibility of injury."

This sentence is the last of a paragraph concerning the degree of care required in the operation of an elevator. That paragraph is as follows: "Mr. Marker seeks to recover damages from Mr. Mitchell, on the ground that he suffered an injury because of Mitchell's negligence. Mitchell is the owner of a building on Fourth street, in which there is an elevator. The elevator is put in there for the purpose of accommodating those who wish to go to offices of Mitchell's tenants; and Mitchell owes a duty, therefore, to those who take that elevator for that lawful purpose, to see that he uses every reasonable means that carriage on the elevator shall not injure those who use it. Now, every reasonable means are those means which a man of ordinary, careful prudence would use under the circumstances. When a man steps upon an elevator of this character, he places himself under the control of another; and it follows that reasonable care under those circumstances, is a high degree of care,—the highest degree of care consistent with the possibility of injury."

Particular objection is made to the expression, "consistent with the possibility of injury." Appellant's counsel argue that the jury were thereby given to understand that the owner of an elevator was "practically an insurer;" that "consistent with the possibility of injury" means just allowing for such a possibility." This is a strained and unnatural interpretation. The sentence must be read with its context, and in the light of the particular action being tried. The expression, "consistent with the possibility of injury," is not the happiest which might have been chosen. It is plain, however, that the court was not misunderstood, when we consider the subject-matter of the suit, the dangers incident to vertical carriage, the helplessness of a passenger so carried, and the serious consequences to ensue from even slight negligence. The obvious meaning of the court, when the objectionable sentence is read in the light of the particular case on trial, and in connection with the context, was, that reasonable care, under such circumstances, would be a high degree of care, the highest degree of care being only such as would be commensurate with, or proportionate to, the possibility of injury to one so entirely dependent upon the caution and skill of another, and the soundness of the machinery used for his transportation. To say to a jury that the law requires that the degree of care to be exercised must be such as is "consistent with the possibility of injury" is only to say that the care must be commensurate with, or in proportion to the possibility of injury presented by the particular situation. There was nothing in the paragraph excepted to which would justify an inference that a carrier by elevator was an insurer of the safety of his passengers. Assuming that the charge meant what we understand it to mean, and that the jury would not be justified in putting any other meaning upon it, we think the principle of law stated was both wholesome and sound.

We see no distinction in principle between the degree of care required from a carrier of passengers horizontally, by means of railway cars or stagecoaches, and one who carries them vertically, by means of a passenger elevator. The degree of care required from carriers by railway or stagecoach is the highest degree. Neither is an insurer, but, in regard to each, care short of the highest degree becomes, not ordinary care, but absolute negligence. Speaking of the degree of care required from a railroad company, the supreme court, in Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 458, 26 L. ed. 144, said: "He is responsible for injuries received by passengers in the course of their transportation which might have been avoided or guarded against by the exercise upon his part of extraordinary vigilance, aided by the highest skill, and this caution and vigilance must necessarily be extended to all the agencies or means employed by the carrier in the transportation of the passenger." See also Inland & S. Coasting Co. v. Tolson, 139 U. S. 551, 35 L. ed. 270; Gleason v. Virginia Midland R. Co. 140 U. S. 435, 35 L. ed. 458.

In Stokes v. Saltonstall, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 181, 10 L. ed. 115, the same measure of care was required from the owner of a stagecoach.

The suggestion that this rule applies only to the vehicle or machinery is not sound. There is no distinction between the duty in regard to vehicle and machinery and track and that required in the control and management of the means of transportation. In the last case cited the supreme court approved a charge in which the degree of care required from a driver of a stagecoach was laid down as the "utmost prudence and caution."

The rule in regard to carriers of passengers has been well stated by Judge Cooley in his very able work on Torts. He says: "Such carrier only undertakes that he will carry them without negligence or fault. But as there are committed to his charge, for the time, the lives or safety of persons of all ages, and of all degrees of ability for self-protection, and as the slightest failure in watchfulness may be destructive of life and limb, it is reasonable to require of him the most perfect care of prudent and cautious men; and his undertaking as to his passengers goes to this extent; that, as far as human foresight and care can reasonably go, he will transport them safely. He is not liable if injuries happen from sheer accident or misfortune, where there is no negligence or fault, or where no want of caution, foresight, or judgment would prevent the injury. But he is liable for the smallest negligence in himself or his servants." Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. 768, 769.

The case of Treadwell v. Whittier, reported in 80 Cal. 574, 5 L. R. A. 498, is directly in point. The question there presented was the degree of care required from one operating a passenger elevator. After considering and stating the rule required from carriers by railway and coach, the California court said: "The same responsibility must attach to one controlling and running an elevator. Persons who are lifted by elevators are subjected to great risk to life and limb. They are hoisted vertically, and are unable, in case of the breaking of machinery, to help themselves. The person running such elevator must be held to undertake to raise such persons safely, as far as human care and foresight will go. The law holds him to the utmost care and diligence of every cautious person, and responsible for the slightest neglect. Such responsibility attaches to all persons engaged in employments where human beings submit their bodies to their control by which their lives or limbs are put at hazard, or where such employment is attended with danger to life or limb. The utmost care and diligence must be used by persons engaged in such employments to avoid injury to those they carry. The care and diligence required is proportioned to the danger to the persons carried. In proportion to the degree of danger to others must be the care and diligence to be exercised. Where the danger is great, the utmost care and diligence must be employed. In such cases the law requires extraordinary care and diligence. We know of no employment where the law should demand a higher degree of care and diligence than in the case of the persons using and running elevators for lifting human beings from one level to another. The danger of those being raised is great. When persons are injured by the giving way of the machinery, the hurt is always serious,—frequently fatal; and the law should, and does, bind persons so engaged to the highest degree of care practicable under the circumstances. It would be injustice and cruelty to the public, in courts, to abate in any degree from this high degree of care. The aged, the helpless, and the infirm are daily using these elevators. The owners make profit by these elevators, or use them for the profit they bring to them. The cruelty from a careless use of such contrivances is likely to fall on the weakest of the community. All, including the strongest, are without the means of self-protection upon the breaking down of the machinery. The law therefore throws around such persons its protection by requiring the highest care and diligence."

The case of Goodsell v. Taylor, 41 Minn. 207, 4 L. R. A. 673, is a like case, and the rule applicable to carriers by railway is there applied to carriers by passenger elevators.

The third assignment of error is as to so much of the charge as held it to be "the duty of the elevator man to see that all his passengers are on, and to give them sufficient time to adjust themselves." The petition charged that as the plaintiff "was entering the car of the elevator in said building, to be carried to the fifth floor thereof, while he was in the act of entering said car, and before he was allowed the proper time to safely balance or adjust himself therein, the agent or servant having charge of the running of said elevator negligently and carelessly caused the same to be suddenly started, with great, unusual, and dangerous speed and violence, and negligently failed to guard the door or entrance to the car of said elevator, . . . by reason of which negligent acts and omission of defendant's agent or servant, and also by reason of the unsafe construction of said elevator, the plaintiff was thrown violently from his feet, and was caught between the cage of said elevator and a projection of the floor above, and sustained serious and permanent injuries," etc.

Upon this allegation the court said: "Now, it is charged in this petition that Bartholomew failed in three respects: First, that he started the elevator too quickly; and by that I don't refer to the starting of the elevator by jerks, but I mean that he didn't wait long enough, until Marker should have time to adjust himself to the quick, upward motion. Of course, it is the duty of the elevator man to see that all his passengers are on, and to give them sufficient time to adjust themselves. Whether that was done in this case, it is for you to say. If he did not do that, and if, by reason of starting too quick, the accident occurred, Mr. Mitchell is liable."

We think there was no error in this, as applied to the issue to which it related. It was clearly the duty of the engineer operating the elevator to give passengers reasonable opportunity to obtain a balance upon entering the car, before a rapid and sudden upward movement is begun, having a tendency to disturb the equilibrium of one yet in motion.

The fourth and last error assigned is in these words: "The court erred in charging the jury with reference to the duty of the elevator man in extending his arm." The language of the assignment is precisely the language in which the exception was taken.

Looking to the petition, we find that it alleged that the door or entrance to the car was unguarded, and that plaintiff fell out this door, and was jammed between the elevator and the shaft. Looking to the charge, we find that the court commented upon the issue thus presented, and the testimony relating to the issue, and submitted to the jury the question as to whether, under the circumstances, reasonable prudence would have required the elevator man to have extended his arm in such way as to prevent one losing his balance from falling out the door. The facts relating to this issue are not included in the bill of exceptions; and we cannot say whether there was or was not evidence justifying the submission of this question to the jury. Certainly, we cannot, on this record, say that it was error in the trial court to have so instructed the jury. But a fatal objection to this assignment is that it does not set out the part of the charge referred to. Rule 11 requires that, "when the error alleged is to the charge of the court, the assignment of errors shall set out the part referred to totidem verbis, whether it be in instructions given or in instructions refused."

Counsel, in brief, have complained of other parts of the charge. But as no exception was taken on the trial, and no error has been assigned as required by the rule cited above, we cannot consider them.

Statement by Williams, J.:

The Springfield Fire & Marine Insurance Company, of Springfield, Massachusetts, on the 1st day of September, 1888, issued a policy to Julia M. Hull, insuring her against loss or damages by fire, to the amount of $1,200 on her dwelling house in Youngstown, and $300 on furniture and other articles therein, for the period of three years; which policy, at its expiration, was renewed and extended for another like period. In October, 1887, the property was damaged by fire to the amount of $815, which was paid by the company, and the policy continued in force for the balance, viz.: $1,185. Afterward, on the 27th day of December, 1887, while the policy was in force, the property was totally destroyed by fire; and the action below was brought to recover the loss. The petition, to which a copy of the policy is attached, alleges the foregoing facts, and also the performance by the plaintiff of the conditions of the policy on her part to be performed, the proof of the loss in due time, and the payment thereon of $575, leaving a balance of $610, for which, with interest, judgment is claimed. The answer denies certain allegations of the petition, and avers as a further defense, that by the terms of the policy the loss was not payable until sixty days after the receipt by the defendant of the proof of the same, and that the next day after the fire, the parties came to a compromise and settlement, which was reduced to writing and duly signed, by which the plaintiff agreed to accept the immediate payment of $575, in satisfaction of her claim: which sum the defendant then paid by draft, and the plaintiff surrendered the policy and thereafter collected the draft, and has not offered to repay the amount to the defendant. The reply to that defense alleges that on the day after the property was burned, the plaintiff met the defendant's agent, at his request, in his room at a hotel where he was stopping, "and while there alone with him, the said agent knowingly, falsely charged and accused her of being guilty of the crime of setting fire to and burning her own house and furniture, and then and there told her that he had evidence that would sustain said charge, and said to her that by reason of the proof which he had knowledge of, she could not live in the city of Youngstown, and the company would not permit her to remain in said city, but would send her to the penitentiary for said crime; and said agent then and there presented to her for signature, a paper writing which may have been a receipt, and said to her that unless she then signed said paper writing that she could not live in the city of Youngstown, and would have to leave said city, and that said company would send her to the penitentiary; all of which statements were made by said agent knowingly, falsely, and fraudulently, for the purpose of intimidating and threatening her, and working upon her feelings and fears, so as to coerce her, and place her under duress, and frighten her into signing said paper writing. That she was then in infirm health, and weak and exhausted from the excitement occasioned by said fire, all of which was known and apparent to said agent, and of which he wrongfully, and with fraudulent intent, took advantage, and reiterated and repeated said threatening statements until she was in such state of mind and body that she was entirely incapable of knowing and understanding her situation, and she then said to said agent that she desired to consult her counsel before acting in the matter, and thereupon said agent reiterated said threatening statements, and others of a similar import and meaning, and told her that if she did not sign said paper immediately she would never get anything, and that she would have to leave the city of Youngstown and her family, and the company would prosecute her criminally on the charge of burning her house and furniture, and she would have to go to the penitentiary, but that all this could be avoided by signing said papers. And plaintiff says that in her said condition of mind, she was compelled to, and did sign some papers, but avers that her signature was obtained through force, duress, and fraud, as hereinbefore set forth, and that if any paper writing is in the possession of said defendant purporting to settle or compromise her said claim, as set forth in her said petition, the same was procured from her by means of the aforesaid fraudulent and criminal acts of said agent of defendant, perpetrated upon her while she was weak in mind and body, and laboring under severe mental strain and excitement, induced by the said agent for the purpose of coercing her into signing the same, and while she was incapable of understanding her rights in the premises, or the effect of her said acts; and that the same are fraudulent and void, and of no virtue or effect in law."

The trial of the issues resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, upon which judgment was rendered, and that judgment was affirmed by the circuit court. It is sought here to obtain the reversal of the judgments below, for error in the charge to the jury, and the refusal to give in charge instructions requested by the defendant, which will be noticed in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas Bates and Hine & Clarke, for plaintiff in error:

There is no fraud or duress about the transaction.

Plaintiff knew far better than Reed, or any other person, whether she burned that house.

To constitute fraud there must certainly be deceit.

Aetna Ins. Co. v. Reed, 83 Ohio St. 283.

Granting that a "part of that contract or compromise was an agreement not to prosecute the plaintiff upon the charge of burning her own house," we submit that it is not the law of Ohio that the court should declare such contract void, and permit a recovery upon the surrendered policy.

Such a contract of compromise would be illegal, it is true, whether Mrs. Hull was guilty or not.

Moore v. Adams, 8 Ohio, 373, 83 Am. Dec. 723.

But it was an executed contract—the money was paid, and the policy surrendered under it—and before recovery could be had on such surrendered policy, a court must "corrupt itself by interfering between" the corrupt parties, and declaring their corrupt contract of compromise void.

Such course the following decisions in Ohio expressly forbid:

Moore v. Adams, supra; Thomas v. Croniss, 16 Ohio, 54; Hooker v. DePalos, 28 Ohio St. 251; Roll v. Raguet, 4 Ohio, 400, 22 Am. Dec. 759; Williams v. Englebrecht, 87 Ohio St. 888; Kahn, Jr., v. Walton, 46 Ohio St. 195.

Before Mrs. Hull could rescind that contract of compromise and settlement she must put the other party in statu quo.

One who has been led into a contract upon which he has received something of value cannot ignore the contract, however induced, and proceed in a court of law as if the relations of the parties were wholly unaffected thereby. He cannot while retaining the benefits and thus affirming the contract, treat it as though it did not exist. He cannot treat it as good in part and void in part, but must affirm or avoid it as a whole.

Home Ins. Co. of New York v. Howard, 111 Ind. 545; Parsons, Cont. 6th ed. p. 895; Bigelow, Fraud, 184; Wharton, Cont. §§ 283, 285, 288, 290.

Messrs. R. B. Murray, T. W. Sanderson, and C. R. Truesdale, for defendant in error:

The true test for determining whether or not the plaintiff and defendant were actually in pari delicto, is by considering whether the plaintiff could make out his case otherwise than through the medium and by the aid of the illegal transaction to which he was himself a party.

To the rule that parties implicated in an executive illegal transaction have no remedy against each other, an exception is recognized in cases where one is the victim of duress, or fraud, or superior influence.

Dupes and victims of an illegal transaction are not precluded from suing on it.

A cancellation only nominally obtained does not bind the party.

For menaces in four instances a man may avoid his own act: First, for fear of loss of life; second, of member; third, mayhem; and fourth, for fear of imprisonment.

2 Bacon, Abr. 156, 157; James v. Roberts, 18 Ohio, 562.

To constitute duress per minas, it is not essential that the party be threatened with loss of life or limb, or with mayhem; but it is enough if he act from fears excited by threats of illegal imprisonment.

Foshay v. Ferguson, 5 Hill, 154, Taylor v. Jaques, 106 Mass. 291.

It was decided as early as 1849 in this state that a contract of settlement entered into under the circumstances as shown in this case might be avoided.

James v. Roberts, 18 Ohio, 548; Williams v. Englebrecht, 87 Ohio St. 886.

This pretended contract of compromise was void, not voidable.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record discloses that on the trial the plaintiff gave evidence sustaining the allegations of her petition, and the only defense attempted to be maintained was that which plead the compromise, in support of which, and of the averments of the reply thereto, the parties respectively offered their proof. The court instructed the jury, in substance, that if the parties made a compromise and settlement of the plaintiff's loss, by which she accepted $575, in satisfaction of her claim, and a promise that she should not be prosecuted on the charge of burning the property formed no part of the consideration, she could not recover; but if such promise was a part of the consideration, the contract was void, and constituted no defense to the action. To the last proposition the defendant excepted; and whether that part of the charge was erroneous, or not, is one of the questions in the case.

It is not disputed that a contract founded upon a consideration which, in whole, or in part is illegal, immoral, or against public policy is void, and will not be enforced at the instance of any party to it; but, it is contended that rule cannot avail the plaintiff, because the contract of compromise was executed by the payment of the sum agreed upon, and the surrender of the policy, and was therefore, notwithstanding its infirmity, a bar to the action. We think not. The rule is, that the court will not assist either party to such a contract to enforce it against the other, or to recover what he has parted with under the contract; and the test in determining when it applies to a plaintiff, is whether his cause of action is founded on, or arises out of, the illegal agreement. If the action is of that character, whether it appear from his own stating, or is shown by way of defense, he must fail; otherwise, not. The plaintiff's action was upon the policy of insurance, which, it was admitted was issued by the defendant, and was without taint or blemish. The destruction of the property insured was total; so that, under our statute, the amount owing to the plaintiff was fixed and certain, being the amount for which the policy was in force when the fire occurred. Rev. Stat. § 8643; Queen Ins. Co. v. Leslie, 47 Ohio St. 409, 9 L. R. A. 45.

The petition, to which a copy of the policy is attached, contains all the necessary allegations to entitle the plaintiff to recover upon it; and upon proof of those that were denied, to the satisfaction of the jury, the plaintiff was entitled to their verdict, unless the alleged compromise agreement set up in the answer should be established and enforced against her. Her cause of action was not founded on, nor did it arise out of, that agreement. She predicated no claim to recover, upon it, nor in any way sought its enforcement, or the recovery of anything she had parted with under it. On the contrary, the defendant set it up by way of defense, and sought to make it effectual against the plaintiff, who controverted its validity, on the ground that it was illegal, and had been obtained by duress. We see no reason why the plaintiff might not pursue that course. She was not obliged to first bring an action to set aside the agreement, and compel the return of the policy so wrongfully obtained from her, or set out in her petition the facts contained in the answer and reply. They were not a part of her case. The agreement was a matter of defense which might, or might not be pleaded; and the necessity of pleading it, as well as the burden of proving it, was on the defendant. Larimore v. Wells, 29 Ohio St. 18. The plaintiff was not required to anticipate the defense, and assail the agreement, in the petition; and when set up in the answer it was none the less open to attack by her, than it would have been if made the foundation of an action against her; nor, when attacked, can it be more effective in the one case than in the other. The party asserting it in either way, as the ground of a right which he is seeking to enforce, must be defeated, because of its illegal character. "An instrument may be shown to be void and without legal existence or efficacy, as for want of consideration, or for fraud, or duress, or incapacity of the parties, or any illegality in the agreement." 2 Parsons, Cont. 8th ed. 670. And that is so, whether the instrument be pleaded as a cause of action, or as a defense to an action not arising out of the agreement. In the cases of Roll v. Raguet, 4 Ohio, 400, 22 Am. Dec. 759, and Raguet v. Roll, 7 Ohio, 70, the actions were upon instruments given for an unlawful purpose; in the former case, on promissory notes, and in the latter, on a mortgage executed to secure the notes, which were given for the sole consideration that a criminal prosecution against one of the makers should be suppressed. In each of the cases the plaintiff failed because his cause of action was founded upon the illegal contract. The plaintiff in the case of Moore v. Adams, 9 Ohio, 372, 32 Am. Dec. 723, sought to have a deed, executed by him, set aside on the ground that it was made in consideration that he should not be prosecuted for an alleged crime, of which the grantee accused him. The illegal character of the agreement, and the plaintiff's connection with it, were alleged in his bill, and constituted the only ground for the relief he prayed for; and it was held no relief could be granted him on such a cause of action. Upon the same principle, the plaintiff in Thomas v. Cronise, 16 Ohio, 54, and Kahn, Jr. v. Walton, 46 Ohio St. 195, were denied the remedy sought in those cases. And in Hooker v. DePalos, 28 Ohio St. 251, which was an action to recover back money paid in the part performance of an illegal agreement, the plaintiff was defeated on the same ground. In all of these cases, and others of like character, where the plaintiff failed to obtain the relief he desired, his cause of action was founded upon, or arose out of, the illegal transaction; and in that important and decisive feature the case before us is distinguished from them.

It was held in James v. Roberts, 18 Ohio, 548, that a court of chancery will restrain the collection of a note and mortgage procured by threats of a groundless prosecution. The court, in distinguishing that case from Roll v. Raguet, supra, says, that in the latter, "Raguet agreed that he would not only not prosecute, but would use his influence to prevent a prosecution, and that he would not appear as a witness against the accused." The doctrine of the Roll Case is recognized, but in holding that it did not apply to the James Case, the court says: "that James was entirely innocent of the crime charged against him, and that was known to all parties concerned; that the charge was got up merely for the purpose of extorting money from him by operating upon his fears, and that fearing the consequence of the prosecution, notwithstanding his innocence, he executed the note and mortgage." And further, that "a true public policy requires that all groundless prosecutions should, if possible, be prevented, and that every facility shall be afforded to the innocent to escape from such a calamity; and we think an innocent party may, with great propriety, ask to be relieved from the consequences of a groundless charge." While this case does not overrule that of Moore v. Adams, supra, or even refer to it, we regard it as containing important qualifications of the doctrine of that case, which are sustained by well considered adjudications elsewhere; among them, Heckman v. Swartz, 50 Wis. 287; Atkinson v. Denby, 6 Hurlst. & N. 778; 7 Hurlst. & N. 934, 80 L. J. Exch. 861; Hullhorst v. Scharner, 15 Neb. 57.

A party, who in the free exercise of his faculties enters into an unlawful agreement, does not stand in precisely the same position as one who executes such a contract under duress. There is no contract without the consent of the parties to its terms, and there is no consent when the free agency of one party is overcome; and it can be of no practical consequence whether it be overcome through fear of loss of life, or of limb, or through fear of imprisonment. The latter may be as potent as either of the others, and with some individuals more so. Nor, can we think a sound rule requires that the threat of either should, in all cases, be such as would operate upon persons of ordinary firmness, and inspire in them a just fear. The question in each case must be, whether the person threatened was deprived of his freedom of will; and that is a question of fact, in the determination of which regard should be had to the nature of the threats, the sex, age, and condition of life of the party, and the attending circumstances. In the proper application of the rule to the record before us, we are not prepared to say the jury was not authorized to find that the agreement relied on as a defense was procured from the plaintiff by duress, and therefore void. In that event, she was not in pari delicto, and under the authority of James v. Roberts, supra, might, if necessary, have maintained an action to set it aside. But, as has already been shown, that was unnecessary; the plaintiff might, as she did, resist the agreement on the ground that it was illegal, when set up in defense to her action. Another objection made to that part of the charge we have been considering is, that it was misleading, in that it implied the plaintiff was guilty of arson, and, in effect, required the jury to find in her favor notwithstanding she burned the property. The charge will not bear that construction. To render a contract void on the ground that its consideration was the suppression of a prosecution, the crime charged need not in fact have been committed. It was not pleaded as a defense, that the plaintiff burned the property, nor does that claim appear to have been made, in any way, on the trial. The fact that no such defense was made, may be regarded as an admission in the case that there was no foundation for it; and though that may have inured to the plaintiff's advantage, it is not probable the jury was misled, as counsel for the plaintiff in error suppose. And again, it is said, there was no evidence in the case to which the charge was applicable. We have examined the evidence, and think it was sufficient to authorize the charge given.

The only other question deemed of sufficient importance to be noticed in the report arises out of the refusal of the court to give to the jury an instruction requested by the defendant, the substance of which is, that the plaintiff could not recover because she had not paid or tendered back the money received under the alleged compromise agreement. It is contended that a party who would rescind a contract must restore to the other what has been received from him; and such is undoubtedly the general rule. It is not, however, without exceptions, one of which is found in the case of Bebout v. Bodle, 88 Ohio St. 500, in which this court held that, "where a principal debtor, by falsely and fraudulently representing to the creditor that his surety has consented to an extension of time for payment, procures from the creditor an agreement for such extension in consideration that interest be paid, such agreement is, as to the creditor, fraudulent, and he may, upon discovery of such fraud, even after the period of extension has expired, repudiate such agreement and sue upon the original contract without refunding or tendering back the interest paid under such invalid agreement." In the opinion of the court by Longworth, J., it is said: "It is further argued that in order to enable plaintiff to repudiate the contract she was bound to refund to William the money paid as its consideration, or at least tender it back. This cannot be true. This sum, which was the interest covering the period of extension, during which the principal remained actually unpaid, was due to the plaintiff from William, irrespective of the question whether the agreement was valid or invalid. We can see no reason why plaintiff should be compelled to pay to this defendant money which was her own in either event, and to which he could not in any aspect of the case be entitled."

The principle of that case, applied to this one, rendered it unnecessary for the plaintiff to return to the defendant the $575 she had received, before commencing her action. The property insured having been totally destroyed, the sum due on the policy was, under the provisions of our statute heretofore referred to, as certainly fixed at the amount for which the policy was in force when the fire occurred, as if it had been evidenced by the company's note; and she was, therefore, when she brought her action, entitled to receive from the defendant, in the absence of any valid defense, the sum of $1185. No defense was made except that based on the alleged compromise, under which, it is conceded, she was entitled to the sum paid her; and with that defense determined in her favor, a much larger sum was justly due her; so that the sum paid was owing to her in any event, and no good reason appears why it should have been returned to the defendant. The plaintiff credited the amount on the policy and sued for the balance, thus giving the defendant the full benefit of it, which was equivalent to its restoration. Allerton v. Allerton, 50 N. Y. 670. Besides, the contract being void because resting upon an illegal consideration, its repudiation by one party does not give the other a right to have restored to him what he parted with under it; nor does the retaining by the party of what he has received, amount to a ratification of the contract by him. Such contracts have no validity from the beginning, are capable of receiving none by any ratification, however deliberately and formally made; for any attempted ratification must necessarily be as ineffectual as the original contract, because as illegal. The law does not recognize it to be the right of parties to contracts of that nature, to either have them enforced, or have a return of what has been parted with in their performance; it denies both; and hence, there can be no proper application in such cases, of the rules which govern the rescission of contracts. There is nothing to rescind. The cases from which counsel for plaintiff in error have extensively quoted, are those in which it appears the contract was rescinded, or a rescission sought, on the ground of fraud, and they have no bearing on this case.

We find no error in the record, and accordingly the judgment is affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT

Louisa A. MILLER, Admx., etc., of Herbert W. Miller, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

E. A. HYDE.

(.....Mass.....)

1. The title to the property is not transferred by the entry of judgment in favor of the plaintiff in trover, but remains in him until he has received actual satisfaction.

2. Replevin of a horse is not defeated on the ground that plaintiff has elected another remedy by a prior attachment of the property in an action of trover and judgment against one of the defendants therein, after which the horse was taken in execution, but, before satisfaction of the judgment, was retaken by one of the defendants in a replevin action which is still pending in another state, but to which the present defendant is not a party.

3. The plaintiff in an action of replevin is not estopped by a former attachment or levy, where the other party has not changed his position or course of conduct relying thereon.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Middlesex County in favor of defendant in a suit brought to recover possession of a horse. Reversed.

The case was presented to the court upon an agreed statement of facts which was as follows:

This is an action of replevin to recover possession of a horse known as the "Bull". The plaintiff is the widow and administratrix of the estate of Herbert W. Miller, late of Boston, Mass. The said Herbert W. Miller was by business a stable keeper, and was also interested in the trotting of horses. On or about July 12, 1890, the said Miller in his lifetime intrusted to one George Bryden, of Hartford, Conn., a blank check to be used in the purchase of the said horse known as the "Bull," and a few days thereafter the said Bryden, as the agent and for the benefit of said Miller, purchased said horse, and paid for it with money obtained on said check. Said horse was kept, in company with other horses also belonging to said Miller, in a barn rented for that purpose by said Miller in Hartford, Conn., and there remained until demanded by the plaintiff herein. The said Miller died in Boston, September 14, 1890, and in the following November the plaintiff herein was duly qualified as the administratrix of his estate in Massachusetts, and shortly thereafter, on or about the 18th day of November, 1890, she went to Hartford, and made a demand on said Bryden for said horse, but Bryden refused to deliver the horse, and claimed to own a half interest therein. The affairs of the said Miller were found to be in great confusion, and the plaintiff was without means of her own, and was harassed by lawsuits in Boston, but in due course of time she was appointed administratrix of the estate of said Miller in Hartford county, Conn., by the probate court of said county, and, shortly after, his estate was declared insolvent by said probate court. Meantime, on or about March 31, 1891, the said Bryden sold said horse the "Bull," as his own property, to Joseph C. Davenport, of Hartford, Conn., and Ada L. Hyde, of Brookline, Conn., for the sum of $1,500, and gave a bill of sale of said horse to the said Davenport and Hyde, and the said Davenport gave to the said Bryden his check for $1,285, which check was duly paid. In November, 1891, after her appointment as administratrix in said Hartford county, the plaintiff, being a stranger in Connecticut, and being unable to furnish a bond in Connecticut sufficient to enable her to replevin said horse, brought an action for the conversion of said horse against the said Bryden and Joseph C. Davenport, E. A. Hyde and John Shillinglaw, the horse being then in the possession of said three last-named defendants, and said horse was attached in said suit. Said action was brought to trial in the court of common pleas of Hartford county at the March term of 1892, and the court found for plaintiff as against the defendant Bryden in the sum of $1,000, fixing the date of conversion at the time of the demand on Bryden in November, 1890, and in favor of the defendants Hyde, Davenport, and Shillinglaw on the ground that said three last-named defendants did not appear to have anything to do with said horse until some months after said conversion by said Bryden. The defendant Bryden was worthless and without property. Execution against him was taken out on said judgment by the said plaintiff, and placed in the hands of James R. Graham, a deputy sheriff for said Hartford county. After demand on said execution on said Bryden by said sheriff, which demand was not complied with, the said sheriff levied said execution by direction of the plaintiff's attorney on the said horse, the "Bull," and proceeded to advertise said horse for sale at public auction. The said sheriff was in the act of selling said horse on said execution, but before it was sold it was taken from him by John M. Foote, Jr., a deputy sheriff of said county, under a writ of replevin in favor of the said Joseph C. Davenport, which suit of replevin at the time of the bringing of this suit was still pending in said Hartford county, Conn. The said Davenport gave bond in said replevin suit, and took possession of the said horse, the "Bull," and later, in August, 1892, intrusted him to the said E. A. Hyde, who brought the horse to Massachusetts, and entered it in his own name for the races at Mystic Park, in Medford, Mass., and, while said horse was at said Mystic Park, he was replevied by the plaintiff herein under a replevin writ directed to the said Hyde. The judgment entered against said Bryden in favor of the plaintiff as aforesaid has not been satisfied.

NOTE.—The above case presents a peculiar illustration of the difficulty in determining the law as to election of remedies. See on this subject generally, Fowler v. Bowery Sav. Bank (N. Y.) 4 L. R. A. 145, and note; Conrow v. Little (N. Y.) 5 L. R. A. 408, and note; Terry v. Munger (N. Y.) 8 L. R. A. 25 L. R. A.

Messrs. Elder, Wait & Whitman, for appellant:

The fact that the plaintiff has recovered a judgment in trover which is still unsatisfied does not bar an action of replevin.

Atwater v. Tupper, 45 Conn. 144, 29 Am. Rep. 674; Turner v. Brock, 6 Heisk. 50; Vanuxem v. Burr, 151 Mass. 386; Lovejoy v. Murray, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 1, 18 L. ed. 129; Elliott v. Hayden, 104 Mass. 180; Byers v. Franklin Coal Co. 106 Mass. 181; Lord v. Bigelow, 124 Mass. 185; Greenfield v. Wilson, 13 Gray, 384; Moore v. Loring, 106 Mass. 455; Miller's River Nat. Bank v. Jefferson, 138 Mass. 111; Brinmead v. Harrison, L. R. 6 C. P. 584, L. R. 7 C. P. 547; Smith v. Smith, 51 N. H. 571.

Has the plaintiff lost any right or title by the action of her counsel in causing the horse to be attached in the suit against Bryden?

Surely it would be a reproach to the law if the poverty or friendlessness of a plaintiff should act to deprive her of a right which she was striving to maintain, or could be construed into a waiver or an estoppel.

The plaintiff has done no act to waive or ratify the tort. On the contrary, all her suits have been in tort, and, as was said by Bovill, Ch. J., this "is a conclusive election the other way."

The fact of the attachment of the specific property is immaterial.

Bailey v. Hervey, 185 Mass. 172.

There can be no waiver. In Crafts v. Bel-den, 99 Mass. 535, Foster, J., said: "A waiver is an intentional relinquishment of a known right."

In Connihan v. Thompson, 111 Mass. 270, it was held that a purchaser of land is not estopped to bring a bill for specific performance by the fact that he has brought a suit at law against the vendor for damages and attached the land.

The defendant cannot make out the element of intent on the part of the plaintiff necessary to constitute an election, or waiver, or estoppel in pais from the agreed facts.

Bradley v. Brigham, 3 L. R. A. 507, 149 Mass. 141; Dean v. Yates, 22 Ohio St. 388; Browning v. Banoroff, 8 Met. 278.

The pendency of the replevin suit in Connecticut between Davenport and the deputy sheriff is no bar to the present action. The pendency of a suit in another jurisdiction, even if it is between the same parties as in the suit where the point is raised, is no bar to the prosecution of said last named action.

Newell v. Newton, 10 Pick. 471; Colt v. Partridge, 7 Met. 574; Scott v. Rand, 118 Mass. 215; Bowne v. Joy, 9 Johns. 221; Walsh v. Durkin, 12 Johns. 99.

One whose property has been replevied by a writ against his agent or his bailee can retake it by replevin from the plaintiff in the first action even during the pendency of that action.

White v. Dolliver, 118 Mass. 400, 18 Am. Rep. 502.

In Connecticut cross-replevin suits between the same parties seem allowable.

Rosworth v. Troubridge, 45 Conn. 161; Troubridge v. Rosworth, 45 Conn. 166.

Mr. J. H. Morrison, for appellee:

The suit instituted by the plaintiff, Miller, against Bryden is an absolute election on her part and forever bars her from maintaining any other action in respect to said horse.

Bradley v. Brigham, 3 L. R. A. 507, 149 Mass. 144; Connihan v. Thompson, 111 Mass. 272; Butler v. Hildreth, 5 Met. 49.

The plaintiff in the case at bar made a positive, absolute election when she brought her action for conversion, and the question of the want of satisfaction of the judgment obtained therein cannot be pleaded, as it is immaterial whether judgment was or was not satisfied if an election was made by plaintiff.

Butler v. Hildreth, and Bradley v. Brigham, supra; Connihan v. Thompson, 111 Mass. 270; Smith v. Baker, L. R. 8 C. P. 850; Lythgoe v. Vernon, 5 Hurlst. & N. 180.

This action cannot be maintained while the action of replevin is pending, in which the plaintiff in this action is the actual defendant and the defendant in this action is the actual plaintiff, and the title to the same property is the question involved.

Portland Bank v. Stubbs, 6 Mass. 426, 4 Am. Dec. 151; Lockwood v. Perry, 9 Met. 440; Gordon v. Jenney, 16 Mass. 465; White v. Dolliver, 118 Mass. 400, 18 Am. Rep. 502.

Barker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff may maintain replevin if she is the owner of the horse, and if she is not estopped from asserting her ownership against the defendant. As administratrix of her husband's estate, she was the owner when she brought trover in Connecticut against Bryden, the bailee who had wrongfully usurped dominion and sold and delivered the horse to Davenport. As the horse was in Connecticut and the action of trover was in the courts of that state, the effect of the suit upon her title would be determined by the law of the forum. But as the law of Connecticut is not stated as an agreed fact, we must apply our own. Whether a plaintiff's title to the chattel is transferred upon the entry in his favor of judgment in trover has not been decided by this court. Assuming that, in early times, title to the chattel was transferred to the defendant upon the entry of judgment for the plaintiff in trover, at present a different doctrine is generally applied, and it is now commonly held that title is not transferred by the entry of judgment, but remains in the plaintiff until he has received actual satisfaction. See Atwater v. Tupper, 45 Conn. 144, 29 Am. Rep. 674; Turner v. Brock, 6 Heisk. 50; Lovejoy v. Murray, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 1, 18 L. ed. 129; Ex parte Drake, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 866; Brinsmead v. Harrison, L. R. 7 C. P. 547; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 533, and note. And the law has been commonly so administered by our own trial courts. We think this doctrine better calculated to do justice, and see no reason why we should not hold it to be law. Whenever the title passes, as there has been no sale or gift and no title by prescription or by possession taken upon abandonment by the true owner, the transfer is made by his inferred election to recognize as an absolute ownership the qualified dominion wrongfully assumed by the defendant. The true owner makes no release in terms and no election in terms to relinquish his title; but the election is inferred by the law, to prevent injustice. Formerly this election was inferred when judgment for the plaintiff was entered, because his damages, measured by the value of the chattel and interest, were then authoritatively assessed, and the judgment brought to his aid the power of the court to enforce its collection out of the wrongdoer's estate or by taking his person; and this was deemed enough to insure actual satisfaction. If so, it was just to infer that when he accepted these rights he elected to relinquish to the wrongdoer the full ownership of the chattel. An election was not inferred when the suit was commenced, although the plaintiff then alleged that the defendant had converted the chattel, and although the writ might contain a capias; because, owing to the uncertainties attendant upon the pursuit of remedies by action, it was not just to infer such an election while ultimate satisfaction for the wrong was but problematical. Forms of action are a means of administering justice rather than an end in themselves. When it is seen that the practical result of a form of action is a failure of justice, the courts will make such changes as are necessary to do justice. If the entry of judgment in trover usually gave the judgment creditor but an empty right, it was not just to infer that upon acquiring such a right he relinquished the ownership of the chattel, and the rule that required the inference to be then drawn was properly changed. The ground for inferring such an election was that upon the entry of judgment he acquired an effectual right in lieu of his property, and the doctrine that, without some actual satisfaction, the inference of an election would not be drawn has been shown by experience to be necessary to the administration of justice, and has been generally acted upon, and the modern rule adopted that the plaintiff's title is not transferred by the entry of judgment, but is transferred by actual satisfaction. Trover is but a tentative attempt to obtain justice for a wrong, and, until pursued so far that it has given actual satisfaction, ought not to bar the plaintiff from asserting his title. The present doctrine is consistent with the general principle stated by Lord Ellenborough in Drake v. Mitchell, 8 East, 251, and quoted in Vanuxem v. Burr, 151 Mass. 386, 389, as approved in Lord v. Bigelow, 124 Mass. 185, that "a judgment recovered in any form of action is still but a security for the original cause of action until it be made productive in satisfaction to the party." Whether the holder of an unsatisfied judgment in trover can, without a fresh taking, maintain replevin against the same defendant, or is restricted to one action against the same person for a single tort, we do not now decide. See Bennett v. Hood, 1 Allen, 47, 79 Am. Dec. 705; Trask v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 2 Allen, 331; Bliss v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 160 Mass. 447. If he is so restricted, it is not because the ownership of the chattel has been transferred. But the present plaintiff has done more than to take judgment in trover. In her action of trover she caused the horse to be attached as property of Bryden, and, since obtaining judgment, she has caused the horse to be seized in execution of the judgment as his property, and to be kept and offered for sale on the execution until, as it was about to be so sold, it was replevied by Davenport from the officer in a suit between them which is still pending in Connecticut. That suit is not a bar to this action, because it is not between the same parties. White v. Dolliver, 113 Mass. 400, 18 Am. Rep. 502; Newell v. Newton, 10 Pick. 470. But we must still inquire whether, assuming that the plaintiff's property in the horse was not transferred by her judgment in trover, it was transferred by that judgment taken in connection with the facts of the attachment and levy, and also whether she is estopped by the attachment and the levy from asserting her title in this action.

In the first place, the doctrine that a mortgagee of personalty who attaches the mortgaged goods on a writ against the mortgagor cannot afterwards enforce his mortgage is not in point. The mortgagee is not the owner, but has merely a lien, and may well be held to relinquish that lien when by the attachment he establishes another. But if the plaintiff has actual ownership, and thus the full right to do with his own property as he may choose, merely procuring it to be attached on mesne process, or seized on execution as the property of another, does not work a change of ownership. The owner does not sell or give away his goods. In cases which are likely to occasion such conduct there usually is, as in the present case, a disputed title; and it is with the hope of avoiding litigation over it that the real owner consents that the chattel shall for a special purpose only be treated as the property of another.

This is "consistent with an intention ultimately to assert title should circumstances render it desirable for him so to do;" and he may well wait to see the issue, which may be such as to avoid the litigation of the question of title. See Edmunds v. Hill, 133 Mass. 445, 446; Bursley v. Hamilton, 15 Pick. 40, 43, 25 Am. Dec. 423; Johns v. Church, 12 Pick. 557, 23 Am. Dec. 651; Mackay v. Holland, 4 Met. 69, 74; Dewey v. Field, Id. 881, 384, 38 Am. Dec. 876. Nor is there any good reason why such a use of his own property by a plaintiff in trover should be held to divest him of his ownership when it would not have that effect in other forms of action. In trover he is in legal effect asserting by his suit that the title is and will remain in himself until he receives satisfaction on a judgment, and his subjection of the chattel to attachment or to seizure on execution is simply a use which he chooses to make of his own property, which does not divest him of title, or hamper him in the subsequent assertion of his ownership except by the rules of estoppel. The case of Ex parte Drake, above cited, is an authority to the point that a plaintiff who has brought an action of detinue, and taken judgment both for the detention and the value of the chattel, and has also proved his judgment in bankruptcy after having had the chattel seized on execution as the defendant's property, may nevertheless assert his ownership and have process to restore to him the chattel in specie. In such cases courts look to substance rather than form, and do not by inferring an election or a waiver deprive of his property a plaintiff who has unfortunately resorted to some futile method of procuring redress. In the present case, Davenport had bought the horse of Bryden before the attachment was made, and therefore the attachment was a denial of his ownership as well as an assertion of her own title by the plaintiff. The natural construction to be put upon her conduct in attaching and beginning a levy upon her own horse as the property of Bryden in a suit asserting her ownership is that, while she contended that in fact the horse was her own, she consented that, if litigation with Davenport as to the true state of title could be avoided by so selling the horse that the proceeds of the sale should be applied upon her claim for damages, she would in that event no longer assert her paramount title. Her implied offer not having been accepted, and Davenport having rendered impossible the accomplishment of her plan to avoid further litigation, she could thereupon say that all which had gone before was provisional upon the completion of the levy, and could enforce her right of property by any proper action against Davenport, or any one who might thereafter take wrongful possession of her horse, unless barred by the rules of estoppel.

Upon the question of estoppel, it is material to the decision of the present case to consider only whether she is estopped as to the present defendant or his principal, Davenport. Whether she has rendered Bryden or the officer who made the attachment or the levy in the Bryden suit liable to costs, expenses, or chance of loss is not material upon the question whether she is barred by the doctrines of estoppel from maintaining the present action. She is now prosecuting one of several successive wrongdoers for a fresh interference with the possession of her property, and neither the present defendant, Hyde, nor Davenport, for whom he claims to be acting as agent, has done or suffered anything or been put to any liability by reason of which the plaintiff should be estopped from asserting her title. Upon the facts, Davenport, in taking the horse in replevin, did not rely upon the Bryden attachment or levy, but acted in denial of their validity; and Hyde is not shown to have been influenced by them in consenting to become Davenport's agent in keeping the horse, or in any manner. Neither is shown to have changed his position or course of conduct, relying upon the plaintiff's action in causing the attachment or the levy, and she is not estopped by it from maintaining the present action. In the opinion of a majority of the court, the result must be: Judgment set aside, and judgment for plaintiff ordered.

Knowlton, J., dissenting:

I am of opinion that the judgment in this case should be for the defendant. It is a general rule of law that when one is entitled to either of two inconsistent remedies for a wrong done him, the pursuit of one of them so far as to affect the interests of the other party is conclusive election, and a waiver of the other. Hooker v. Olmstead, 6 Pick. 481; Butler v. Hildreth, 5 Met. 49-53; Arnold v. Richmond Iron Works, 1 Gray, 434-440; Connihan v. Thompson, 111 Mass. 270; Washburn v. Great Western Ins. Co. 114 Mass. 175; Ormsby v. Dearborn, 116 Mass. 386; Seavey v. Potter, 121 Mass. 297; Bailey v. Hervey, 135 Mass. 172-174; Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Caduc, 144 Mass. 85, 86; Raphael v. Reinstein, 154 Mass. 178. It is under this rule that the owner of property wrongfully taken by another is held to be precluded from claiming it after he has elected to recover the value of it from the wrongdoer. The property passes, not because there has been a sale, but because the owner has elected to receive instead of it that which represents it, and because it would be unjust to permit him to take the property after having chosen the money which is its equivalent. The principal question in cases of this kind is, At what stage of the proceedings shall the owner be deemed to have made an election that binds him? On principle, and as a general rule, he should be bound by the election he makes if in making it he goes so far as to affect the rights or interests of the other party. It would be unjust, when he may proceed only in one or the other of two opposite directions, that he should go forward in one direction in such a way as materially to affect the other party, and then turn backward and go on in the other, and compel his adversary to satisfy him in a different way. In very early cases it was held that the owner of property unlawfully taken makes a conclusive election of his remedy, which passes the property, as between the parties, when he takes judgment for the value of it against the wrongdoer. He thereby puts his claim for property, of which he chooses to say that he has been divested, into the form of a debt apparent of record, for the satisfaction of which he may at any time have execution from the court. But, where nothing more is done than to take a judgment without security, there are considerations which have led, in many courts, to a modification of the rule in favor of the owner. Sometimes, when he brings his suit in trover, he is unable to find the property, and very often his judgment or the value of it cannot be made available. In taking judgment he merely puts in form, and settles by adjudication, a claim for the value of the property, to which he was entitled from the beginning, if he chose to enforce it. He does not otherwise disturb the defendant, or his property; and while it would, doubtless, be more logical to say that he is concluded by his election as soon as he has recovered judgment, it is perhaps a practical rule, which will more generally work out justice, to hold that if he does nothing more to collect the money, and if he proceeds within a reasonable time, he may still take the property as his own. But if, having fixed the liability of the defendant for a debt by taking judgment, he says by his conduct that he intends to collect the debt, and does that which affects the interest of the defendant in that particular, he should be deemed to have made his election conclusive.

The cases which say that the rights of the parties in regard to the title are fixed, not by taking judgment, but by obtaining satisfaction, cannot mean that one may take judgment for the full value of the property, and collect one half or two thirds of the amount, and may afterwards take and hold the property itself under his original title. Many of these cases were in jurisdiction where attachment on mesne process is not permitted, and where there is no security for a judgment when it is rendered. So far as I am aware, there is no case in which is considered the effect of taking judgment in a suit where there was an attachment which secured the collection of the judgment, or the effect of a partial satisfaction, or of a proceeding after judgment to enforce it by a levy on the property. It seems to me there is good ground for holding that when one undertakes to collect the value of his property by making an attachment to secure the judgment which he may obtain, and then prosecutes his claim to judgment, he has done that which affects the rights of the other party far more than the mere recovery of a judgment on an unsecured claim. But however that may be, when, after judgment, the plaintiff proceeds to obtain satisfaction by a levy on the defendant's property,—and much more when he levies on the property, for the value of which he obtained judgment,—and advertises it for sale as the property of the defendant, he should be held to have fixed his rights, and the rights of the other party, in regard to the title, beyond his power to change them. By taking the defendant's property to satisfy the execution, he subjects him to the legal costs and expenses attendant upon the levy, and deprives him of what otherwise he would have. Even if he afterwards returns the property, he puts upon him the risk of loss or depreciation in value while it is held. If the property had not been taken on execution, the defendants might have negotiated to obtain the means of satisfying the execution by disposing of the property, or he might have attempted to satisfy it in some other way. He may have relaxed his efforts, relying on the levy; and if the plaintiff is permitted to abandon the levy, and proceed in another way, he may ultimately suffer loss on account of what the plaintiff did. This is equally true whether the property is that for which the plaintiff recovered his judgment or not; and, if it is the same, the plaintiff's act is a distinct and positive assertion that the property is the defendant's by reason of his judgment, and of his purpose to collect the judgment, and to apply the proceeds of the property in the satisfaction of it. Unless the rule stated at the beginning of this opinion is to be abrogated altogether, it must be held that when a plaintiff has elected to take judgment for the full value of property converted, and has then levied the execution upon property of the defendant which is subject to be taken on execution,—especially if it is the property converted,—he is thereby precluded from reversing his election, and taking the converted property under his original title. The case of Ex parte Drake, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 866, cited in the opinion of the majority, was an action of detinue, where, by the terms of the judgment, the plaintiff was to have either the property, or the ascertained value of it. If the plaintiff cannot abandon her judgment, and levy and reclaim the horse, as against Bryden, she cannot as against this defendant, who is in privity with Bryden, through Davenport, who is a bona fide purchaser from Bryden. So far as the pending proceedings in Connecticut, under the levy and the subsequent replevin suit there, affect the title, they are binding on the plaintiff here; for the officer was acting in enforcement of her rights, by her direction, and she is therefore in privity with him. His relation to her is very different from that of a mere bailee.

The Chief Justice concurs in this opinion.

Holmes, J., dissenting:

As the judges are not unanimous, it becomes necessary for me to state my views, which otherwise I should not do, as they have not persuaded my brethren.

I am of opinion that the plaintiff ought to be barred in this action by her recovery of judgment in trover for the same horse. I am aware that the doctrine that title passes by judgment without satisfaction is not in fashion, but I never have been able to understand any other. It has always seemed to me that one whose property has been converted has an election between two courses,—that he may have the thing back, or he may have its value in damages, but that he cannot have both; that when he chooses one he necessarily gives up the other; and that by taking a judgment for the value he does choose one conclusively. He cannot have a right to the value of the thing, effectual or ineffectual, and a right to the thing, at the same time. The defendant is estopped by the judgment to deny the plaintiff's right to the value of the thing. Usually, estoppels by judgment are mutual. It would seem to follow that the plaintiff also is estopped to deny his right to the value of the thing, and therefore is estopped to set up an inconsistent claim. In general, an election is determined by judgment. Butler v. Hildreth, 5 Met. 49; Bailey v. Hervey, 185 Mass. 172, 174; Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Caduco, 144 Mass. 85, 86; Raphael v. Reinstein, 154 Mass. 178, 179. I know of no reason why a judgment should be less conclusive in this case than any other. Of course, I am speaking of a judgment for the value of the chattel, not for one giving nominal damages for the taking. The argument from election is adopted in White v. Philbrick, 5 Me. 147, 150, 17 Am. Dec. 214, which, so far as I know, is still the law of Maine, notwithstanding the remark in Murray v. Lovejoy, 2 Cliff. 191, 198, Fed. Cas. No. 9,963. See also Shaw, Ch. J., in Butler v. Hildreth, 5 Met. 49, 58.

The most conspicuous cases which have taken a different view speak of the hardship of a man's losing his property without being paid for it, and sometimes cite the dictum in Jenk. (4th Cent.) Case 88, "Solutio pretii emptiois loco habetur," which is dogma, not reasoning, or, if reasoning, is based on the false analogy of a sale. But they leave the argument which I have stated unanswered, not, as I think, because the judges deemed it unworthy of answer, or met by paramount considerations of policy, but because they did not have either that, or a clue to the early cases, before their mind. Lovejoy v. Murray, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 1, 17, 18 L. ed. 129, 134; Brinsmead v. Harrison, L. R. 6 C. P. 584, 587, L. R. 7 C. P. 547, 554. It is not the practice of the English judges to overrule the common law because they disapprove it, and to do so without discussion. In Brinsmead v. Harrison, Mr. Justice Willes thought he was proving that the common law always had been in accord with his position. So far as the question of policy goes, it does not seem to me that the possibility—it is only the possibility—of an election turning out to have been unwise is a sufficient reason for breaking in upon a principle which must be admitted to be sound on the whole, and for overthrowing the doctrine of the common law by a judicial fiat. I am not informed of any statistics which establish that judgments for money usually give the judgment creditor only an empty right.

That the view which I hold is the view of the common law, I think, may be proved by considering what was the theory on which the remedies of trespass and replevin were given. In Y. B. 19 Hen. VI. 65, pl. 5, Newton says: "If you had taken my chattels, it is at my choice to sue replevin, which shows that the property is in me, or to sue a writ of trespass, which shows that the property is in the taker; and so it is at my will to waive the property or not." In 6 Hen. VII. 8, pl. 4, Vavisor uses similar language, and adds: "And so it is of goods taken."

One may divest the property out of himself, if he will, by proceedings in trespass, or demand property by replevin or writ of detinue," if he prefers. There is no doubt that the old law was that replevin affirms property in the plaintiff, and trespass disaffirms it, and that the plaintiff has election. Bro. "Trespass," pl. 184; 18 Vin. Abr. 696; Anderson and Warberton, JJ., in Bishop v. Montague, Cro. Eliz. 824. The proposition is made clearer when it is remembered that a tortious possession—at least, if not felonious—carried with it a title by wrong, in the case of chattels, as well as in the case of a disseisin of land, as appears from the page of Viner just cited, and as has been shown more fully by the learned researches of Prof. Ames. 8 Harvard Law Rev. 28. See Id. 826. I do not regard that as a necessary doctrine, or as the law of Massachusetts; but it was the common law, and it fixed the relations of trespass and replevin to each other. Trespass, and, on the same principle, trover, proceed on the footing of affirming property in the defendant, and of ratifying the act of the defendant which already has affirmed it. I do not see on what other ground a judgment for the value can be justified. If the title still is in doubt, or remains in the plaintiff, the defendant ought not to be charged for anything but the tortious taking. Again, cannot the plaintiff take the converted chattel on execution? And on what principle can he do so, if it does not yet belong to the defendant?

I say but a word as to the practical difficulties of the prevailing rule. No doubt they can be met in one way or another. Suppose the plaintiff, after judgment, were to retake the chattel by his own act. It would strike me as odd to say that this satisfied the judgment, and as impossible to say that it satisfied the whole judgment, which was for the tort, as well as for the value of the property. Yet, on the view which I oppose, I presume that the judgment could not be collected. See Coombs v. Sansom, 1 Dowl. & R. 201.

It seems to me that the opinion which I hold was the prevailing one in England until Brinsmead v. Harrison, supra. Bishop v. Montague, supra, Fenner, J., in Boome v. Wootton, Cro. Jac. 73, 74, Yelv. 67, Moore, 762; Adams v. Broughton, 3 Strange, 1078, Andr. 18, 19; Buckland v. Johnson, 15 C. B. 145, 157, 162, 163; Serjeant James Manning's note to Barnett v. Brandao, 6 Man. & G. 640. See Lamine v. Dorrell, 2 Ld. Raym. 1216, 1217. And I should add that I see a relic of the ancient and true doctrine in the otherwise unexplained notion that when execution is satisfied the title of the defendant relates back to the date of the conversion. Hepburn v. Sewell, 5 Harr. & J. 211, 9 Am. Dec. 512; Smith v. Smith, 51 N. H. 571, 50 N. H. 212. Compare Atwater v. Tupper, 45 Conn. 144, 148, 29 Am. Rep. 674.

The only authorities binding upon us are the ancient evidences of the common law, as it was before the Revolution, and our own decisions. I have shown what I think was the common law. Our own decisions leave the question open to be decided in accordance with it. Campbell v. Phelps, 1 Pick. 62, 65, 70, 11 Am. Dec. 139; Bennett v. Hood, 1 Allen, 47, 79 Am. Dec. 705. Many cases in other states are collected in Freeman on Judgments, 4th ed. § 237.

If I am right in my general views, they apply to this case. The plaintiff recovered her judgment in Connecticut, to be sure, as ancillary administrator there; but the horse was there, and she was entitled to it there, so that her judgment recovered there passed the title. Like any other transfer of a chattel, valid in the place where it was made, and where the chattel was situated, it will be respected elsewhere. The Connecticut law was not put in evidence, and therefore we must presume that a judgment there has whatever effect we attribute to it on the principles of the common law.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

C. MOYER, Respt.,

v.

EAST SHORE TERMINAL CO., Appt.

(.....S. C.....)

Notice of the by-laws of a corporation restricting the right of any officer to make contracts of employment to a period less than one year is not chargeable to one who makes a contract for services to the corporation with a general manager of the company who has been given absolute charge of its business at the place of contract.

NOTE.—Effect of corporate by-laws as notice.

An attempt to ascertain from an examination and comparison of the treatises on corporations what is the effect of notice, at least as to third persons, of the by-laws of a corporation, will result in considerable confusion.

One of the leading text-books on the subject says: "Persons dealing with the officers or agents of a corporation are usually chargeable with notice of the authority conferred upon such officers and agents in the by-laws, but not to any greater extent."

Another says: "It is a common doctrine that persons dealing with the agents and officers of a corporation are chargeable with notice, not only of the authority conferred upon them, but of the restrictions and limitations of the same contained in the by-laws;" but afterwards adds: "There is a distinction made as to notice of the authority conferred by by-laws, between by-laws of the corporation conferring or restricting such authority, and the by-laws of the directors."

Another stating the rule that persons dealing with the agents and officers of a corporation are chargeable with notice of the authority conferred upon them, says: "When the authority is specifically given in the by-laws, it cannot be inferred by virtue of an office."

On the other hand, another leading work on corporations says: "There is no general rule compelling persons dealing with the corporation, at their peril, to take notice of its by-laws. If a corporation appoints an agent of a class having functions and powers according to the general custom, a person dealing with such agent is not affected by a by-law restricting the powers which would ordinarily belong to an agent of that class, in the absence of actual notice of the by-law."

And another important work on the subject in one place says: "Rules and regulations of a corporation that no contracts shall be binding upon it, which are not in writing signed by its president, cannot affect contracts made by agents of the corporation with persons having no notice of the rule," while in a different place it says: "Persons, although not members of the company, who engage in business transactions with its officers, are affected with notice of limitations upon their powers prescribed in the corporate by-laws."

This divergence and disagreement of text-books is, to a considerable extent, explained by the conflicting statements to be found in the opinions of the courts. But, as will appear from the analysis and comparison of the decisions which follow, the doctrine of the courts may now be regarded as substantially settled without conflict.

As to members of the corporation.

It may be said to be a general rule that the officers of a corporation are presumed to know its by-laws. Thus, an officer is presumed to know of a by-law adopted before his appointment which reserves the right to remove an officer at pleasure. Hunter v. New Orleans Sun Mut. Ins. Co. 26 La. Ann. 18.

So the secretary of a corporation, who had been long in its service, was held chargeable with notice of a by-law of this kind which was printed in a book of by-laws in which he was named as secretary. Douglas v. Merchants Ins. Co. 7 L. R. A. 822, 118 N. Y. 484.

So the by-laws of a bank are admissible in evidence against a cashier whose duties were therein prescribed and who had access to them, to show his liability, although he was not one of the corporators. Bank of Wilmington v. Wollaston, 3 Har (Del.) 90.

So the by-laws of a land and loan company containing the statement of a member's shares, payments, etc., was held admissible against him. Frank v. Morrison, 58 Md. 423.

But a shareholder in a telegraph company is not chargeable with notice of a resolution of a board of directors limiting its liability in respect to messages. Pearsall v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 124 N. Y. 256. The court in this case said: "A shareholder in a corporation is not chargeable with constructive notice of resolutions adopted by the board of directors or by provisions in the by-laws regulating the mode in which its business shall be transacted with its customers."

As to lien on stock.

In the case of Brent v. Bank of Washington, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 614, 9 L. ed. 554, in a discussion as to the lien of a bank on its stock with respect to a claim of the United States to priority of its claim against the stockholder, the court said: "Every stockholder who draws or indorses a note to procure a loan from the bank is bound to know the terms of the charter and by-laws," and the lien of the bank was upheld.

So it is generally held that the by-laws of a bank reserving the lien on stock for indebtedness to the bank, is valid as to the members of the corporation.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Charleston County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for breach of an employment contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Mitchell & Smith for appellant.

Mr. J. N. Nathans, for respondent:

Corporations can only act through agents, and third parties are justified in dealing with such agents on the assumption that they are invested with all the powers within the apparent scope of their authority. The law with regard to the powers and authority of agents of corporations is the same as that between individuals and their agents. The power of a general agent to contract within his apparent authority cannot be limited by secret instructions of his principal, and by-laws not known to third parties cannot be invoked to destroy rights acquired under the exercise of an apparent authority, with which the agent has been invested.

Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 598; Walker v. Wilmington, O. & A. R. Co. 26 S. C. 85; McCreery v. Garvin, 89 S. C. 875.

Under any circumstances as against the plaintiff without some evidence on defendant's part of notice to him of such by-law it is no defense.

1 Wood, Railway Law, p. 441.

As from the very business of a railroad corporation, it is impossible to conduct it without these intermediate agencies, the authority of direct agents to delegate certain of the powers to such intermediate agents is conclusively presumed.

1 Wood, Railway Law, p. 444.

The appointment of subagents was clearly within the authority of a general manager "who was to have absolute charge," and plaintiff was not bound even to look beyond the apparent authority with which Gaddis was invested.

Tuttle v. Walton, 1 Ga. 49, Atchison County Bank v. Durfee, 118 Mo. 431.

And the by-law reserving such a lien when printed on the stock is notice to any one who takes the stock. State Sav. Assn. v. Nixon-Jones Printing Co. 25 Mo. App. 642.

But bona fide purchasers of stock without notice of such a by-law are not charged with constructive notice of it. Anglo-California Bank v. Grangers Bank, 63 Cal. 359; Bank of Holly Springs v. Pinson, 58 Miss. 421, 38 Am. Rep. 830; Driscoll v. West Bradley & Cary Mfg. Co. 59 N. Y. 109; Planters & M. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Selma Sav. Bank, 63 Ala. 585. These cases are all cases of by-laws of banks except that of Driscoll v. West Bradley & Cary Mfg. Co., which was a case of a manufacturing corporation.

Members of a mutual insurance company and benefit society are bound to take notice of its existing by-laws affecting their interest. Pfister v. Gerwig, 122 Ind. 567; Supreme Lodge, K. of P. v. Knight, 3 L. R. A. 409, 117 Ind. 489; Holland v. Taylor, 111 Ind. 121; Bauer v. Samson Lodge, K. of P. 102 Ind. 262; Supreme Commandery Knights of the Golden Rule v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 496, 46 Am. Rep. 332; Treadway v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co. 29 Conn. 65; Coles v. Iowa State Mut. Ins. Co. 18 Iowa. 425; Walsh v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 30 Iowa, 145, 6 Am. Rep. 664; Mitchell v. Lycoming Mut. Ins. Co. 51 Pa. 402.

The same was held in Simeral v. Dubuque Mut. F. Ins. Co., 18 Iowa, 819, with respect to by-laws referred to in the policy.

But in Kingsley v. New England Mut. F. Ins. Co., 8 Cush. 393, it was held that the by-laws of a mutual fire insurance company related to notice of laws which were not referred to in the policy, were not a part of it and were not binding on the policy-holder.

So far as by-laws assume to affect the contract of insurance it would seem that, as in this case, they should be held to form no part of the contract if they were not referred to in the policy when this purported to be complete on its face.

So in Miller v. Hillsborough Mut. F. Assur. Assn., 44 N. J. Eq. 224, it was held that a member of a mutual fire insurance company, whose policy recites that the annexed by-laws are conditions of insurance, is entitled to suppose that these are all the by-laws which affect it, and that an undisclosed by-law as to the effect of non-occupancy cannot be allowed to operate against him, and that the policy may be re-formed in equity excluding from it that by-law in order that the company may become liable thereon according to its constitution and by-laws.

As to the public generally.

In Cummings v. Webster, 48 Me. 197, it is said that a by-law in pursuance of a charter of a corporation is equally binding in law on the members of the corporation and all others acquainted with its method of doing business; but the question how far the by-law is constructive notice to persons doing business with the corporation is the one on which the conflict is found in the text-books, and which has appeared to some extent in the decisions of the courts.

The general rule is laid down in Bank of Holly Springs v. Pinson, 58 Miss. 421, 38 Am. Rep. 830, that no person not a member of a corporation can be affected in any of his rights by a corporate by-law of which he has no notice, and that he is not bound by any secret limitations or restrictions placed on the powers of an officer, by by-law or otherwise.

And in England it has been held that a mere by-law of which no public notice has been given, and which may be altered from time to time, is not binding on third persons without notice. Re Asiatic Bkg. Corp. L. R. 4 Ch. App. 252.

So in Massachusetts, a leading case lays down the rule that the powers of officers of manufacturing and trading companies cannot be limited to special or enumerated powers contained in by-laws which are not known to persons dealing with them, but that such officers may be presumed to have the authority implied by their designations. Fay v. Noble, 12 Cush. 1.

So in Illinois by several cases the same doctrine is fairly established. Thus in Smith v. Smith, 63 Ill. 496, it is held that by-laws being private and accessible only to the officers of the corporation, are not constructive notice to other persons, and, therefore, a by-law requiring that the secretary should counter-sign a deed of the corporation was held not to make such signature absolutely necessary to the validity of the deed.

So in Wait v. Smith, 92 Ill. 385, a stranger to a railroad company was held not bound to know its by-laws as to the power of officers to create obligations, and that his subsequent membership in the company did not have any retroactive effect in making the by-laws constructive notice.

Again, in Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. White, 106 Ill. 67, third persons are held not bound to know of a by-law limiting the apparent power of the president of a foreign corporation acting as its general agent.

In South Carolina the same doctrine is adopted not only in the main case but in the case of Walker

If the alleged by-law could not affect plaintiff's right to recover, it is clear that there was no error in excluding it.

Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 616.

McIver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question made by this appeal is whether his honor Judge Izlar, erred in ruling certain testimony offered by defendant (appellant) to be incompetent. For a proper understanding of this question it will be necessary to make a brief statement of the nature of the action and of the testimony adduced by the plaintiff to sustain his claim. In the second paragraph of the complaint the plaintiff alleges substantially that on the 23d July, 1891, he was employed by the defendant as agent, by the year, at a salary of $1,800 per year, payable monthly. In the third paragraph the allegation substantially is that on the day named plaintiff entered upon his duties, and duly discharged the same until the 18th of November, 1891, and was then, and always thereafter until the 23d July, 1892, ready and willing to perform said duties; fourth, that on the 18th of November, 1891, the defendant refused, and continues to refuse, to allow plaintiff to discharge the duties of his employment; and judgment is demanded for the balance due him on his salary up to the 23d July, 1892. In the answer, defendant denies the allegations contained in the second and third paragraphs of the complaint; and in answer to the fourth paragraph of the complaint defendant says that the employment of defendant was duly terminated on the 1st of December, 1891. So that the only issue was whether plaintiff was employed by the year, and entitled to his salary up to the end of the year terminating on the 23d of July, 1892. The plaintiff, without objection, offered testimony tending to show that he was employed by Gaddis, the general manager of the defendant company, on the 23d of July, 1890, by the year, to serve the company as agent, at the salary stated in the complaint; that he continued in such employment up to the 19th of November, 1891, when the defendant company refused to allow him to continue such service; that on the 20th of October, 1891, one Swanitz, who seems to have been the consulting engineer of the company, asked plaintiff for his resignation, which he declined to give; that a few days after Swanitz offered to employ plaintiff as bookkeeper at a salary of $75 per month if he would resign his position as agent, which was likewise declined; that on the 31st October, 1891, plaintiff was formally notified in writing, signed by the vice-president of the company, and countersigned by said Swanitz, as consulting engineer, that he was discharged for cause; that Gaddis, who appointed plaintiff as agent, when applied to to become the general manager of the company, by a letter from the president of the company, writ-

v. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co., 26 S. C. 80, where the regulation of a corporation forbidding agents to make contracts except in writing, signed by the president of the company, was held not binding on persons who had no notice thereof, to defeat the purchase by a railroad road-master of material needed for the road.

In Missouri also, a similar by-law of a manufacturing company limiting the power of its officers to buy property costing more than $25, without authority of the board of directors, was held not binding on a vendor of goods used in the business, who had no notice of the by-law. TenBroek v. Winn Boiler Compound Co. 20 Mo. App. 19.

So in Colorado a by-law forbidding the contracting of any debt except by order of the board of directors is held not to bind a person who is not a member of the corporation, and who has no notice of the by-law. Arapahoe Cattle & Land Co. v. Stevens, 18 Colo. 534. This was a case where compensation was claimed for services in procuring the loan of money to the corporation that was used to pay on a purchase of property which the president and secretary of the company, who employed the services, had power to make. Although the court considers that the by-law does not necessarily apply, it states the general rule that persons who are not members of a corporation are not bound by a by-law of which they have no notice.

The failure to comply with the by-law in calling a meeting of the board of directors of a corporation will not defeat a deed of trust made at such meeting to a third person. Samuel v. Holladay, 1 Woolw. C. C. 400, McCahon, 214.

And where a corporation has accepted the benefits of a purchase with knowledge of the facts, it cannot set up in defense of a claim for the purchase price, that it had been made in violation of a by-law prohibiting such purchase without authority of the board. Donovan v. Halsey Fire Engine Co. 58 Mich. 38. In such a case as this, the court clearly regards the subsequent ratification as sufficient to create an implied assumpsit, irrespective of the validity of the purchase in the first place.

But while the above cases agree in doctrine and establish the law in their respective jurisdictions, some Virginia and New York cases have been regarded as establishing the directly contrary doctrine. Thus in Bocock v. Alleghany Coal & Iron Co., 82 Va. 913, it is declared that a person dealing with a corporation through an agent is bound to take notice of its charter and by-laws and ways of doing business.

So in Haden v. Farmers & Mechanics F. Asso., 80 Va. 691, it is said that a person must take notice of the charter, constitution, and by-laws of a corporation with which he makes a contract.

But in each of these cases the decision was in effect as to the power of an agent, and did not particularly involve the effect of a by-law limiting the apparent and usual power of such agent. That is, the cases in reality only decided, on this point, that a valid contract cannot be made by an agent of a corporation in excess of his authority. They do not involve or decide the question as to the effect of a corporate by-law to cut down or limit the power which the agent would ordinarily possess.

The more serious opposition to the doctrine of the cases above cited, which deny that a by-law is a notice to strangers, is found in a series of New York cases which have been largely cited in support of the opposite doctrine. The leading case among them was that of Adrian v. Roome, 52 Barb. 411, which declared that there was no grant of power in the name by which an officer was designated, especially when the authority of the officer was specified in the by-laws.

The same proposition was declared in Dabney v. Stevens, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 39, the former case applying the rule to the superintendent of a manufacturing company, and the latter to the president of such a company, holding that the powers of ten from New York, where the office of the company seems to have been located, was told in said letter, among other things: "You are to have absolute charge there," and in a short time afterwards he received his appointment in writing, signed, "East Shore Terminal Company, by Geo. A. Evans, President." After this testimony, and other, which it is not deemed necessary to state, was offered, the plaintiff closed, and the defendant, in offering its testimony, which is not set out in the "case," offered in evidence the by-laws of the East Shore Terminal Company, "to prove that no officer of the company, except the board of directors, was authorized to make contracts for service for the period of a year." To the evidence thus offered plaintiff's counsel objected, and the court sustained the objection, to which ruling defendant duly excepted, and the only question is as to the correctness of such ruling.

It seems to be conceded in the argument of counsel for appellant that a stranger in dealing with a corporation is not bound to inquire into the by-laws of such corporation in order to ascertain whether the officer or agent with whom he is dealing has authority to act; but whether conceded or not, the case of Walker v. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co., 26 S. C. 50, is sufficient authority to sustain that proposition, for as was said in that case: "Now, it is well settled that a corporation may contract and be contracted with through an agent, whose authority may be implied from facts and circumstances showing recognition or ratification by the corporation. Indeed, it seems that the same presumptions are applicable, in this respect, to corporations as to natural persons." See, also, to same effect, McCreery v. Garvin, 89 S. C. 375, likewise cited by counsel for respondents. But it is contended that the plaintiff here is not a stranger, but is an employé of the company, and therefore bound to take notice of the by-laws of the company. While it may be quite true that the plaintiff is not now a stranger, yet he certainly was so when he entered into the contract upon which this action was based, with the general manager of the company, who, when he was appointed, was told by the president of the company, "You are to have absolute charge there," and who, therefore, plaintiff had a right to assume, was invested with full authority in the premises. And when to this are added the facts that the plaintiff entered upon the work for which he was employed, and continued to discharge the duties of his office for more than a year without any demur or complaint upon the part of the company or any of its officers or agents, until after a considerable portion of the second year had elapsed; and when the company, by its such officers were limited by the by-laws, even in respect to their dealings with third persons who had no notice of the by-law.

The same doctrine in substance is declared in DeBost v. Albert-Palmer Co. 85 Hun, 886; Risley v. Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. 1 Hun, 202; Smith v. Co-operative Dress Assn. 12 Daly, 304; Westerfield v. Radde, 7 Daly, 326; Bohm v. Loewer's Gambrinus Brew. Co. 80 N. Y. S. R. 424; Rathburn v. Snow, 22 N. Y. S. R. 227.—all of which adopt in substance the rule that the powers of corporate officers and agents are limited by the by-laws, even as to third persons without notice of the by-laws.

In Bohm v. Loewers Gambrinus Brew. Co., supra, a by-law requiring that every contract of $500 or more must be in writing, executed by both president and treasurer, and attested by the seal of the corporation, was held effectual to defeat a lease in which the rent agreed upon was more than $500, and which was signed by the president alone without seal. The court held that the lessor was chargeable with notice of the by-law.

So in Rathburn v. Snow, supra, a by-law to the effect that no debts or obligations should be contracted by any officer or agent, unless by express authority given by a majority of a board of trustees at a meeting, was held binding on one who made a sale to the superintendent of the company, where he had not been expressly authorized in this manner.

But all these New York cases were decided by courts whose decisions were subject to review in the court of appeals; and on appeal from the decision in Rathburn v. Snow, supra, the court of appeals, in 10 L. R. A. 355, 123 N. Y. 343, fully adopted the contrary doctrine. It said: "By-laws of business corporations are, as to third persons, private regulations, binding as between the corporation and its members or third persons, having knowledge of them, but of no force as limitations, per se, as to third persons of an authority which, except for the by-laws, would be construed as within the apparent scope of the agency." The 25 L. R. A.

court made no reference to the contrary decisions of the lower courts of the state, and did not intimate that the question was doubtful or disputed, but cited in support of the proposition above quoted the case of Fay v. Noble, 12 Cush. 1, and other authorities.

This decision substantially secures unanimity of doctrine on this subject, as the Virginia cases above referred to do not really decide anything to the contrary, and it may be presumed that no court will hereafter hold that private by-laws of a corporation are notice to strangers, unless it does so on the supposed authority of cases which are now overruled.

In the case of Martin v. Niagara Falls Paper Mfg. Co., 44 Hun, 132, a by-law providing that the secretary should sign all contracts of the corporation was construed to be a designation of his powers, and not to make his signature an absolute condition of the validity of a contract by the corporation.

Again, in Marine Bank of Buffalo v. Butler Colliery Co., 23 N. Y. S. R. 818, where a by-law, never published to the world, had been habitually disregarded by the corporation, the court held that it could not set up the by-law to countervail authority which had been publicly conferred by letter.

The by-law of a bridge company as to a penalty for fast riding or driving, which had not been posted on the bridge, as required by statute, was held not binding on any person who had not actual notice of it. Worcester v. Essex Merrimac Bridge Corp. 7 Gray, 457.

So it was considered by the court but not actually decided, that a by-law of a railroad company, as to liability for baggage, would not bind the passenger without notice, or posting of the by-law at stations. Great Western R. Co. v. Goodman, 11 Eng. L. & Eq. 546, 16 Jur. 862.

The fact that a savings bank depositor could not read a rule of the company printed in its pass-book was held not to defeat its effect as notice to him. Burrill v. Dollar Sav. Bank, 92 Pa. 124, 38 Am. Rep. 600.

attempt to obtain from the plaintiff the resignation of his office, and by its threat of discharge for cause, had thereby practically recognized the legality of the appointment made by the general manager (for it would be absurd to ask for the resignation of an office which had never been conferred, or to discharge for cause a person from an office which he never held), it seems to us that it is too late now for the company to attempt to shield itself from the performance of a contract made by its general manager with a subordinate official, who was apparently invested with the authority to act for the company,—“You are to have absolute charge there,” by interposing a provision in its by-laws, which had never been communicated to the general manager or to the plaintiff, forbidding the making of such contract. We think, therefore, that there was no error on the part of the circuit judge in refusing to admit the by-laws as testimony in this case. We are not prepared to admit that the by-laws of a corporation, which have never been published or communicated to its subordinate officers or employes, are competent evidence against such subordinates in any case. The by-laws of a corporation are usually in the possession and under the control of the corporation, and, until proper measures are taken to inform the subordinates and employes of their contents, we do not see how they can be held bound by provisions of the by-laws, of which they have never been informed.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

TEXAS & PACIFIC R. CO., Appt.,
v.

Nancy J. GAY et al.

(88 Tex. 571.)

1. A circuit court of the United States in Louisiana has no jurisdiction over property in Texas such as confers upon it power to appoint a receiver of a railroad in Texas which is the property of a corporation created by congress.
2. A person appointed receiver of a railroad by a court without jurisdiction, if permitted by the railroad company to take possession and operate the road, is merely the agent of the company which is liable for his negligence.
3. A statute declaring that no receiver shall be appointed on petition of the owner of the property is but a legislative declaration of the rule of equity.
4. A railroad receiver appointed by collusion of the parties to the suit is no more than an agent or superintendent of the railroad company for whose acts the company is liable, although the law would not have made the company liable for his acts if he had been lawfully appointed.
5. No estoppel against showing that a receiver was really the agent of a railroad company because collusively appointed is created, so as to prevent charging the railroad company with his negligence by making a contract of employment with him as receiver.
6. Fraudulent concealment of a cause of action takes the case out of the bar of the statutes of limitation unless plaintiff's failure to discover the facts is due to his negligence.
7. Failure to state the law on an issue is not ground for reversal if no instruction on that question is requested.

QUESTIONS CERTIFIED by the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District for the opinion of the Supreme Court which arose upon appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiff's intestate. Answers returned favorable to appellees.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Finch & Thompson and Stedman & Thompson for appellant.

Messrs. Ball, Wynne & McCart for appellees.

Stayton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the wife and minor child of John M. Gay to recover from John C. Brown, as receiver for the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, damages for an injury received by him while in employment of the receiver, which resulted in his death. At the time the action was brought, John C. Brown was operating the Texas & Pacific Railway as receiver under appointment made by the circuit court of the United States sitting for the eastern district of the state of Louisiana, but pending the litigation the receiver was discharged. After the discharge of the receiver with pleadings setting up that fact, a judgment was rendered against him which, on appeal, was reversed. Brown v. Gay, 76 Tex. 444. After this the pleadings were amended, and thereby the Texas & Pacific Railway Company was made a defendant, but this did not occur until more than one year had elapsed after the death of John M. Gay. The pleadings show a state of facts which would have entitled John M. Gay to have maintained his action against the railway company for the injury had he lived; but, as it has been held that actions for injuries resulting in death could not be the jurisdiction of the court appointing him, see note to Re Schuyler's Steam Tow-Boat Co. (N. Y.) 20 L. R. A. 291.

NOTE.—Annotation could add little to the value of the above opinion upon the question of the jurisdiction of United States circuit courts. That the powers of a receiver are ordinarily limited to 25 L. R. A.

maintained against receivers under the law as it was when the injury and death in question occurred, questions have been certified to this court under pleadings and a judgment against the railway company which make them pertinent. The questions will be considered in their order:

"First. Did the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana have jurisdiction to take possession, through a receiver, of that part of the road situated in the state and northern district of Texas?" The Texas Pacific Railroad Company was chartered by an Act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, by which it was "empowered to lay out, locate, construct, furnish, maintain, and enjoy a continuous railroad and telegraph line, with the appurtenances, from a point at or near Marshall, county of Harrison, state of Texas; thence by the most direct and eligible route, to be determined by said company, near the thirty-second parallel of north latitude, to a point at or near El Paso; thence by the most direct and eligible route, to be selected by said company, through New Mexico and Arizona to a point on the Rio Colorado, at or near the southeastern boundary of the state of California; thence by the most direct and eligible route to San Diego, California, to Ship's channel, in the Bay of San Diego, in the state of California." Act 1871, § 1. By the fourth section of the Act the company was empowered "to purchase the stock, land grants, franchises and appurtenances of, and consolidate on such terms as may be agreed upon between the parties, with any railroad company or companies heretofore chartered by congressional, state or territorial authority, on the route prescribed in the first section of this Act." The ninth section of the Act provided for a grant of lands to the company for so much of its road as was to be constructed through the territories of the United States and the state of California. The twenty-second section of the Act provided "that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, chartered by the state of Louisiana, shall have the right to connect, by the most eligible route to be selected by said company, with the said Texas Pacific Railroad at its eastern terminus, and shall have the right-of-way through the public lands to the same extent granted hereby to the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and in aid of its construction from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, thence by way of Alexandria in said state to connect with the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company at its eastern terminus, there is hereby granted to said company, its successors and assigns, the same number of alternate sections of public lands per mile in the state of Louisiana, as are by this act granted in the state of California to said Texas Pacific Railroad Company." The seventeenth section of the Act required the construction of the road to commence "simultaneously at San Diego in the state of California and from a point at or near Marshall, Texas, as hereinbefore described, and so prosecute the same as to have at least fifty consecutive miles of railroad from each of said points complete and in running order within two years after the passage of this act; and to so continue to construct each year thereafter a sufficient number of miles to secure the completion of the whole line from the aforesaid point on the eastern boundary of the state of Texas to the Bay of San Diego, in the state of California, as aforesaid, within ten years after the passage of this act." Congress passed a supplementary act, which was approved on May 2, 1872, and the first section of that changed the name of the corporation to the "Texas & Pacific Railway Company." The fifth section declared "that the said Texas & Pacific Railway Company shall commence the construction of its road at or near Marshall, Texas, and proceed with its construction under the original act and this supplement, or in pursuance of the authority derived from any consolidation as aforesaid, westerly from a point near Marshall, and towards San Diego in the state of California, on the line authorized by the original act, and so prosecute the same as to have at least one hundred consecutive miles of railroad from said point complete and in running order within two years after the passage of this act; and so continue to construct each year thereafter, a sufficient number of miles, not less than one hundred, to secure the completion of the whole line, from the aforesaid point on the eastern boundary of the state of Texas to the Bay of San Diego in the state of California, as aforesaid, within ten years after the passage of this act; and the said road from Marshall, Texas, throughout the length thereof, shall be of uniform gauge." After providing for construction from San Diego eastward, the section contains the following: "Provided, that said Texas & Pacific Railway Company shall be and is hereby authorized and required to construct, maintain, control and operate a road between Marshall, Texas, and Shreveport, Louisiana, or control and operate any existing road between said points of the same gauge as the said Texas & Pacific Railroad; and that all roads terminating at Shreveport shall have the right to make the same running connections, and shall be entitled to the same privileges for the transaction of business in connection with the said Texas & Pacific Railway as are granted to roads intersecting therewith: provided further, that nothing herein shall be construed as changing the terminus of said Texas & Pacific Railway from Marshall as provided in the original act." The Southern Pacific Railroad Company was chartered by the laws of this state, and was empowered to construct, own, and operate a railway from the eastern boundary of Texas to El Paso. Special Laws 1852, p. 197; Special Laws 1856, p. 76; Special Laws 1860, p. 180. The Southern Transcontinental Railway Company was also chartered under the laws of this state, and empowered to construct a railway from a point on the eastern boundary of Texas to its western boundary. Special Laws 1870, p. 40; Special Laws 1871, p. 92. These corporations were authorized to consolidate with the Texas & Pacific Railway Company. Special Laws 1871, p. 489. Under this, and the act of congress before referred to, the consolidation of these roads was effected, and congress, by an act approved June 22, 1874, ratified the consolidation, and declared that the "roads so merged as aforesaid shall for that and all other purposes be deemed and taken to be a part of the said Texas & Pacific Railway, and shall hereafter be subject to all the provisions and limitations of the act of congress incorporating said company and of the supplement thereto."

These are the laws under and by virtue of which the Texas & Pacific Railway Company exists, and it is evident from these that the eastern terminus of that road is at the eastern line of the state of Texas, and that no part of it is in the state of Louisiana. It is true that the supplementary act, as well as the original, contemplated that, through some other road, connection between the terminus of the Texas & Pacific Railway and Shreveport, in the state of Louisiana, should be made, and to that end the later act required that company to make such a connection through a good road to be built, controlled, and operated by it, or by some existing road between those points of which it might be able to obtain control; but that act expressly declares that "nothing herein shall be construed as changing the terminus of said Texas & Pacific Railway from Marshall, as provided in the original act." Both acts proceed upon the seeming assumption that the town of Marshall was at the eastern boundary of the state of Texas; but in view of the questions submitted it is immaterial whether the terminus be at one place or the other, for they are both in this state. The original act evidently contemplated that there would be a connection between the eastern terminus of the Texas & Pacific Railway and the Mississippi river, through the New Orleans, Baton Rouge & Vicksburg Railroad, and to that end, and to secure that, provided for a grant to that company of public lands situated in Louisiana, but no grant of public lands was contemplated for any road the Texas & Pacific Railway Company might construct from its eastern terminus to Shreveport. Congress had power to authorize the Texas & Pacific Railway Company to construct a railway other than that which it declared should be the Texas & Pacific Railway, and to operate and control it, and at the same time to declare that the one should not be part of the other. Where the terminus of a railway is, under the terms of its charter, there it necessarily exists, in fact as well as in law, and the fact that the company may be authorized to construct and operate a railway beyond that terminus cannot make the two one. A case is not presented in which one railway, under the terms of its charter, extends through or into two or more states, in one of which a receiver over the entire road was appointed by a court sitting in a state in which part of the road was; but the case is one in which a receiver was appointed by a circuit court of the United States sitting in and for the eastern district of Louisiana, to take possession of, operate, and control a railway, no part of which was in the state of Louisiana. The appointment of a receiver by a court of general jurisdiction ought to be held conclusive of the power of the court to make the appointment when that is called in question collaterally, unless it appears that in the particular case the court was without jurisdiction. Jurisdiction must depend on the laws creating the court and prescribing its powers, and, if it attempts to exercise a power not thus conferred, its judgments and decrees are not binding, even upon parties, and may be declared inoperative by any other tribunal in which effect is sought to be given to them. If the fact on which jurisdiction depends is determined by law, then resort to presumptions ordinarily indulged in favor of the power of a court of general jurisdiction which has assumed to act in a given case is neither necessary nor admissible. In the matter now under consideration it appears, through a positive law creating the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and fixing the locality of its road, that no part of that extends into the state of Louisiana; and the inquiry is presented whether the circuit court of the United States, sitting in a district in that state, has jurisdiction to appoint a receiver with power to take possession of a railway situated in this state, and to control and operate it under its orders. The importance of avoiding conflict between the courts of the United States and the state courts cannot be over-estimated; but such harmony as should exist between them will be most surely preserved if strict regard by each for its own jurisdiction be observed, for usurpation of power by either will necessarily bring conflict. Where one has assumed the power to act in a given case, every lawful presumption that it did not act without jurisdiction ought to be indulged; but, when it is clear that either has acted without lawful power, the other, when called upon to adjudicate the rights of litigants, cannot refuse to make inquiry, even as to jurisdiction of the other, when this becomes necessary to the determination of the question before it, without surrendering power conferred upon them for the preservation of the rights of litigants before them.

For present purposes it will be assumed that the Texas & Pacific Railway Company exists by reason of its incorporation by acts of congress, and that this is not affected by reason of its consolidation with corporations created under the laws of this state and the acquisition of rights through consolidation. The Texas & Pacific Railway Company having been incorporated by acts of congress, it is probably true that the circuit courts of the United States would not have jurisdiction of controversies between it and others on the ground of diverse citizenship. Hopburn v. Ellzey, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 445, 2 L. ed. 332; New Orleans v. Winter, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 91, 4 L. ed. 44. It has, however, been held, in effect, that such courts have jurisdiction over litigation to which such corporations are parties, on the ground that they were so chartered, and without reference to the character of the questions on which the rights of litigants may depend. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Kirk, 115 U. S. 2, 29 L. ed. 819. In a case in which such a corporation is a party, jurisdiction of a circuit court of the United States ought to be presumed, if the action be not one local in its nature, or the relief sought, in whole or in part, be not such as can be given only by a court sitting where property is situated, through which the court's judgment may be enforced. The purpose for which the suit was brought in Louisiana by the Missouri Pacific Railway Company against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company is not fully set out in the statements made in connection with the questions certified; but it appears therefrom to have been such in form as it should be presumed made it proper for some court to appoint a receiver with power to take possession of the railway and property necessary to its operation belonging to the latter, and these to control and operate under its orders. Under circumstances somewhat various, receivers may be appointed, but this can never be lawfully done unless deemed necessary for the preservation of property, the preservation or enforcement of rights of persons having claims against it, or to have it applied to some lawful purpose from which it has been, or is likely to be, diverted if the court does not take possession of it through a receiver, and so cause it to be applied or managed as may be deemed by the court most beneficial to all persons interested, having due regard for fixed rights. The intention of congress, as a general rule, to limit the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States to powers and things within the district in which the court sits, as well as to restrict their process, whether original or final, to the same territory, is manifested by several statutes. It is provided that, "except in the cases provided for in the next three sections, no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another, in any civil action before a circuit or district court; and except in the said cases provided by the preceding sections, no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against an inhabitant of the United States by any original process, in any other district than that of which he is an inhabitant or in which he is found at the time of serving the writ." Rev. Stat. § 739. That was amended by the Act of congress approved March 3, 1887, which was corrected by the Act approved August 13, 1888; and the amendment, without changing the other parts of the statute, withdraws the right to maintain an action in a district in which a defendant is found at the time of serving the writ, and adds that, "when the jurisdiction is founded only on the fact that the action is between citizens of different states, suit may be brought only in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or the defendant." This statute furnishes now the general rule. The exceptions referred to are as follows: "When a state contains more than one district, every suit not of local nature in the circuit or district courts thereof, against a single defendant, inhabitant of such state, must be brought in the district where he resides; but if there are two or more defendants, residing in different districts of the state, it may be brought in either district, and a duplicate writ may be issued against the defendants, directed to the marshal of any other district in which any defendant resides." The section further provides that on "judgment or decree rendered therein execution may be issued directed to the marshal of any district in the same state." Rev. Stat. § 740. "In suits of a local nature, where the defendant resides in a different district, in the same state, from that in which the suit is brought, the plaintiff may have original and final process against him, directed to the marshal of the district in which he resides." Id. § 741. "Any suit of a local nature, at law or in equity, where the land or other subject-matter of a fixed character lies partly in one district and partly in another, within the same state, may be brought in the circuit or district court of either district; and the court in which it is brought shall have jurisdiction to hear and decide it, and to cause mesne or final process to be issued and executed, as fully as if the said subject-matter were wholly within the district for which such court is constituted." Id. § 742.

These laws are, in express terms, made applicable only to circuit or district courts sitting in different districts in the same state, and have no application whatever either to jurisdiction or process of a circuit court sitting in one state, in reference to persons or property situated in another state. Circuit courts of the United States having only such jurisdiction as congress has conferred upon them, those statutes bear evidence of a broad recognition by congress, not only of the impropriety of permitting the adjudication of rights to or in reference to property situated in one state by a court sitting in another, but also of the propriety of having the rights of citizens adjudicated by courts sitting in the states of which they are citizens or inhabitants. The act of congress further provides that "when any defendant in a suit in equity to enforce any legal or equitable lien or claim against real or personal property within the district where the suit is brought is not an inhabitant or not found within said district, and does not voluntarily appear thereto, it shall be lawful for the court to make an order directing such absent defendant to appear, plead, answer or demur to the complainant's bill at a certain day, therein to be designated; and the said order shall be served on such absent defendant, if practicable, wherever found, or, when such personal service is not practicable, shall be published in such manner as the court shall direct." Rev. Stat. § 738. The statute further provides that under such citation the court may adjudicate the pending matter, but that "the said adjudication shall, as regards such absent defendant without appearance, affect his property within such district only." The proceeding here contemplated is essentially one in rem, and might frequently be applicable in cases in which appointment of a receiver would be proper, or even necessary; and it authorizes the process of the court to run beyond the district, or even beyond the state, in which the court is suing it sits, for the sole purpose of giving notice to a defendant. The act last referred to was amended by an Act approved March 8, 1876, whereby the same rule was also made applicable to suits "to remove any incumbrance or lien or cloud upon the title to real or personal property within the district where such suit is brought;" and it further provided, "when a part of the said real or personal property against which such proceedings shall be taken shall be within another district but within the same state, suit may be brought in either district in said state." This law, however, applies only to courts sitting in a district in which the property is wholly or partly situated, against which some claim specified in the act is asserted, and would not authorize the maintenance of such a suit or such use of process where the property, real or personal, is situated partly in one and partly in another district, unless both districts be in the same state. Here we have a broad recognition of the rule that property, whether real or personal, can be affected only by judgments or decrees of courts sitting within the state in which the property is situated; that jurisdiction over that as well as over the litigants is essential; and that the former can exist only by reason of the fact that the property is situated within the territory over which the court is given jurisdiction, and the latter by service of process made in the manner prescribed by law. If there be any other act of congress under which, in litigation between persons, or between them and corporations, the process of a circuit court of the United States is authorized to run beyond the limits of the state in which the court is authorized to sit, attention has not been called to it. By an Act approved March 8, 1881, two judicial districts were created in the state of Louisiana, and the courts for the eastern district were thereby required to be held in New Orleans, while those for the western district were required to be held at four places named in the act, one of which was Shreveport. That act recognizes the fact that all suits of a local nature must be brought in the district in which the thing to which it relates is situated, and secures to every inhabitant of that state, who is a sole defendant, exemption from suit in a district other than that in which he resides. By Acts of August 8, 1888, the districts in Louisiana were subdivided, and, in cases in which there are defendants residing in different divisions, process is authorized to reach them; and, while these statutes have no direct bearing on the question presented, they show that congress deemed it necessary, even in such cases, to authorize process to run beyond the division in which the court issuing it sat. The rule that ordinarily a receiver, appointed by a court having jurisdiction to make the appointment, is an officer of that court, having only such power as the order of the court, under the general principles of law and due course of procedure, may confer upon him, or such as may be conferred upon him by statute; that his possession is the possession of the court, and property thus placed in his hands is in custodia legis,—is so fully recognized that citation of authorities in support of the rule seems unnecessary. Prominent among the decisions so holding is the case of Booth v. Clark, 58 U. S. 17 How. 381, 15 L. ed. 167, and Davis v. Gray, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 217, 21 L. ed. 452. From these considerations it must follow that a court cannot confer upon a receiver power outside of the territory over which it has jurisdiction, for its process cannot be effective beyond that, unless authorized by statute to reach to other territory within the limits of the country to which the court belongs; and, where the process of a court cannot go and be entitled to enforcement and respect, its officers cannot have power. Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 56 U. S. 15 How. 242, 14 L. ed. 678; Ableman v. Booth, 62 U. S. 21 How. 524, 16 L. ed. 176; Toland v. Sprague, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 328, 9 L. ed. 1104; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; Harkness v. Hyde, 98 U. S. 476, 25 L. ed. 287. In Ableman v. Booth it was truly said that "no judicial process, whatever form it may assume, can have any lawful authority outside of the limits of the jurisdiction of the court or judge by whom it is issued; and an attempt to enforce it beyond these boundaries is nothing less than lawless violence." Whether want of jurisdiction arises from the fact that the thing to be effected by judgment and process of a court is without its territorial jurisdiction, or without its jurisdiction for any other reason, is unimportant, for in either case the process is invalid because the court has not jurisdiction.

This brings us to the inquiry whether the circuit court for the United States, sitting in and for a district in the state of Louisiana, had jurisdiction to appoint a receiver, and through him to take possession and control of a railway, no part of which was in the state or district in which the court was authorized to sit, but of which a part, at least, was in this state. Such an inquiry must be determined by the laws of the United States creating circuit courts and determining their jurisdiction; and, without making further particular reference to the statutes regulating that matter, the decisions of the supreme court of the United States bearing on that question will be briefly noticed. As before said, the jurisdiction of that court over an action, transitory or personal in its nature, between the two railroad corporations, will be conceded, for if the defendant in that suit could not, for any reason, have been compelled to appear in that court, that was a matter it might waive. In Toland v. Sprague, supra, it was said: "The judiciary act has divided the United States into judicial districts. Within those districts, a circuit court is required to be holden. The circuit court of each district sits within and for that district, and is bound by its local limits. Whatever may be the extent of their jurisdiction over the subject-matter of suits in respect to persons and property, it can only be exercised within the limits of the district. Congress might have authorized civil process from any circuit court to have run into any state of the Union. It has not done so. It has not in terms authorized any original civil process to run into any other district, with the single exception of subpenas for witnesses within a limited distance. In regard to final process, there are two cases, and two only, in which writs of execution can now by law be served in any other district than that in which the judgment is rendered,—one in favor of private persons in another district of the same state, and the other in favor of the United States in any part of the United States. We think that the opinion of the legislature is thus manifested to be that the process of a circuit court cannot be served without the district in which it is established, without the special authority of law therefor." In Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 56 U. S. 15 How. 238, 14 L. ed. 674, it appeared that a railway company in Michigan, incorporated under the laws of that state, made an agreement with a railway company in, and incorporated by the laws of, Indiana, whereby the latter agreed that the former might build and operate a road in Indiana under the charter of the latter. Another railway company, also established by the law of Indiana, claimed the exclusive right to construct and operate a road in that part of Indiana, and it brought a suit in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Michigan against the Michigan road, in which injunction was sought to restrain that company from constructing a road under the contract, in violation of the exclusive right claimed by the plaintiff. In disposing of the case the court said: "In this case we shall consider the question of jurisdiction in regard to the district only. In all cases of contract, suit may be brought in the circuit court where the defendant may be found. If sued out of the district in which he lives, under the decisions he may object, but this is a privilege which he may waive. Whenever the jurisdiction of the person will enable the circuit court to give effect to its judgment or decree, jurisdiction may be exercised. But whenever the subject-matter in controversy is local, and lies beyond the limit of the district, no jurisdiction attaches to the circuit court sitting within it. An action of ejectment cannot be maintained in the district of Michigan, for land in any other district. Nor can an action of trespass quare clausum fregit be prosecuted, where the act complained of was not done in the district. Both of these actions are local in their character, and must be prosecuted where the process of the court can reach the locus in quo." It was insisted in that case, as in others which will be hereafter considered, that the court having jurisdiction of the persons could enforce its judgment by acting upon them, which would seem to be true, as injunction only was sought, if there was no other obstacle to the exercise of such jurisdiction; but, after indicating the class of cases in which the court could thus enforce its judgments, the court said: "It will readily be admitted that no action at law could be sustained in the district of Michigan, on such ground, for injuries done in Indiana. No action of ejectment or for trespass on real property could have a more decided local character than the appropriate remedy for the injuries complained of. And is this character changed by a bill in chancery? By such a procedure we acquire jurisdiction of the defendants; but, the subject-matter being local, it cannot be reached by a chancery jurisdiction exercised in the state of Michigan." A suit was brought in the circuit court for a district in Tennessee to cancel a contract for the sale of land in Mississippi, to recover money paid on the contract, and to enjoin the adverse party from enforcing it. The relief asked was granted, but the court attempted to establish a lien on the land in Mississippi, and directed it to be sold by persons acting under its appointment, to satisfy the judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff; but on appeal it was held that "the court had no jurisdiction to decree a sale to be made of land lying in another state, by a master acting under its own authority," and that it had no power to create a lien on the land. Boyce v. Grundy, 84 U. S. 9 Pet. 289, 9 L. ed. 132. In Mississippi & N. R. Co. v. Ward, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 485, 17 L. ed. 311, it was held that a district court of the United States for the district of Iowa had not jurisdiction to abate as a public nuisance a bridge across the Mississippi river, the middle of that stream being the boundary between the states of Iowa and Illinois; and in the course of the opinion it was said: "Congress could extend the jurisdiction of the federal courts across the Mississippi river by enlarging the judicial districts on either side, or it could confer concurrent jurisdiction on adjoining districts, extending to trespassers and torts committed within the shores of the river; but the courts of justice cannot do it unless authorized by an act of congress."

The direct purpose of all judicial action is relief to a litigant, which cannot be given by a judgment or decree alone, but must be given, if at all, through the enforcement of the one or the other by appropriate process; and the highest test of the jurisdiction of a court in a given case is found in the answer to an inquiry whether it has lawful power thus to enforce its judgment or decree. This rule is thus clearly expressed by the court of appeals of Maryland: "It would be an idle thing in chancery to entertain jurisdiction of a matter not within its reach, and make a decree which it could have no power to enforce or to compel a compliance with. And the absence of that very power is a good test by which to try the question of jurisdiction. It would be a solecism to say that the chancellor has jurisdiction to decree in rem, where the thing against which the decree goes, and is alone the subject of and to be operated upon by it, is beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the chancery court, and not subject to its authority, and the decree, if passed, would itself be nugatory for the want of power or jurisdiction to give it effect." White v. White, 7 Gill & J. 210. There are classes of cases, however, in which courts of chancery may, through action on persons over whom they have jurisdiction, indirectly affect title to property, real or personal, situated in a state not within their jurisdiction. Such a jurisdiction, however, is tentative in character, and necessarily precarious, for it depends for effect on obedience of a defendant, and may be defeated if he be unyielding. If, in the exercise of such jurisdiction, a foreign court, by imprisonment or like coercion, should compel a conveyance when, by the laws of the country where the property is, no right to a conveyance existed, then a court of the country having jurisdiction over the property might disregard a conveyance made under such circumstances. An eminent writer thus states the rule which has been recognized: "Where the subject-matter is situated within another state or country, but the parties are within the jurisdiction of the court, any suit may be maintained, and remedy granted, which directly affect and operate upon the person of the defendant, and not upon the subject-matter, although the subject-matter is referred to in the decree, and the defendant is ordered to do or to refrain from certain acts towards it, and it is thus ultimately, but indirectly, affected by the relief granted. As examples of this rule, suits for specific performance of contracts, for the enforcement of express or implied trusts, for relief on the ground of fraud, actual or constructive, for the final accounting and settlement of a partnership, and the like, may be brought in any state where jurisdiction of defendant's person is obtained, although the land or other subject-matter is situated in another state, or even in a foreign country. On the other hand, when the suit is strictly local, the subject-matter is specific property, and the relief, when granted, is such that it must act directly upon the subject-matter, and not upon the persons of the defendant, the jurisdiction must be exercised in the state where the subject-matter is situated." Pom. Eq. Jur. 1318; Whart. Conf. L. 288-293. This rule has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States and by the decisions of the state courts. Massie v. Watts, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 148, 3 L. ed. 181; Caldwell v. Carrington, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 97, 9 L. ed. 64; Watkins v. Holman, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 26, 10 L. ed. 874; Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 56 U. S. 15 How. 243, 14 L. ed. 679; Corbett v. Nutt, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 475, 19 L. ed. 979; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 723, 24 L. ed. 569; Watts v. Waddle, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 389, 8 L. ed. 437; White v. White, 7 Gill & J. 211; Vaughan v. Barclay, 6 Whart. 392. In Watkins v. Holman it was said: "A court of chancery acting in personam may well decree the conveyance of land in any other state, and may enforce its decree by process against the defendant; but neither the decree itself, nor any conveyance under it, except by the person in whom the title is vested, can operate beyond the jurisdiction of the court." The property in controversy in that cause was situated in the state of Alabama, and the owner thereof sold one half of the property, and gave bond to make title, after which, without making title, he died. Administration was taken out on his estate in Massachusetts, and under an act of the legislature of Alabama the administratrix was authorized to sell the real estate situated in that state. The holder of the bond for title brought a suit in the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, praying that court to empower the administratrix to make title to him, in accordance with the bond, and such an order was made and complied with. It was with reference to a deed made under such circumstances that the language above quoted was used. The case of Corbett v. Nutt was one which made it proper to inquire whether the supreme court of the District of Columbia had power to appoint a trustee for land in Virginia in place of a trustee in whom title had vested under a will, that person declining to accept the trust, and, in holding that the court had not such power, the same ruling was made as in Watkins v. Holman. Jurisdiction of courts of equity, even in the classes of cases referred to, exists only when the relief sought is such that it may be given by the act of the persons over whom the court exercises jurisdiction; and it is probably true that no decision made by an English or American court in modern times holds that such jurisdiction exists for the purpose of compelling a person, by conveyance or otherwise, to place property situated in a jurisdiction essentially foreign to it under the control of a court, in order that it may administer it through a receiver or otherwise. The law is thus stated by a distinguished elementary writer: "The claim, to affect foreign lands, must be strictly limited to those cases where the relief decreed can be entirely obtained through the parties' personal obedience. If it went beyond that, the assumption would not only be presumptuous, but ineffectual." Westlake, Private International Law, § 65. That Judge Story, to say the least, doubted the existence of such jurisdiction even with this limitation, is evident. Story, Conf. L. 543-545. This seems necessarily to be a correct limitation of the rule, for otherwise a court in one state would have power to acquire jurisdiction over lands situated in another. If a person be under contractual obligation to convey lands, a court of equity having jurisdiction over his person may compel him to make the necessary conveyance, although the land is in another state; but in such case the decree and process through which it is enforced create no right to the thing, and only enforce the specific right created by the contract. The same jurisdiction may be exercised when land is held in trust, whether this arises from contract, devise, or fraud; but in such cases the court simply compels the person over whom it has jurisdiction to pass to another title to the specific thing on account of a fixed right to it, existing when the suit was brought. If, however, the right or claim which a court in one state attempts to enforce against lands situated in another be one that arises from its decree and execution of its process, then the court is directly acting upon the thing over which it has not jurisdiction, and to such a case the rule cannot be applied. There are a few American cases which seem to hold that jurisdiction to compel a conveyance of land or other property situated in another state exists under facts last stated; and, while they have no direct application to the question certified, they are often cited to sustain the proposition that a court sitting in one state has jurisdiction to appoint a receiver, and through him to take possession of real and personal property situated in another state. They will be briefly considered in view of that fact.

The subject-matter involved in Muller v. Dows, 94 U. S. 444, 24 L. ed. 207, was a continuous line of consolidated railway, situated in the states of Iowa and Missouri, and a circuit court of the United States for a district in Iowa, in foreclosure of a mortgage, directed a sale of the entire road by a master, the mortgagor and trustee, in whom it shows title was vested, being before the court. In the course of the opinion it was said: "It is here undoubtedly a recognized doctrine that a court of equity, sitting in a state and having jurisdiction of the person, may decree a conveyance by him of land in another state, and may enforce the decree by process against the defendant. True, it cannot send its process into that other state, nor can it deliver possession of land in another jurisdiction, but it can command and enforce a transfer of the title. And there seems to be no reason why it cannot, in a proper case, effect the transfer by the agency of the trustees when they are complainants. In McElrath v. Pittsburg & S. R. Co. 55 Pa. 189, a bill for foreclosure of a mortgage, in which it appeared that a railroad company whose road was partly in Pennsylvania and partly in West Virginia had mortgaged all their rights in the whole road, the court decreed that the trustee who had brought the suit, living within its jurisdiction, should sell and convey all the mortgaged property, as well that in the state of West Virginia as that in Pennsylvania. This case is directly in point and tends to justify the decree made in the present case. The mortgagors here were within the jurisdiction of the court. So were the trustees of the mortgage. It was at the instance of the latter that the master was ordered to make the sale. This court might have ordered the trustee to make it. The mortgagors who were foreclosed were enjoined against claiming property after the master's sale, and directed to make a deed to the purchaser in further assurance. And the court can direct the trustee to make a deed to the purchaser in confirmation of the sale." Under similar facts the same ruling was made by the supreme court of errors of Connecticut in Mead v. New York, H. & N. R. Co. 45 Conn. 223.

There are a few legal propositions bearing on the question of the existence of such a jurisdiction to which the courts of the United States and of the several states all assent. One of these is that jurisdiction over real property exists only in the tribunals of the country in which it is situated, and that it cannot be taken possession of or sold under the order, license, or decree of a court having jurisdiction only in another state. Wilkinson v. Leland, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 654, 7 L. ed. 552; Watts v. Waddle, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 400, 8 L. ed. 442; Boyce v. Grundy, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 275, 9 L. ed. 127; Watkins v. Holman, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 26, 10 L. ed. 874; Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 56 U. S. 15 How. 238, 14 L. ed. 674; 25 L. R. A.

Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co. 59 U. S. 18 How. 453, 15 L. ed. 446; Mississippi & M. R. Co. v. Ward, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 485, 17 L. ed. 311; Corbett v. Nutt, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 475, 19 L. ed. 979; Reynolds v. Stockton, 140 U. S. 272, 35 L. ed. 469; Lewis v. Darling, 57 U. S. 16 How. 13, 14 L. ed. 824; Carpenter v. Strange, 141 U. S. 105, 35 L. ed. 647.

A decree foreclosing a mortgage, and the process through which it may be enforced, act upon the mortgaged property directly. The sale, when made, is essentially a judicial sale, which has frequently been declared to be a sale by the court. In Williamson v. Berry, 49 U. S. 8 How. 546, 12 L. ed. 162, a judicial sale was defined to be "one made under the process of a court having competent authority to order it, by an officer legally appointed and commissioned to sell;" and, unless the decree directs otherwise, the usual mode of procedure and the effect of each act are thus stated: "The usual mode of selling property under a decree or order in chancery is a direction that it shall be sold with the approbation of a master in chancery, to whom the execution of the decree in that particular has been confided. It matters not whether the sale is public or private, by a person authorized to make it, but that the approbation of the master in either case completes the title. Before, however, a purchaser can get a title, he must get a report from the master that he approves the sale, or that he was the best bidder, accordingly as the sale may have been made either privately or at auction. The report then becomes the basis of a motion to the court, by the purchaser, that his purchase may be confirmed. Notice of the motion is given to the solicitor in the cause, and confirmation nisi is ordered by the court, to become absolute in a time stated, unless cause is shown against it. Then, unless the purchaser calls for an investigation of the title by the master, it is the master's privilege and duty to draw the title for the purchaser, reciting in it the decree for sale, his approval of it, and the confirmation by the court of the sale, in the manner that such confirmation has been ordered. We have been thus particular for the purpose of showing the office of the master in relation to a sale, and what is meant by subjecting a sale to the approval of a master, and to show that such a sale, until approved by the master and confirmed by the court, gives no title to a purchaser of an estate which he may have bargained to buy." In Blossom v. Milwaukee & O. R. Co., 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 207, 18 L. ed. 46, in which sale under foreclosure of a mortgage came in question, it was said: "It is true that the marshal or master, as the case may be, is the officer of the court, and that as such his acts and proceedings are subject to the revision and control of the court. In sales directed by a court of chancery, says Judge Story, the whole business is transacted by a public officer under the guidance and superintendence of the court itself. Even after the sale is made, it is not final until a report is made to the court, and it is approved and confirmed."

Reference to these matters has been made for the purpose of illustrating the proposition that judicial sales, whether made on foreclosure of mortgage or for some other purpose, are, in effect, sales made by the court directing the sale; and it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the rule asserted in Muller v. Dows, and other cases cited, has no application in any case in which a sale of the thing is necessary before any person can become entitled to have it conveyed to him, for in such cases it is the decree, sale, confirmation, and payment of the purchase money which give the right to the conveyance; and all these for efficacy must depend on the jurisdiction of the court, through its decree and process, to act directly upon the thing. The fact that a person has executed a mortgage does not authorize any court to require him to convey the mortgaged property to the mortgagee or to any other person; nor does the fact that a mortgage gives power to a trustee named in it to sell the mortgaged property on failure of mortgagor to pay the sum so secured authorize him to convey on failure of mortgagor to make such payment; but in either case there must be a sale made under the mortgage before any person can become entitled to a conveyance. A deed is but evidence of a right, and, in case of judicial sales, a valid decree, sale by an authorized person, and confirmation are ordinarily essential to the right of a purchaser to a conveyance. These, and compliance with the terms of sale, create the right to a conveyance, and they can have no legal existence unless the court directing and confirming the sale had jurisdiction. The right of a purchaser at such sales rests on the fact that a sale was made in pursuance of decrees and orders made by a court in the exercise of lawful power over the thing sold, and not upon a prior right to the thing, which the court simply enforces by compelling the adverse party to make a conveyance which he ought to have made without coercion; and there is at least a seeming inconsistency in holding that a court has power to decree a sale of property, cause it to be sold by its own officer acting under its process, and to confirm the sale, but that to perfect the title of the purchaser it is necessary to compel the owner to make a conveyance. No case can arise, unless under exceptional legislation, in which a court having jurisdiction to decree the sale of property, and that to make under its own process, has not power to pass whatever title the defendant has without resort to any aid whatever from him. To lose jurisdiction to decree the sale of land and to sell it, although it be not situated within the territory over which the court has jurisdiction, on the proposition that the court has power, in a different but proper case, to compel a person before it to make a conveyance he is under obligation to make without reference to any action of the court, seems to us illogical, for the powers are not of the same character, nor the one in any respect dependent on the other. One is a power exercised directly on the person over whom the court has jurisdiction, while the other operates, if at all, as directly on the thing not within its jurisdiction; for if the decree directing the sale, and sale made under it, be not given full effect, the purchaser can have no right to a conveyance. Substance, and not form, ought to be regarded. No case can arise in which a court will have power to appoint a receiver unless there be property of which the court may take possession through its receiver; and if the property be immovable, or movable, but so connected with the immovable as are cars or other like property necessary to and used in operating a railway, then the suit in which a receiver to take possession of them may be appointed is necessarily one local in character, for in such case the court operates directly upon the thing. Such a proceeding is not one strictly in rem, but such is its nature; and, under general rules everywhere recognized, such proceedings can be had only where the thing to be taken into possession is within the territory within which the court has power to act. The line between actions termed "local" and "transitory" in some of the decided cases becomes shadowy; but in no case can a suit, the purpose of which is to subject certain property, whether real or personal, to payment of a debt, or to have it placed in possession of and under the control of a court for any purpose of administration, be termed other than a local action. The difference between local and transitory actions was thus stated in case of Mostyn v. Fabrigas, 1 Cowp. 161, by Lord Mansfield: "There is a formal and a substantial distinction as to locality of trials. I state them as different things. The substantial distinction is where the proceeding is in rem, and where the effect of the judgment cannot be had if it be laid in the wrong place. That is the case of all ejectments where the possession is to be delivered by the sheriff of the county; and, as trials in England are in particular counties, the officers are county officers; therefore the judgment could not have effect if the action was not laid in the proper county." It has sometimes been stated that the principles thus announced furnished simply a technical rule in reference to venue, and that they had no bearing on the more substantial question of jurisdiction, but the language of the great judge is not susceptible of such a construction.

The case of British South Africa Co. v. Companhia De Mocambique [1893] App. Cas. 602, decided in the house of lords in the year last past, sets all such questions at rest, so far as the English courts are concerned. The opinion in that case may be read with profit on the question of extraterritorial jurisdiction of the courts of that country, and it is not without value as to the general claim for equity jurisdiction already considered. The principles stated in Mostyn v. Fabrigas, supra, met with the approval of Chief Justice Marshall in Livingston v. Jefferson, 1 Brock. 209, Fed. Cas. No. 8,411; and, in deference to what he understood to be the difference between such actions at common law, he felt constrained to hold that an action of trespass quare clausum fregit was a local action. In Casey v. Adams, 102 U. S. 66, 26 L. ed. 52, there was a fund in reference to which it became necessary to settle priorities between creditors, and a question arose whether this should be done by the court where the fund was, or by a court-sitting in the parish where the national bank to which the fund belonged was situated. The act of congress permitted suits to be maintained against such associations in the county or parish in which the bank was located, and it was contended that the proceeding could be maintained only in that parish. In disposing of the question the court said: "The distinction between local and transitory actions is as old as actions themselves, and no one has ever supposed that laws which prescribe generally where one should be sued included such suits as were local either by statute or the common law, unless it was expressly so declared. Local actions are in the nature of suits in rem, and are to be prosecuted where the thing on which they are founded is situated. . . . The proceeding in this case was local in its nature. It related to property in the parish of La Fourche, which had been seized and sold under process from the district court of that parish."

Under the laws of this state, as well as from the nature of the property itself, a railroad—which includes the right of way, rails, and all other material placed thereon, or on other land used in connection therewith for permanent use, as well as all necessary structures, such as station houses for storage of freight and accommodation of passengers, water tanks, and like structures—must be deemed real estate or immovable property; but the rolling stock and other movable property of such a company is declared by the constitution to be personal property. Const. art. 10, § 4. Under the settled rules of law, can such property be taken possession of by a court having jurisdiction only in another state, if the property be situated in this? Looking to the relation of rolling stock and other movable property necessary to the operation of a railway, and to the public use of the entire property, the same reasons will be seen to apply for holding such property subject to seizure, possession, or sale only by a court having jurisdiction within the territory where the property is situated as apply to the seizure, possession, or sale of immovable property, even if it could be held that the same rule in this respect does not apply to movable as well as to immovable property. Whether the lex rei sitæ or the lex domicilii be applied to the movable property owned and used by the Texas & Pacific Railway Company is unimportant, for under neither was its situs in the state of Louisiana, unless there in fact; and if, in course of railway traffic, some of the movable property belonging to it was in fact in Louisiana when the receiver was appointed, that could not confer on the court making the appointment jurisdiction over property not so situated. The same result would necessarily follow even if, under the act of congress or some law of the state of Louisiana, the railway company had acquired and then possessed, in the state of Louisiana, property, movable or immovable, unless it be the law that ownership and possession of property in one state, with jurisdiction over the person of the owner, is sufficient to confer upon a court, only having jurisdiction therein, power to take possession and control of other property situated in another state. The act of congress, as before seen, in effect declares that the eastern terminus of the Texas & Pacific Railway shall be at Marshall or at the eastern line of this state, and no railway east of that line constitutes a part of that, even though it may be owned and operated by that company. If, however, the Texas & Pacific Railway, as a continuous line under common ownership, extended into the district in which the circuit court making the appointment had jurisdiction, we do not see that, under the acts of congress before referred to, it would have jurisdiction to appoint a receiver, and, through him or otherwise, to take possession of that part of the railway situated in Texas, even if the decision in Muller v. Dows be correct when applied to the facts of that case; for that decision recognizes the law to be that the court "could not send its process into that other state, nor can it deliver possession of land in another jurisdiction." If that court would not have power to place a purchaser in possession, it certainly could not take possession through its receiver or otherwise, for the incapacity, in the one case as in the other, results from the absence of jurisdiction over the property. If it were the ownership of property which gives a court jurisdiction over it, then it would exist whenever the court has jurisdiction over the person of the owner; but, under the acts of congress, jurisdiction over property is not founded on ownership, but on the locality of the property, although ownership may become a controlling fact in settling the rights of parties. This being true, that a part of a connected and entire property may be within the jurisdiction of the court cannot confer upon it jurisdiction to take possession or otherwise deal directly with that part situated in a state within which the court has not jurisdiction. This is illustrated by the case of Mississippi & M. R. Co. v. Ward, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 485, 17 L. ed. 811, and by other cases before referred to. If the railway corporation could have been compelled to convey its property here situated to the court's receiver,—a power which the president and directors of the company, or even its stockholders, could not exercise under the laws of this state,—this would not remove the difficulty as to jurisdiction; for, if the receiver could thus be clothed with title to the property, the disposition of it would rest on the decrees of the court appointing him, for these are the foundation of every judicial sale or disposition of property through a court, when not made on account of an existing right to property through which the person to whom it ought to be conveyed is entitled to it, without reference to the decrees of any court, and the receiver's possession would still be the possession of the court. Let the matter be obscured as it may, in such cases the court acts directly on the property,—sells it if it be sold, conveys it if it be conveyed, and possesses it if it be in any manner placed in the hands of its receiver.

In Moseby v. Burrow, 52 Tex. 396, it appears that a resident of the state of Arkansas brought an action in this state against a corporation in Tennessee whose property there was placed in the hands of a receiver by a chancery court of that state. The corporation had lands here, which were attached, after they had been conveyed to the receiver, under the order of the court that appointed him, by the officer of the corporation to whom the lands had been conveyed in trust for it; and in the action here the receiver asserted right to the land against the attaching creditor. The supreme court of this state refused to recognize his right, or the jurisdiction of the court that appointed him, to affect, in the manner attempted, lands situated in this state, and applied the rules announced in Booth v. Clark, 58 U. S. 17 How. 331, 15 L. ed. 167; and in other cases cited in the opinion. In Morris v. Hand, 70 Tex. 481, it appeared that Hand made a contract with Fox, such as could be specifically enforced, to convey lands in Texas; and, they both being residents of Montgomery county, in the state of New York, Fox obtained a decree from the supreme court of that county, directing Hand to make to him a conveyance or to pay a named sum of money, Hand did not comply with the decree, but was subsequently adjudged insane, and Brown was appointed committee of his estate, and, in pursuance of a decree directing him to do so, Brown conveyed the land to Fox. In a controversy here between the heirs of Hand and a person holding under the conveyance made by Brown, it was held to be "settled, without conflict of authority, that courts of one country or state have no authority, under any circumstances, to direct the title to real estate situated in a foreign state or country, or to direct the sale of such land to be made by any one occupying a fiduciary capacity." The opinion, however, recognized the rule that in proper cases such relief might be given through personal process against the person who had obligated himself to convey. Decisions doubtless may be found in which it was held in England, at an early day, that chancery courts of that country had power to appoint receivers and take possession, through them, of property in Ireland, in the colonies and in countries having no governmental connection with England; but, as said in Booth v. Clark, "orders have been given in the English chancery for receivers to proceed to execute their functions in another jurisdiction, but we are not aware of its ever having been permitted by the tribunals of the east." It would be useless to speculate upon the theories upon which the English courts proceeded in asserting such a jurisdiction; but, so far as we are advised, it has not been asserted or enforced in any recent case, and, except as permitted by acts of parliament, it probably would not be asserted, even within territory part of the British empire outside of England. As early as 1834, such a jurisdiction was denied by an Irish chancery court, which refused even to give to a decree rendered by a chancery court in England such prima facie effect as to permit it to be made the basis of a suit affecting property situated in Ireland, or to carry out its decree appointing a receiver to manage property there. While the opinion of the lord chancellor in the house of lords seemed to assert such jurisdiction in an English chancery court, that high tribunal, on appeal from the decree of the Irish court, remitted the entire case to that court for decision, and directed it to have a receiver appointed. Houlditch v. Donagall, 8 Bligh, N. S. 301. If, however, under the laws of England, chancery courts may exercise such jurisdiction over property situated in any part of the British empire, that would furnish no criterion by which to test the territorial jurisdiction of a circuit court of the United States, which can exist only when and where congress has conferred it. A circuit court of the United States for a district in Louisiana, unless it be conferred by some act of congress, has no greater power over property here than would have any court of Louisiana possessing general equity jurisdiction, and that Texas and Louisiana are in the same circuit is of no importance.

It is true that some of the circuit courts of the United States have asserted power to appoint receivers for continuous lines of railway extending through two or more states, and through them to take possession of such parts of railways as were without the state in which the courts were given jurisdiction; and some reference will be made to the cases, from which it will be seen that their rulings are not harmonious. In Wilmer v. Atlantic & R. Air Line R. Co., 2 Woods, C. C. 417, Fed. Cas. No. 17,775, a receiver was appointed to take possession of a railway belonging to one corporation, extending into or through three states. The appointment was made by a circuit court in Georgia, and its ruling was based on the assumed power of the court, acting upon the owner, to compel submission to its jurisdiction. The only case cited in support of the ruling, other than such as assert the power of courts of equity already considered, was the case of Ellis v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co., 107 Mass. 1, which was a case in which it appears that the supreme court of Massachusetts, on original bill, appointed receivers of a road situated in and incorporated by the laws of that and other states; but no question was raised or considered as to the power of the court to do so, and the receivers were subsequently removed and the railway placed in the hands of trustees, who were entitled to its possession and management under the terms of the mortgage which it was the purpose of the bill to foreclose. While application for appointment of a receiver was pending in case of Wilmer v. Atlantic & R. Air Line R. Co., a court of the state of Georgia appointed a receiver over so much of the road as was in that state, and like steps were taken by circuit courts of the United States in each of the other states through or into which the railroad ran. Application was made to the circuit court sitting in Georgia, by its receiver, for writ of assistance to put him in possession of so much of the road as was in possession of the receiver appointed by the state court; but no such relief seems to have been asked as to other parts of the road, which were in the possession of a receiver appointed in the other states. The application was disposed of by an opinion written by Circuit Justice Bradley, in which it was held that the state court was entitled to possession because its possession was prior, notwithstanding action looking to the appointment of a receiver was first commenced in the circuit court. No question was raised or discussed as to the jurisdiction of the circuit court over so much of the road as was without the state of Georgia, but from the opinion, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the eminent judge did, at least, entertain serious doubts of the power of the circuit court to appoint a receiver over so much of the road as was not in that state. In the case of Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Central Trust Co., a circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Missouri appointed receivers over a railway which ran through the states of Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana, and into the states of Ohio, Michigan, and Iowa, who, under its orders, took possession of the entire road. The bill under which this was done was filed by the railway company, but subsequently the trustee in a general mortgage filed a cross bill asking foreclosure. 22 Fed. Rep. 272. Bills similar to that filed in the court in Missouri seem to have been filed in circuit courts in Illinois, and perhaps in other states, for the purpose of having, as seems to have been usual at the time, the same receivers appointed in each jurisdiction, and this was done; but, as is to be inferred from a case hereafter to be noticed, this was not done for the purpose of having the property situated in Illinois administered by the circuit courts sitting in that state, but for the purpose of giving effect to the appointment made by the circuit court in Missouri. After these transactions occurred, bondholders brought suits in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district in Illinois to foreclose mortgages held to secure the bonds held by them, in which it was asked that the receivers appointed by the circuit court for Missouri should be removed, and some other person appointed. The court entertained jurisdiction over so much of the property as was within the district, removed the receivers theretofore appointed by the circuit court in Missouri, and appointed another, but refused to exercise jurisdiction over so much of the property as was within the same state, but in another district. In disposing of the question the court said "that courts of equity cannot acquire extraterritorial jurisdiction over property by appointing receivers," cited Booth v. Clark as authority, and held that the decision in Muller v. Dows did not justify the procedure of the circuit court for Missouri. Atkins v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 162. The court in Missouri, in effect, rescinded so much of its order as applied to the property over which the court in Illinois took jurisdiction, and gave possession to the receiver appointed by the latter, but insisted that the decision in Muller v. Dows was conclusive of the propriety and legality of its former action. Central Trust

Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 618. In Beers v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 161, substantially the same facts were involved, and the same result was reached. In the case of Blackburn v. Selma, M. & M. R. Co. 2 Flipp. 525, Fed. Cas. No. 1,467, it appears that the legislatures of Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee each incorporated railway companies bearing the same name, the act of incorporation in the states last named being identical; but it does not clearly appear from the opinion whether all the acts authorized consolidation of the three corporations. The railways were constructed, and the companies consolidated so far as they were authorized, after which bonds were issued, secured by mortgage on the railway. Suit was brought on some of the bonds, in which foreclosure was asked in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Tennessee, and that court appointed a receiver over the railway situated in the three states, but he failed to get possession of that part in the state of Alabama, which was placed in the hands of a receiver by a court of that state, and subsequently sold in foreclosure of mortgage. The court held that it had jurisdiction to appoint the receiver, to foreclose the mortgage on the railway in the three states, and to sell it. The case of Muller v. Dows was again relied on in support of the jurisdiction claimed, and the same course of reasoning followed in that case was adopted. If the court in Alabama, under whose decrees a receiver was appointed and the property sold, had jurisdiction of the proper persons to make a decree which would bind the property, what would be the relative rights of a purchaser under the decree made by that court, and a purchaser under decree rendered by the circuit court in Tennessee, if their rights were not affected by priority of mortgage? The Mercantile Trust Company filed a bill in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Ohio against the Kanawha & Ohio Railway Company, a corporation existing under the laws of Ohio and West Virginia, a part of whose road was in each state, for the purpose of foreclosing a mortgage, and a receiver was appointed. Subsequently, a bill was filed in the circuit court of the United States for West Virginia, which consisted of a copy of the bill filed in the court in Ohio, with prayer that the court take ancillary jurisdiction, and asking that the court confirm the order of the court in Ohio appointing a receiver of the entire property, and make such orders as might be necessary to give him possession and control of it. The purpose of the proceeding in West Virginia is thus stated by Mr. Justice Harlan: "The purpose of the parties by whom, or at whose instance, the suit here was instituted, was to have the entire mortgaged property administered under the orders of the court in Ohio in which the suit for foreclosure was brought, and that nothing was desired or expected from this court except an order approving or confirming the appointment of Kelley as receiver, and such other orders as may be necessary to vest in him the possession and control of such of the mort gaged property as was in this district." The case of Muller v. Dows was relied upon again as authority for the action of the court in Ohio, but it was held not to be applicable. The learned judge then declares, if the plaintiff "desires the active intervention of this court in respect to the mortgaged property in West Virginia, such intervention should only occur in a separate, independent suit, of which it may take cognizance, and in which, if proper or necessary to do so, this court may lay its hands upon the property within this district, and, if need be, administer it by a receiver directly amenable to its authority, for the benefit of all parties interested, of whatever state they may be citizens. The request that this court will simply confirm the appointment of a receiver made in another circuit, and by its order invest that receiver with the possession and control of the mortgaged premises within this district, no other relief being contemplated, is, in effect, a request that this court will compel all who have claims and rights in respect to the mortgaged property situated in West Virginia to seek relief in the original suit for foreclosure pending in another state; and this, notwithstanding such parties may have the right, under existing legislation, to invoke the jurisdiction of this court, or of some court of general jurisdiction established by this state. It might be well if congress would so enlarge or regulate the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States as to enable a circuit court, in which is brought an original suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage resting upon an interstate railroad, to take actual possession, by its officers, of the entire line, and of all the mortgaged property, wherever situated, and administer it for the benefit of all concerned, preserving in that mode the unity of the railroad, and the just rights of mortgagors, mortgagees, and creditors, as well as those of the general public interested in commerce among the states. But there has been no such legislation, and we do not see our way clear to effect any such result by judicial orders merely."

The case of State v. Northern Cent. R. Co., 18 Md. 193, is frequently referred to as authority for the proposition that a court may exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction and appoint a receiver, and through him take possession of a continuous line of railway running into another state; but we do not understand the court to have made such a ruling. Counsel for both parties conceded the nonexistence of such jurisdiction, and the opinion of the court, in which it is said that "the consideration that the authority of this court cannot extend beyond the territorial limits of the state, in the exercise of its remedial power, does not deter it from acting, in a case within its acknowledged jurisdiction, to the verge of those limits," evidences the fact that the court was of the same opinion. The purpose of that suit was to compel the railway company to apply its receipts, not necessary for its operation, in accordance with contract, to payment of debt to the state, and by injunction to prevent the misapplication of funds thus arising. Admission of necessity for resort to a jurisdiction, now frequently inaptly termed "ancillary," is simply a concession that the tribunal which is in such case termed that of primary jurisdiction is destitute of power over property situated in another state; for, if this be not true, neither excuse nor necessity can exist for action by another court having jurisdiction in the state where the property is. A court clothed with full power to administer property needs no aid from another; and if, in the exercise of a lawful power, it has taken possession of property through its receiver, interference with that by another court would be wrongful. One court cannot acquire power over property not within its territorial jurisdiction through the action of another court having jurisdiction where the property is, for the jurisdiction of every court must depend on the law, and cannot rest on the friendly action of another court, which is sometimes termed "comity." The statute now in force in this state declares: "If property sought to be placed in the hands of a receiver is situated within the limits of this state, no other court than one within the limits of this state shall have power to appoint any receiver of said property." Sayles' Civ. Stat. art. 1470b. This asserts a rule of comity which the courts of this state, since its passage, must observe; but it also asserts a jurisdictional rule which, from the nature of suits in which such appointments may be made, is applicable everywhere in the absence of such a statute. What power congress might confer on a circuit court for a district in one state over property situated in another state is not the question involved in this case. That question is, what jurisdiction has it conferred on such courts? The acts of congress, on which solely depend the jurisdiction of circuit courts, clearly manifesting intention, even in actions transitory in their nature, to have the rights of litigants determined, as far as may be practicable, in courts of the locality in which they live, and to confer jurisdiction over actions or suits local in nature only on courts having jurisdiction in the territory in which the thing in litigation is situated, we are forced to the conclusion that the circuit court in Louisiana had not jurisdiction over property in Texas, such as conferred upon it power to take possession of and administer it, through a receiver or otherwise.

The second question certified is: "If no such power existed, would the negligent act of a receiver thus appointed, resulting in death, while operating the road, in Parker county, Texas, make the company liable?" If the Texas & Pacific Railway Company permitted a person, appointed receiver by a court having no jurisdiction over its property in this state, to take possession of that property and to operate it, then such person must be deemed to have been simply its agent, and it is liable for injuries resulting, while the railway was managed by him, in all cases in which it would be liable had he been made its agent in the ordinary manner.

The third question is: "Would the company be liable for such negligent act if the receiver was appointed and discharged, and the property restored to it, by consent and collusion, as alleged by appellees, whether the court making the appointment had or had not the requisite jurisdiction, and, if the court had jurisdiction, could that issue be made available in this suit?" Appellees alleged that the suit in the circuit court of the United States by which the receiver was appointed was collusively brought, and that the receiver was appointed by consent of all parties to it, and that, while ostensibly acting as receiver, the person so appointed was really but the agent of the railway company during the time he managed its property. They further alleged that, before the discharge of Brown as receiver, the railway company bound itself by writing to assume and pay all liabilities incurred by him during the time he managed the company's property as receiver; and they further alleged that during the time he operated the railway he made permanent improvements on the road to the value of $2,000,000, which were paid for out of current earnings, and that, when restored to the company, the enhanced value of the road resulting from improvements so made was $2,000,000. If a court appointing a receiver has jurisdiction over the property to which the receivership relates, its orders and decrees will be binding on parties to the suit, and must be given effect so far as they affect the property; but it does not follow from this that the true relation of the person appointed to the railway company, when property is placed in his possession, may not be inquired into whenever that becomes necessary in litigation between the company and persons not parties to the suit in which the appointment is made. If the court has jurisdiction, every reasonable presumption ought to be indulged that the relation of the receiver to the property and its owner is what that relation ordinarily is; for it ought not to be presumed, or even found to be true, in the absence of cogent evidence, that a court has made itself the mere tool of apparently adverse litigants, or that it entertained a collusive suit. A suit is said to be collusive when brought by seemingly adverse parties under secret agreement and co-operation, with a view to have some legal question decided which is not involved in a real controversy between them, or when so brought with intent to defraud other persons, there being no real controversy between the parties, on purpose to secure some relief which, as between themselves, would not be conceded without suit. The power of a court to appoint a receiver is based on the fact of real litigation between the parties, in which it becomes necessary, in the opinion of the court, to take possession of property to which the controversy in some manner relates, in order to preserve it, or, if necessary, to administer it for the benefit of all persons interested. He "is appointed upon a principle of justice for the benefit of all concerned. Every kind of property of such nature that, if legal, it might be taken in execution, may, if equitable, be put into his possession. Hence the appointment has been said to be an equitable execution. He is virtually a representative of the court, and of all the parties in interest in litigation wherein he is appointed. He is required to take possession of property as directed, because it is deemed more for the interest of justice that he should do so than that the property should be in the possession of either of the parties in the litigation. He is not appointed for the benefit of either of the parties, but of all concerned. Money or property in his hands is in custodia legis." Davis v. Gray, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 217, 21 L. ed. 452. If parties having no real controversy, and desiring no lawful relief, which makes resort to a court necessary, institute a suit, and have a receiver appointed to take possession of property, for the purpose of defrauding other persons, or to embarrass them in assertion of right against one of the parties and its property, no principle of justice sanctions the interposition of a court or the appointment of a receiver; and it would be a perversion of justice to hold otherwise than that a receiver appointed under such circumstances is the agent of the person or corporation whose property may thus collusively be placed in his possession.

The theory on which a receiver is held to be an officer of the court appointing him, and not the agent of the owner whose property is placed in his possession, is that the property to be controlled is taken from the custody and management of its owner, and made subject to the control of the court, without his consent; but, when the defendant owner asks the court to do this, he, in effect, asks the court to make an appointment for him, and it is but just that a receiver so appointed should be held to be his agent. That a plaintiff collusively acts with a defendant for such a purpose only aggravates the case, for this enables the owner to impose upon the court, and such a plaintiff has no ground for complaint if the receiver be held the agent of the owner in reference to every act out of which, in the management of the property, obligation to other persons may arise. The statute of this state which declares that "no receiver shall ever be appointed of any joint-stock, incorporated company, or of any co-partnership or private person on the petition of such joint-stock, incorporated company, partnership or person," is but a legislative declaration of the rule recognized by courts of equity. Robinson v. Hadley, 11 Beav. 614; Leddel v. Starr, 19 N. J. Eq. 168; Marr v. Littlewood, 2 Myl. & C. 458. Corporations ought not to be heard to say that they are either indisposed or incompetent to manage their own affairs, and that therefore some court should take charge of them through a receiver. If the officers of a corporation misconduct its business, stockholders usually have power to remove them, and, in cases in which they have not the ability to protect themselves, courts of equity have power to control the acts of such officers, or even to remove them; but such misconduct does not authorize courts to appoint receivers, and through them to assume the management of a business or property. The opinion in Metc v. Buffalo, C. & P. R. Co., 58 N. Y. 61, 17 Am. Rep. 201, states the only ground on which it can be held that receivers are not agents of the persons or corporations whose property is placed in their possession by a court of competent jurisdiction, but it recognizes the fact that the rule applies only when the appointment is not made or brought about at the desire of the owner, and assumes that the rule applies only when the appointment is made against such person's will. We do not wish, however, to be understood to hold that there must be active opposition, or even open dissent, on the part of the owner to the appointment of a receiver, in order to make operative the general rule; for, if the application be justified by existing facts, good faith would not require opposition; but we do wish to be understood to hold, when a receiver is appointed by agreement between the parties to a suit in order to accomplish a purpose not lawful in itself, that the receiver must be considered the agent of the owner of the property.

In a case in which, by consent of parties, a receiver was appointed with power to receive and sue for all sums due the litigants, and the same to hold subject to the order of the court, it was held that the person so appointed could not be considered an officer of the court, and that he must be considered the agent of the parties, because the appointment was in effect the act of the parties. Kellar v. Williams, 8 Rob. (La.) 821. The Texas & Pacific Company, including its main and lateral roads, perhaps had more than 1,000 miles of railway in Texas, the main line extending from its eastern to its western boundary, and it may be that it had, as is not unusual, a floating indebtedness, and would, in current business, incur obligations along its entire line, whether operated by the company or a receiver, in payment of which current earnings ought to have been applied. Under such circumstances, if the real purposes of the receivership were not the lawful purposes shown by the pleadings in the circuit court, but were to place the property of the company in the hands of a receiver subject to the control of a court sitting in another state, in order that the railway company might not be subject to suits in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, that its creditors here should be thus embarrassed in enforcement of their rights by having to resort to a court so far from the place where their causes of action arose, all for the purpose of enabling the parties to that suit, by agreement between them, to apply the earnings of the road to the betterment of the property belonging to the one, and to which the other looked as a security for debt,—then the receivership ought to be deemed to have been collusive, and the receiver be held to have been simply the agent of the railway company. Under such facts (which we do not assume to be true, but refer to for illustration) made known to the court the receiver would not have been appointed, and the railway company ought not to be permitted to escape liability on the ground that, through false and fraudulent pretenses made by another acting under a collusive agreement with it, the court had been induced to make an appointment that would not have been made had the real purpose been disclosed. In Sage v. Memphis & L. R. Co., 18 Fed. Rep. 571, a distinguished circuit judge of the United States, on discovering the existence of such a state of facts as referred to, at once took steps to close a receivership, and, in disposing of the questions presented, with such forceful language vindicated the abused jurisdiction of the court, and gave the rules applicable in such cases, as to challenge the admiration of every person having due regard for the pure administration of the law. If the appointment of the receiver was obtained through collusion of the parties to the suit in which the appointment was made, it is unimportant whether the court would have had jurisdiction, in a proper case, to make the appointment; for in such case the company would be as fully responsible for negligence in the operation of its road, through which injury resulted to a third person, as would it be if its road had been operated under the management of a superintendent appointed by its directory, and the facts which show such liability may be proved in this cause.

The fifth question certified is: "In what, if any, state of the case as above set forth, would appellees be precluded from disputing the validity of the appointment of the receiver, the deceased fireman having contracted with him in that capacity?" In view of the entire case stated it is not perceived that the fact that the person acting as receiver made the employment in that character could affect the right of appellees to show what his true relation to the company was. If, while he was in fact and in law the agent of the company, it permitted him to assume to act as receiver, and to control its property, and employ persons to operate it, this would present simply the ordinary case of an agent contracting in relation to the principal's business intrusted to him without disclosing who his principal is. It was held in East Line & R. R. Co. v. Culberson, 72 Tex. 375, 3 L. R. A. 567, that one railway company operating the road of another under an unauthorized lease was the agent of the latter in so far as its duties to the public were concerned, but that as to the employes of the former no such agency and resulting liability existed. The decision in that case can have no application to the question certified.

The sixth question certified is: "In any state of case as above set forth, would the statute of limitations preclude a recovery?" It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States, and by this court, that after the discharge of a receiver against whom suit has been brought, if there be facts to fix liability on a railway company's property for acts occurring during the receivership, it is proper to make the company a party, and continue the litigation. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cox, 145 U. S. 593, 36 L. ed. 829; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Anderson, 149 U. S. 237, 37 L. ed. 717; Brown v. Gay, 76 Tex. 444; Boggs v. Brown, 82 Tex. 43; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Comstock, 83 Tex. 537. In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Comstock it was held that the action did not abate on discharge of the receiver, and that, the company having been made the defendant, the action should be treated as continuous from the time it was instituted against the receiver, from which it followed that limitation could not be invoked unless the action was barred when brought against the receiver. This action, however, could not have been maintained against the receiver, nor against the railway company after his discharge, if his relation to the company was really only that which a receiver ordinarily sustains to the person whose property is placed in his possession and management. Turner v. Cross, 83 Tex. 218, 15 L. R. A. 262. If the action had been brought against Brown as agent of the railway company, it could not have been sustained, for the action, so treating him, ought to have been brought against his principal. The case now stands as though no suit had been brought until the railway company was made the defendant, and from that standpoint the question of limitation must be considered. The question of limitation is presented under the facts assumed as the basis for the preceding questions certified, and, looking to them, it is evident that such facts operated to conceal the fact that cause of action existed against the company, and it could not well be held that such concealment was not fraudulent. The rule in this state is that the fraudulent concealment of a plaintiff's cause of action takes the case out of the bar of statutes of limitation. Munson v. Hollowell, 26 Tex. 475, 84 Am. Dec. 582; Ripley v. Withee, 27 Tex. 17; Ransome v. Beardon, 50 Tex. 127; Calhoun v. Burton, 64 Tex. 515; Anding v. Perkins, 29 Tex. 348; Connolly v. Hammond, 68 Tex. 17; Brown v. Brown, 61 Tex. 45. The limitation on this rule is that a plaintiff cannot excuse his delay in instituting suit on the ground of fraudulent concealment of his cause of action if his failure to discover is attributable to his own neglect, and whether such neglect existed in a given case must be determined from the facts of that case.

The fourth and seventh questions certified are: "If a collusive and fraudulent receivership was shown, or rather if that was the proper deduction from the undisputed evidence, was the court required to submit the issue to the jury before a judgment could be entered on a general verdict finding negligence?" "If appellant could be held liable for the death loss in question on the ground of a collusive and void receivership, as alleged, upon a verdict finding that issue in favor of appellees, should the judgment be reversed for fundamental error where the pleading and proof raised the issue, and no error is assigned for failure to submit it to the jury?" These may be considered together. It has been held in a long line of decisions that a charge, correct so far as it applies to the facts, but omitting to state the law applicable to an issue raised by them, furnishes no ground for reversal unless proper instruction relating to the matter omitted be asked and refused. Robinson v. Varnell, 16 Tex. 887; O'Connell v. State, 18 Tex. 363; Peeler v. Guilkey, 27 Tex. 858; Ford v. McBryde, 45 Tex. 501; Davis v. Roosevelt, 53 Tex. 316; Beazley v. Denson, 40 Tex. 434; Cockrill v. Cox, 65 Tex. 675; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Arispe, 81 Tex. 519. Whatever exceptions there may be to this rule, none of them embrace a case in which the undisputed evidence establishes the fact to which the omission relates.

The eighth question certified is: "As deceased was killed since the Act of Congress of March 3, 1887, relating to federal receiverships, what effect, if any, did it have on the issues involved?" As this is now an action against the railway company, that act has no bearing on any issues raised by the pleadings; but were it an action that could have been maintained against the receiver, or were it against him, all the issues made in the pleadings on which that act could have any bearing were settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Texas & P. R. Co. v. Johnson, 151 U. S. 81, 38 L. ed. 81, and in other cases.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Edward M. STECK, Respt.,

v.

COLORADO FUEL & IRON CO., Appt.

(142 N. Y. 236.)

Long accounts in a counterclaim, in an action on contract where plaintiff's claim is disputed, will not justify compulsory reference, under the provision of the New York constitution for "trial by jury in all cases in which it has heretofore been used in the colony of New York," since the practice in the colony permitted a set-off only with plea of payment, which admitted plaintiff's claim, and the provision in the Colonial Act of December 31,

NOTE.—Compulsory reference as a denial of the constitutional right to trial by jury.

- I. The United States Constitution.
- II. Where the right existed prior to the state constitution.
- III. State statute no infringement of constitutional right.
- IV. Equitable account.
- V. Constitution violated.
- VI. Action at law.
- VII. State constitution.

The principles deducible from the decisions would seem to be,

That article VII. of the Amendments to the United States Constitution does not affect the power of the states to legislate upon the question of compulsory arbitration in civil actions.

That where the power of compulsory reference existed prior to the date of a state constitution, it will not be taken to be abridged by such constitution.

That where the cause was one referable by the rules and principles of equity it will not be taken as within the constitution.

So certain state statutes have been held to be no infringement of the right.

1708, for reference of an action involving a "long account, either on one side or the other." was applicable to a counterclaim only when plaintiff's cause of action was not disputed.

(Andrews, Ch. J., and Finch and O'Brien, JJ., dissent.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for New York County directing a reference of a case brought to recover salary alleged to be due and unpaid. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. James Stikeman, for appellant:

Trial by referee is an exceptional mode of judicial procedure, and when it is sought to coerce a suitor into a submission to it the burden is upon the party applying for a reference to show that the case is within the excepted class.

Cassidy v. McFarland, 189 N. Y. 201.

It is not enough to justify a compulsory reference that the case may involve the examination of a long account. It must be shown that the trial will involve such examination.

Thayer v. McNaughton, 117 N. Y. 111; Spence v. Simis, 187 N. Y. 616; Cassidy v. McFarland, supra.

The referable quality of an action must be determined from the complaint and a counterclaim set up in the answer cannot change it.

Mr. William C. Cammann, with Messrs. Holmes & Adams, for respondent:

The question whether the examination of a long account is necessarily involved in the action is not appealable to this court.

Welsh v. Darragh, 53 N. Y. 590; Kain v. Delano, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 29; Martin v. Windsor Hotel Co. 70 N. Y. 101; Harrington v. Bruce, 84 N. Y. 108.

The referable quality of the action depends upon the issues presented by the complaint and answer.

Searle v. Davis, 89 N. Y. S. R. 169; Maryott v. Thayer, 7 Jones & S. 417; B'ackstone Nat. Bank of Boston v. Bogart, 9 Jones & S. 292; Kain v. Delano, supra.

The referable quality no longer depends upon the complaint alone.

Mitchell v. Oliver, 56 Hun, 208; Thayer v. McNaughton, 117 N. Y. 111.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's cause of action, as alleged in his complaint, is for his salary, as general manager of the defendant, at a stipulated price, for the quarter of the year ending December 31, 1892. The verified answer of the defendant gainsays and puts in issue all the material allegations of the complaint, and alleges counterclaims consisting of long accounts. It is conceded that if the plaintiff's cause of action had been merely put in issue by the answer, the action could not have been referred without the consent of both parties, and that either party demanding it would have been entitled to a jury trial. But the contention of the plaintiff is that because the

But where the action is one which is not referable by the rules of common law it is not the subject of a compulsory reference.

The right to a trial by jury in civil actions will be seen to be limited by the constitutions of some of the states.

I. The United States Constitution.

Article VII. of the Constitution of the United States provides: In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact, tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

The above provision in the United States Constitution relates only to such courts as sit under the authority of the United States, and was not intended as a restriction upon the state courts. Huston v. Wadsworth, 5 Colo. 213.

So the reference of a case for trial without the consent of the parties was held not to be in violation of such seventh article, in Huston v. Wadsworth, supra.

The provisions of such constitution apply only to the United States courts, and do not prescribe a rule of practice for the courts of a state. Hunt v. McMahan, 5 Ohio, 134.

The provision is no objection to a cause being heard before a referee or a state court, and the state constitution is no objection either, references being well known and sanctioned prior to the adoption of the New York constitution. Lee v. Tillotson, 24 Wend. 837, 35 Am. Dec. 624.

The right of trial by jury so secured is simply the right to that kind of trial. Mathews v. Tripp, 12 R. I. 258.

The Supreme Court of the United States also holds that the above amendment relates only to 25 L. R. A.

the United States courts and that the states must regulate the trials in their own courts. Edwards v. Elliott, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 532, 22 L. ed. 487; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 28 L. ed. 678; Pearson v. Yewdall, 95 U. S. 204, 24 L. ed. 433.

II. Where the right existed prior to the state constitution.

The right remains inviolate so long as the jury continues to be constituted substantially as the jury was constituted when the constitution was adopted, and so long as all such cases as were then triable by jury continue to be so triable without any restrictions or conditions which materially hamper or burden the right. Mathews v. Tripp, 12 R. I. 258.

Where the right existed prior to the constitution being adopted, it cannot be impaired by legislative act. Flanders v. Warner, 55 N. H. 179.

In such a case there cannot be a compulsory reference. McCullough v. Brodie, 13 How. Pr. 346; Townsend v. Hendricks, 40 How. Pr. 143; Brink v. Republic F. Ins. Co. 2 Thomp. & C. 550.

It has been held that the language of the constitution indicates that the right of trial by jury shall continue to all suitors in court, in all cases in which it was secured to them by the laws and practice of the courts at the time of the adoption of the constitution. Tribou v. Strowbridge, 7 Or. 156.

So the clause in the Wisconsin constitution has been interpreted as designed to secure only the right of trial by jury in all cases where it could by law have been claimed as a matter of right at the time the constitution was adopted. Mead v. Walker, 17 Wis. 189; Gaston v. Babcock, 6 Wis. 503; Stilwell v. Kellogg, 14 Wis. 462.

The law being in favor of such method of procedure before the constitution, the right of trial counterclaims involve long accounts, therefore the action may be compulsorily referred, and all the issues therein tried before a referee. The question is thus presented again to this court whether, where the cause of action alleged in the complaint is not referable, the action can be made referable by anything which appears in the answer. We have several times answered this question in the negative, and we should do so again. As it is sought to distinguish this case from our prior decisions, to which I will hereafter refer, and as we differ among ourselves, it becomes important, more particularly than ever before, to examine the grounds of those decisions, and to give somewhat fully the reasons for our present conclusion.

It was provided in the State Constitution of 1777 that "trial by jury in all cases in which it has heretofore been used in the colony of New York shall be established and remain inviolate forever," and that provision is contained in all the revisions of our constitution since that time. We have therefore, to determine whether such an action as this could, prior to 1777, have been referred to a referee for trial without the consent of the parties. References of actions pending in the common-law courts for trial before referees were not known to the common law, and, so far as they are now authorized, they are particularly provided for by statutes. Under the Dutch rule in the colony of New York, actions involving long accounts could be referred to arbitrators or referees, and such a reference was a very common mode of trial during that period. But it was not pleasing to the English colonists, who had received the trial by jury from their ancestors,—a priceless heritage secured by Magna Charta,—and hence, some years after the capitulation of the Dutch to the English in 1683, by the charter of liberties and privileges granted by the Duke of York to the inhabitants of New York, it was provided "that all trials shall be by the verdict of twelve men." See Charter, Append. No. 2, 2 Rev. Laws 1813. Thereafter, all actions in the common-law courts of the colony were triable before juries, except the action of account, and that was applicable only to a limited class of cases, involving the examination and taking of accounts. It was one of the most difficult, dilatory, and expensive actions known to the law, and was very rarely resorted to. McMurray v. Rawson, 8 Hill, 59; Magon v. Sinclair, 5 Daly, 68.

The difficulties attending the prosecution of such an action were such that the practice became general for merchants and others having long accounts to enforce their collection by actions of assumpsit, which were always then triable by jury. But the embarrassments attending the trial of such actions by jury were such that December 31, 1768, an Act (2 Van Schaick's Laws N. Y. 517) was passed, with a preamble as follows: "Whereas, instead of the ancient action of account, suits are of late, for the sake of holding to bail, and to avoid the wager of law, frequently brought in assumpsit, whereby the business of unraveling long and intricate accounts, by jury as provided in the state constitution will not prohibit a compulsory reference where it existed before. Mead v. Walker, supra.

The same was the ruling of the court in Dane County Supra. v. Dunning, 20 Wis. 210.

To the same effect, Edwardson v. Garnhart, 56 Mo. 81; Lee v. Tillotson, 24 Wend. 337, 35 Am. Dec. 624.

III. State statute no infringement of constitutional right.

In Shepard v. Bank of State of Missouri, 15 Mo. 142, the court held that the sections of the Missouri code relating to a reference were not contrary to the constitutional right to a trial by jury, nor an infringement thereof.

And in the later case of Edwardson v. Garnhart, 56 Mo. 81, the court upheld the right to submit to arbitration, even where both parties did not consent, stating that it never was the intention that the constitutional provision should so change a law which had existed for twenty years in that state, the object of the constitution being to preserve the constitutional right as it existed at the time, and was then practiced in the state.

The New Hampshire Act of 1874, chapter 97, referring certain cases, was upheld as not in conflict with article 20 of the Bill of Rights, or the constitution of that state, in Flanders v. Warner, 55 N. H. 173.

So the New Hampshire statute, relating to reference of matters to auditors to report upon, was held not unconstitutional, in Perkins v. Scott, 57 N. H. 55.

See also Lee v. Tillotson, 24 Wend. 337, 35 Am. Dec. 624.

The Ohio law does not conflict with the United States Constitution. Hunt v. McMahan, 5 Ohio, 124.

Section 1013 of the New York Code of Civil Procedure governs the right to compel a reference in that state where a long account is involved, and 25 L. R. A. difficult legal questions do not arise. Camp v. Ingersoll, 86 N. Y. 433.

The statutory right of reference is merely permissive and not mandatory. Goodyear v. Brooks, 4 Robt. 682; Martin v. Windsor Hotel Co. 70 N. Y. 101; Wheeler v. Falconer, 7 Robt. 45.

The right is confined to cases of long account. Barnes v. West, 16 Hun, 68; Kain v. Delano, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 29; Sharp v. New York, 18 How. Pr. 213.

It has been held that section 222 of the Oregon Civil Code (Hill's Annotated ed. 1892, p. 310) relating to compulsory references, is not contrary to the provisions of the state constitution, art. 1, § 17, declaring that in civil cases the right of trial by jury should remain inviolate. Tribou v. Strowbridge, 7 Or. 153.

The Oregon act providing for the assessment of damages without a jury, in cases relating to the taking of material for road repairs, was not unconstitutional. Kendall v. Post, 8 Or. 141.

In McDonald v. Schell, 6 Serg. & R. 240, the court held that section 11 of the Pennsylvania Arbitration Act of 1810, requiring payment of costs before appeal, was not unconstitutional.

In the above case the court, in declaring the statute constitutional, refused to consume time in hearing the question argued. McDonald v. Schell, supra; Emerick v. Harris, 1 Binn. 416.

An intention to destroy the constitutional right will not be gratuitously imputed to the legislature. Com. v. Bennett, 16 Serg. & R. 243.

The above case was an action for a penalty for neglect to serve notice required under the Arbitration Act of 1810.

The Wisconsin act entitled "An act concerning proceedings in courts of record," giving the court power to compel the parties to refer questions involving a long account, was declared not unconstitutional, in Norton v. Rooker, 1 Pinney, 195.

most proper for the deliberate examination of auditors, is now cast upon jurors, who at the bar are more disadvantageously circumstanced for such services; and this burden upon jurors is greatly increased since the laws made for permitting discounts in support of a plea of payment, so that by the change of the law and the practice above mentioned, the suits of merchants and others upon long accounts are exposed to erroneous decisions, and jurors perplexed and rendered more liable to attainments; and by the vast time necessarily consumed in such trials, other causes are delayed and the general course of justice greatly obstructed. Be it, therefore, enacted," etc., "that whenever it shall appear probable in any cause depending in the supreme court of judicature of this colony (other than such as shall be brought by or against executors or administrators) that the trial of the same will require the examination of a long account, either on one side or the other, the said court is hereby authorized, with or without the consent of parties, to refer such cause by rule, to be made at discretion, to referees. . . . and if the report or award of the referees, or of the major part of them, shall be confirmed by the said court, and any sum be thereby found for the plaintiff, judgment shall be entered for the same, with a relicta verificatione, as by confession with costs, if by law the plaintiff would have recovered costs, had a verdict passed in the same cause for the sum so reported to be due; but if, after payment pleaded, any sum shall be reported to be due to the defendant, and the award be confirmed, he shall have judgment and recover his costs. . . . And when such referees shall report that nothing is due from the defendant, and the report be confirmed, then judgment shall be entered as by non pros. and the defendant shall recover his costs, to be taxed, and such judgment be a perpetual bar." That was the first act in the colony of New York authorizing a reference in any common-law action. It was undoubtedly a tentative act, and it expired, by its own limitation, on the 1st day of January, 1771. It was revived and re-enacted by the Act of February 16, 1771, and was to continue in force until February 1, 1780. It is evident that the people of this state parted with the trial by jury in any case with great hesitation and reluctance, as the temporary statute authorizing references was not re-enacted in 1780, and there was no such statute in this state from that date until 1788, when it was again substantially reinstated. It was in force prior to and at the time of, the adoption of the Constitution of 1777; and the question for our determination is whether, under it, such an action as this could have been referred. And I think it is very clear that it could not have been. The preamble to the act may be read for the purpose of ascertaining its meaning and scope, and from that it clearly appears that the lawmakers were then dealing with actions brought by merchants and others upon long accounts; that it was such actions, only, that were intended to be provided for; and that such actions, only, were intended to be sent to referees for trial. The provision is that an action could be referred when the trial would "require an examination of a long account, either upon the one side or the other," and therefore it may be conceded that when the trial would involve the examination of a long account, under the practice as it then existed, upon either side, a reference could be ordered. But when I have made this concession little

So in Janvrin v. Janvrin, 57 N. H. 146, a reference in divorce proceedings was upheld as not being a case in which the parties had a right at law to a trial by jury. Moore v. Moore, 56 N. H. 512, to the same effect.

IV. Equitable account.

The extent of the constitutional right is generally conceded to be that which was according to the common law, not including cases in the courts of chancery, admiralty, and probate. Plimpton v. Somerset, 33 Vt. 283.

In a suit in equity, the party has no absolute constitutional right to trial by jury. Camp v. Ingersoll, 86 N. Y. 433.

In McMartin v. Bingham, 27 Iowa, 284, 1 Am. Rep. 285, the question was raised as to the power of the court to direct a reference when the parties did not consent, and the court held that under section 3090, subsection 1, of the Revised Code of that state, where an action fell within the rules of equitable cognizance, there should be no hesitation in the exercise of the power of compulsory reference, and that therefore the district court had no power to order a reference without consent, except in such cases, and that such an action would be contrary to and in violation of the right to trial by jury, which remains unviolated by article 1, section 2, of the Constitution of that state.

That which is the matter of calculation as mere account, as within the jurisdiction of equity, is the subject of a compulsory reference, and the constitutional provision relating to trial by jury is not violated by such reference. Blair Town Lot & Land Co. v. Walker, 50 Iowa, 376.

In questions of long account a trial by jury would be a mockery. Ibid.

The power to make a compulsory reference under section 2816 of the Iowa Code, was held not to violate the provisions of the said article of the state constitution, the article not guaranteeing the right to trial by jury in cases within the province of equity jurisdiction. Burt v. Harrah, 65 Iowa, 643.

The same conclusion was reached by the court in Mills v. Miller, 8 Neb. 94.

V. Constitution violated.

In Com. v. Bennett, 16 Serg. & R. 243, it was stated that the right of trial by jury was supposed to be guaranteed by the constitution, and that acts of assembly were required to be construed so as not to infringe it; and an intention to destroy the right would not be gratuitously imputed to the legislature.

The general rule of restriction in reference to the provision of the constitution is that any act which destroys or materially suppresses the right of trial by jury according to the course of the common law in cases proper for the cognizance of a jury is unconstitutional. Plimpton v. Somerset, 33 Vt. 283.

To justify the court in holding a legislative law unconstitutional, the case must be clear and manifest. Norton v. Rooker, 1 Pinney, 195.

A submission under a statute authorizing a justice of the peace to render judgment on a referee's report, when the subject-matter in controversy was under two hundred dollars, was held void in Hayes v. Bennett, 2 N. H. 423.

The Rhode Island statute, providing that when a cause is at issue in the supreme court, or court of progress has been made. We must determine under what circumstances a long account could appear in the answer of the defendant, so as to make the action referable when a long account was not set forth in the complaint, and that makes it necessary for us to examine the ancient law of set-off.

Set-offs in common-law actions were unknown to the common law. If a defendant had accounts or claims against the plaintiff, he could enforce them only by an action commenced by him against the plaintiff. Even if the plaintiff's accounts or claims were undisputed, and the defendant had accounts or claims against the plaintiff far in excess of those made against him, he could not offset them, but was obliged to enforce them by an independent action. That practice was not changed in England until the Acts 2 & 8 Geo. II., whereby set-offs were first authorized there. 8 Bl. Com. 805; Barbour, Set-Off, 24. They were authorized several years earlier in the colony of New York by the Act, chapter 281 of the Laws of 1714, 1 N. Y. Colonial Laws [Livingston & S. ed.] 106. In that act it was provided "that if any two or more dealing together be indebted to each other upon bonds, bills, bargains, promises, accounts or the like, and one of them commence an action in any court of this colony, if the defendant cannot gainsay the deed, bargain, or assumption upon which he is sued, it shall be lawful for such defendant to plead payment of all or any part of the debt or sum demanded, giving notice in writing with the said plea of what he will insist upon at the trial for his discharge, and give any bond, bill, receipt, account, or bargain so given notice of in evidence, and if it shall happen that the defendant hath fully paid or satisfied the debt or sum demanded, the jury shall find for the defendant, and judgment shall be entered that the plaintiff shall take nothing by his writ and shall pay the costs; and if it shall appear that any part of the sum demanded is paid, then so much as is found to be paid shall be discounted and the plaintiff shall have judgment for the residue only, with costs of suit; but if it appear to the jury that the plaintiff is overpaid, then they shall give in their verdict for the defendant, and withal certify to the court how much they find the plaintiff to be indebted, or in arrear to the defendant more than will answer the debt or sum demanded; and the sum or sums so certified shall be recorded with the verdict, and shall be deemed as a debt of record," etc. That was the only law upon the subject of set-off enacted in the colony previous to the Constitution of 1777. At that time, and, I believe, at all times prior to the code practice, notice of matter in defense could not be given except in connection with some plea. The lawyers of that period could not conceive of a defense except under some plea, and at no time in this state, prior to 1801, could there be more than one plea to a declaration. The pleadings on both sides were required to be such as to present for trial a single issue, and a pleading tendering several issues was bad for duplicity. 1 Chitty, Pl. 259 264, 592. Under the Act of 1714 the defendant could give notice of his set-off only with the plea of payment, and with no other plea, and under his plea of payment he could prove no payment except that accomplished by his set-off. There could not be two distinct issues,—one upon the payment, and the other upon the set-off; and under the plea of payment, with notice of set-off, the only matter that could be litigated was the set-off. A plea of pay-common pleas, if the form of action be assumpsit, debt, covenant, or other form of action in any way involving accounts, the court may in its discretion appoint one or more auditors, and that their report shall be prima facie evidence of all matters embraced in the order, was held void as contrary to section 15 of article 1 of the State Constitution which reserves the right of trial by jury inviolate. Francis v. Baker, 11 R. L. 103, 23 Am. Rep. 424.

In Vermont the Act of 1856 (No. 6, page 10) relating to compulsory references and making the referee's report prima facie evidence of the facts reported, was held unconstitutional in so far as it related to trials in which the party was entitled to a jury trial by common law. Plimpton v. Somerset, supra.

VI. Action at law.

All rights, whether existing at the time of making the constitution, or afterwards arising, properly falling into classes of rights to which the common law secured the trial by jury, are within its provisions. Plimpton v. Somerset, 33 Vt. 283.

Where the action is clearly one maintainable at law, the court has no power to order such a reference, and such an order is an interference with the constitutional right. Grant Dist. Twp. v. Bulles, 6 Iowa, 525, following McMartin v. Bingham, 27 Iowa, 234, 1 Am. Rep. 265.

In Mills v. Miller, 3 Neb. 94, a purely legal action cannot be referred, except by consent of the parties, as neither can be deprived of the right to a trial by jury in such cases, and in actions involving an account it was only in case of a purely equitable nature that a reference could be ordered without the consent of the parties.

The above decision was approved of and followed in Lamaster v. Scofield, 5 Neb. 148.

Where the act of the state legislature made a railroad company liable for the full value of livestock killed or maimed by passing trains, the value to be ascertained by appraisers chosen as therein provided, the court held the provision of the act unconstitutional, as such legislature had no power to deprive any person or corporation of the right of trial by jury in a common-law action, where the amount involved exceeded twenty dollars. Dacres v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 1 Wash. 525.

VII. State constitution.

Generally, it may be said that the state constitutions provide that the right to trial by jury in civil causes shall remain inviolate, but by section 27 of article 6 of the Constitution of Michigan, the right to trial by jury remains but is deemed waived in all civil cases, unless demanded by one party in the manner prescribed by law.

And it has been held that under the Mississippi constitution, the right to trial by jury exists in all cases where by common law it was requisite. Isom v. Mississippi Cent. R. Co. 36 Miss. 300.

By section 1 of article 5 of the Constitution of South Carolina of 1882 (Gen. Stat. 1882, p. 39) the general assembly has power to pass laws necessary and proper to discharge differences by arbitrators, to be appointed by parties choosing that summary mode of adjustment.

ment, as well as a plea or notice of set-off, always admitted the plaintiff's claim. They were pleas of confession and avoidance. Jacobs, Law Dict. and Tomlins, Law Dict. title Set-Off; 2 Parsons, Cont. 734; 2 Bl. Com. 305. A "set-off" is defined to be "a mode of defense whereby the defendant acknowledges the justice of the plaintiff's demand, on the one hand, but, on the other, sets upon a demand of his own to counterbalance it, either in whole or in part." Blackstone, at the page cited, says: "To this head may also be referred the practice of what is called a 'set-off,' whereby the defendant acknowledges the justice of the plaintiff's demand, on the one hand, but, on the other, sets up a demand of his own to counterbalance that of the plaintiff, either in the whole or in part, as if the plaintiff sues for ten pounds due on a note of hand, the defendant may set-off nine pounds due to himself for merchandise sold to the plaintiff, and, in case he pleads such set-off, must pay the remaining balance into court." In 2 Parsons, Cont. p. 734, it is said: "'Set-off' has been well defined as a mode of defense by which the defendant acknowledges the justice of the plaintiff's demand, but sets up a demand of his own against the plaintiff to counterbalance it, in whole or in part." And again, at page 741, it is said: "The essential difference between recoupment or reduction, on the one hand, and set-off, on the other, is that in set-off the ground taken by the defendant is that he may owe the plaintiff what he claims, but a part of the whole of the debt is paid, in reason and justice, by a distinct and unconnected debt which the plaintiff owes him." So, under the Act of 1714, it was not possible for the defendant to give notice of his set-off and at the same time dispute the plaintiff's claim. He could not have done so, even if the statute had not expressly provided that he could give notice of his set-off only in case he was not able to gainsay the plaintiff's claim. His plea of payment, with notice of set-off, necessarily confessed the claim. If the words "cannot gainsay," etc., did not condition the right of set-off, then they were absolutely without meaning, and no purpose for their use can be plausibly suggested, or even conceived. Besides this express limitation, the whole framework of the statute shows that the right of set-off was limited to cases where the plaintiff's claim was not in dispute, as the set-off was to be allowed—not against the claim or debt of the plaintiff found or established or actually existing—but against "the debt or sum demanded." These words quoted are not found in the English statutes of set-off, but are found in all the statutes upon the subject in this state until the Revised Statutes, when they, as well as the words "cannot gainsay," are for the first time omitted. The Statute of 1714 was re enacted, slightly changed, February 27, 1788, in the act "For the amendment of the law and the better advancement of justice;" and again the defendant, in case he could not gainsay the plaintiff's claim, was allowed, with the plea of payment, to give notice of set off. By the act, chapter 90 of the Laws of 1801,—a general practice act under the same title,—it was provided that the defendant, in case he could not gainsay the plaintiff's claim, could plead the general issue, instead of payment, as before, and with that give notice of set-off. It was also provided in that act—for the first time, in this state—that "it shall be lawful for any defendant or tenant in any action in any court of record to plead the general issue and to give any special matter in evidence which, if pleaded, would be a bar to such action, giving notice with the said plea of the matter or several matters so intended to be given in evidence;" and also "that it shall be lawful for any defendant or tenant in any action, or for any plaintiff in replevin, in any court of record, with the leave of the same court, to plead as many several matters as he shall think necessary for his defense." All these provisions were carried into the Revised Laws of 1813, including the provision allowing the defendant, if he could not gainsay the plaintiff's claim with the plea of the general issue, to give notice of his set-off; and so the law remained until the Revised Statutes. Under these Acts of 1801 and 1813, it was held that the notice of set-off could only accompany the general issue, and no other plea, as before it could only accompany the plea of payment. Alsop v. Caines, 10 Johns. 396; Caines v. Brisbane, 13 Johns. 9; Root v. Taylor, 20 Johns. 137; Wheeler v. Raymond, 5 Cow. 231.

Under these acts, what was meant by the words "if the defendant cannot gainsay" the plaintiff's claim? They are not found in any statute of set-off in England, or elsewhere in this country. Did the lawmakers in 1801 and 1813 mean to change the prior practice, which had obtained when the notice of set-off was allowed with the plea of payment? Did they mean to deprive these words, which before had a meaning, of all meaning? Did they mean to permit the defendant to gainsay the plaintiff's claim when he was unable to do it? I believe they did not. They had not yet reached the stage of law reform which allows several actions to be tried in one. They were evidently not convinced of the wisdom and feasibility of allowing the defendant to litigate the plaintiff's claim and his own independent claims at the same time, and in the same action, and I do not believe that such a practice ever obtained in this state prior to the revised statutes. The lawmakers allowed the notice of set-off to go with the general issue because under that, as under the plea of payment, the defendant could show payment. The general issue was a mere formal plea to sustain or give place for the notice of set-off, and not to authorize the defendant to litigate or dispute the plaintiff's claim upon the trial. I have not overlooked the cases of Gordon v. Bowne, 2 Johns. 150; Burgess v. Tucker, 5 Johns. 105; O'Callahan v. Sawyer, Id. 118; Tuttle v. Bebee, 8 Johns. 152; Root v. Taylor, 20 Johns. 137; Bridge v. Johnson, 5 Wend. 342. In none of these cases was it held that the defendant could avail himself of his set-off upon the trial, and at the same time dispute and litigate the plaintiff's claim. The only case, which has come to my attention, which gives any countenance whatever to such a practice, is that of Gordon

v. Bowen, where the question upon the plaintiff's claim was one of law, upon undisputed facts, and the decision there proceeded upon the ground that the set-off was not proper; and it was never held, in any reported case, that the words "cannot gainsay," etc., did not have the meaning and force which I have attributed to them. But whether I am mistaken or not as to the meaning of these words when the notice of set-off accompanied the general issue is of no importance, as I cannot be mistaken as to their meaning when the notice of set-off was required to accompany the plea of payment only.

It was provided in 2 Geo. II., chapter 23, section 18, that "where there are mutual debts between the plaintiff and defendant, . . . one debt may be set against the other, and such matter may be given in evidence upon the general issue, or pleaded in bar, as the nature of the case shall require, so as at the time of his pleading the general issue, where any such debt of the defendant is intended to be insisted on in evidence, notice shall be given of the particular sum or debt so intended to be insisted on, and upon what account it became due, or otherwise such matter shall not be allowed in evidence upon the general issue." This clause was made perpetual by the Act, 8 Geo. II., chapter 24, section 4, and it having been doubted whether mutual debts of a different nature could be set against each other, that doubt was removed by section 5, which authorized the set-off, notwithstanding the debts were deemed in law to be of a different nature; and it was provided that, when the debt due to the defendant was less than that due from him, he must, on pleading such set-off, pay the remaining balance into court. Under the English statutes, it was held that notice of set-off could be given only with the general issue. 1 Chitty, Pl. 606. As I have before stated, there was no provision in the English statutes allowing the defendant to give notice of his set-off only in case he was not able to gainsay the plaintiff's claim; and some years before the passage of these acts, by the Statutes of 4 & 5 Anne, it was provided, as afterwards, in this state, in the Acts of 1801 and 1813, that the defendant could, with the leave of the court, plead as many matters to the declaration of the plaintiff as he should think necessary for his defense. In drafting the Act of 1801, which was carried into the Act of 1813, the lawmakers here had before them the English statutes; and why did they continue the provision that the defendant could give notice of his set-off only in case he could not dispute the plaintiff's claim, if it was to have no meaning and effect, and if the statutes here were to have the same operation as the English statutes?

This review of the statutes shows clearly that prior to 1777, and for many years thereafter, a defendant was not permitted to set off his claims against the plaintiff's claims, except he admitted them. The provision for set-offs took this limited form to meet the obvious injustice of a case where the defendant was not able to gainsay the plaintiff's claims, but yet had set-offs sufficient, in whole or in part, to pay and discharge them; and thus it is clear that prior to that period there was no possible way of depriving the plaintiff of a trial by jury in case his cause of action was gainsaid. There can, therefore, be absolutely no ground for saying that these accounts in this answer, which disputes and gainsays the plaintiff's claim, could prior to 1777, have been set up as a defense to the action, or that prior to that time there was any possible way for depriving the parties of a jury trial upon the issues formed upon the plaintiff's cause of action.

It would not be useful now to examine more particularly the statutes as to set-offs and references enacted since 1777, as there has been no power in the legislature since that time to curtail the right of trial by jury. It could not do so by changing the form of pleadings, or by allowing set-offs and counterclaims where they could not have been interposed prior to that time. In the Acts of 1788, 1801, and 1813, and in the revised statutes and the code, the power to refer actions is continued in substantially the same language as that used in the Act of 1768; and in the revised statutes, for the first time, as I believe, was the defendant enabled to plead or give notice of a set-off, and at the same time put in issue, and contest upon the trial, the cause of action alleged in the declaration. I can safely assert that prior to the revised statutes there is no record in any book of any cause compulsorily referred, where the complaint stated a disputed cause of action not involving the examination of a long account. I have examined all the old works on Practice, and all the earlier Reports, and have found no trace or hint of a practice that would authorize a reference in such a case as this; and since the adoption of the revised statutes, and the introduction of the code practice, I am confident there is no reported decision of any court of this state which sanctions the reference of an action merely because the answer involves a long account, when, upon the cause of action alleged in the complaint, standing by itself, either party could demand a jury trial, except the decision in the court below in this case, and in the cases where, upon appeals to this court, the decisions of the lower courts were reversed. If it should be asserted that the right of trial by jury had, by the practice and usage of the courts, become curtailed, prior to any of the modern revisions of the constitution, so as to give the meaning of the guaranty as to jury trial a more limited scope than it had in the Constitution of 1777, I answer that the assertion is unfounded.

I will now call attention to some decisions in this court. In Townsend v. Hendricks, 40 How. Pr. 143, the action was to recover back certain bonds and money obtained from the plaintiff by the fraudulent representations of the defendant; and to that action the defendant interposed a counterclaim requiring the examination of a long account. That case was literally within the law as to references, as it did involve the examination of a long account upon one side; and yet, after a careful consideration of the case, in the first opinion written by the late Judge Rapallo in this court, it was held that the action was not referable. In that opinion it was said: "It is further contended that the defendants have, by interposing a counterclaim consisting of a long account, rendered the examination of such account necessary. It does not follow that the action can be referred for that reason. If the action is, from its nature, not referable, the answer cannot make it so. Should the counterclaim ever require examination, a reference can be ordered, as to it, after trial of the issues." There the cause of action alleged in the complaint was such that prior to 1777 a long account could not have appeared in the answer; and hence the action could not have been referred, and both parties would have had the right to a jury trial, and hence no subsequent legislation could take away that right. In Welsh v. Darragh, 52 N. Y. 590, the action was upon contract for the sale and delivery of various articles of merchandise, and the cause of action alleged in the complaint would require the examination of a long account. The answer set up fraud in the transaction, and claimed damages by way of recoupment or counterclaim; and there Chief Judge Church, writing the opinion, again announced the doctrine that the character of the action is determined by the complaint, and if that allege a cause of action upon contract, involving a long account, the action is referable, and that although the answer sets up fraud in the transaction, and claims damages by way of recoupment or counterclaim, that does not change the character of the action, or render it nonreferable; and there the order of reference was affirmed, as the complaint made the action referable under the Act of 1768. The question again came before this court in Untermeyer v. Beinhauer, 105 N. Y. 521. There the cause of action alleged in the complaint was for the recovery of unliquidated damages for breach of contract, and in no sense involved an account. The answer contained a counterclaim which required the examination of a long account; and the court again held (Judge Rapallo writing the opinion) that as the cause of action alleged in the complaint was not referable, it could not be made so by the counterclaim. In the opinion he referred to the language above quoted, which he used in the case of Townsend v. Hendricks. Why was not that action referable? It involved the examination of a long account, on one side, and thus the case was literally within the language of the Act of 1768. The answer is very plain. It was not an action upon a long account; the cause of action alleged in the complaint was not referable; it was put in issue; and therefore, although the defendant set up a counterclaim containing a long account, as he had the right to do, the action was not thereby made referable, and the defendant did not lose his right to demand a jury trial. When he put in issue the plaintiff's cause of action, if for no other reason, a case was made which could not have been referred under the Act of 1768. In Cassidy v. McFarland, 189 N. Y. 201, 205, Maynard, J., said: "It is sufficient if the fact clearly appears from the verified pleadings that the examination of a long account will be involved in the trial of the issues. The referable quality of the action must alone be determined from the complaint." In New Jersey the law authorizes the reference of "all actions in which matters of account are in controversy;" and in Gopsill v. Hervey, 34 N. J. L. 435, it is said "that it is the character of the plaintiff's claim which determines whether the case is referable." In Hall v. United States Reflector Co. 14 N. Y. Week. Dig. 48, 95 N. Y. 648, and 96 N. Y. 629, the plaintiff's cause of action was expressly admitted, and the litigation was over matters alleged in the defendant's answer, and which, in any view of the case, involved long accounts.

The construction I give to the Acts of 1714 and 1768 is neither narrow nor technical. It is dictated by the spirit of the times in which those acts were in force, when there was greater reverence for trial by jury than exists now; is required by their letter and spirit, leads to no absurd or inconvenient results, and is, as I believe, in harmony with the established practice of the courts for more than 125 years. I would speak with less confidence if one authority entitled to any weight in this court, holding otherwise, could be found. The meaning of the words, "require the examination of a long account, either on the one side or the other," and of their analogues in the more recent statutes, has been frequently under consideration in the courts, and the words have not always been literally construed. They have required construction, and their literal meaning has frequently been limited, as is shown by decisions of this court above cited, and by many other decisions. To say that a cause of action is referable in its nature when it has not, of itself, a single referable quality, and which cannot, on account of anything pertaining to it, be referred, is a most inaccurate use of language; and it is, to me, inconceivable that Judges Rapallo, Church, and Maynard, in the opinions above cited, used the expression as meaning a cause of action which could only be made referable by something appearing in the answer.

This discussion, therefore, comes to this: If the plaintiff brings his action upon a long account then it is such as was referable prior to 1777; and, as the examination of a long account is required on his side, the defendant cannot defeat a reference by anything he may set up in his answer, by virtue of the statutes allowing set-offs and counterclaims. If the plaintiff's cause of action be upon contract, for a definite sum of money, or for damages ex contractu, and this cause of action be not gainsaid by the defendant, and the defendant sets up a counterclaim which requires the examination of a long account, then the case is such as would have been referable under the Act of 1768. But if, in such actions, the plaintiff's cause of action be disputed, then a case is presented which, prior to 1777, gave the parties the absolute right to jury trial; and that right cannot be taken away or destroyed by anything which the defendant may set up in his answer. These views furnish a plain rule for the guidance of courts, resting upon a solid basis, and I think it would be most unwise to countenance any other practice. According to the contention now made on behalf of the plaintiff, for the purpose of distinguishing this case from that of Untermeyer v. Beinhauer, if the plaintiff brings an action to recover $1,000, payable to him by virtue of a contract, the defendant may dispute his claim, and set up a counterclaim which requires the examination of a long account, and then the action becomes referable. But if he sues upon a contract,—possibly, the same contract,—seeking to recover $1,000, unliquidated damages for a breach thereof, and his claim is disputed by the defendant, who also sets up a counterclaim requiring the examination of a long account, the action is not referable. Such a distinction is not founded in reason, and no rule of convenience or of public policy requires that it should be adopted. The following authorities may also be referred to as sustaining the conclusion I have reached: 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 670; Williams v. Allen, 2 Hun, 877; Wood v. Hope, 2 Abb. N. C. 186; Verplanck v. Kendall, 18 Jones & S. 525; Gregory v. Seaman, 19 Jones & S. 517. This conclusion preserves to the parties the constitutional right to trial by jury of the issues upon a nonreferable cause of action alleged in the complaint, and a right to the reference of the long accounts set up in the answer; and thus all the statutes have full force and effect, and the decisions of the courts are harmonized, and rendered consistent.

The orders of the general and special terms should, therefore, be reversed, and motion for reference denied, with costs in all the courts.

Andrews, Ch. J., dissenting:

This appeal involves the question of the power of the court, under the state constitution and laws, to order a compulsory reference of the action. The action is on contract, and is referable in its nature. But, having regard alone to the cause of action set forth in the complaint, it was not the subject of a compulsory reference, for the reason that no long account was involved. The action was to recover four months' salary alleged to be due and unpaid to the plaintiff under a contract of employment at an annual salary of $6,000. The defendant answered, denying the complaint, and in, addition, pleaded several defenses, by way of counterclaim, arising on matters of account; and the answer concluded by prayer for judgment that the plaintiff account for the moneys mentioned in the second and third counterclaims, and that the defendant recover the sum which might be found due from the plaintiff to the defendant on such accounting. The plaintiff replied, denying the counterclaims, and then, upon the pleadings and proceedings, and upon affidavit, moved for an order of reference, on the ground, in substance, that upon the facts disclosed it appeared that the trial of the issue on the third counterclaim in the answer would involve the examination of a long account. The motion was opposed by the defendant, but was granted; and an order of reference was made, from which the defendant appealed to the general term of the first department, which affirmed the order, and from the order of affirmance this appeal is taken. It was competent for the judge who granted the order to find, upon the facts presented, that the trial of the issue on the third counterclaim would involve the examination of a long account, and that on the trial none of the issues would require the decision of any difficult questions of law; and this finding, having been affirmed by the general term, is not reviewable here. The appeal, therefore, presents the question whether a compulsory reference may be directed, in an action on contract to recover stipulated payments, upon it being made to appear that, although no long account will be involved in maintaining the plaintiff's cause of action, nevertheless such account will be involved, and will be litigated, on the issue raised by the counterclaim in the answer. The question presented, in another form, is whether a cause of action referable in its nature, but which cannot be referred of itself, alone, because not involving the examination of a long account, may be referred, against the protest of either party, if a counterclaim, also arising upon contract, is interposed, which will involve the examination of a long account.

If the power to order a compulsory reference in this case depends alone on section 1018 of the Code of Civil Procedure, there can be no doubt that the court had jurisdiction to make the order. The language of the section is explicit and unambiguous. It authorizes a compulsory reference where the trial of an action will involve an examination of a long account "on either side" and there are no difficult questions of law. It needs no gloss or argument to show that the case in hand is within the express language of the section. There is a long account on the side of the defendant, arising on its counterclaim, and the legal questions involved are of the simplest character. The words "on either side," in section 1018, are not new, as applied to compulsory references. Compulsory references were first authorized by the Colonial Statute of 1768. 2 Van Schaick's Laws, p. 517. The act is entitled "An act for the better determination of personal actions depending on accounts." The first section authorizes a compulsory reference whenever it shall appear probable "in any case depending in the supreme court of judicature of this colony (other than such as shall be brought by or against executors or administrators) that the trial of the same will require the examination of a long account either on the one side or the other." The law authorizing compulsory references has been re-enacted in the successive revisions of the laws since the organization of the state government, and in all of them the language of the Colonial Statute of 1768, that a reference may be ordered when it shall appear that the trial of an action will involve the examination of a long account "either on the one side or the other," has been, in substance, retained and continued; so that at no time since 1768 have these words not been incorporated in the law relating to compulsory references. Laws 1788, chap. 46; Laws 1801, chap. 90; Laws

But the claim is made that, notwithstanding the broad and unqualified language of the statute, the constitutional right of trial by jury stands in the way of a compulsory reference of actions on contract, where the plaintiff's debt or demand is put in issue by the answer, and the necessity for the examination of a long account only arises upon a set-off or counterclaim interposed by the defendant. It is insisted that the words "on either side," in the statutes regulating compulsory reference, are, by the operation of the constitution, to be construed with this implied limitation. The Constitution of 1777 ordained that "trial by jury in all cases in which it hath heretofore been used in the colony of New York shall be established and remain inviolate forever;" and the same provision, in substance, is to be found in each of the subsequent state constitutions. Under the Dutch rule, all actions were triable by the court, and trial by jury was unknown. The question whether actions were referable never arose. There was no need of references, except for the information of the court. The argument is that the right of a defendant, during the colonial period, to interpose a set-off, depended upon, and was limited by, the statute of set-off enacted by the colony of New York in 1714 (Van Schaick's Laws, p. 95), and which continued in force until the Revolution, and that that statute confined the right of set-off to cases where the defendant admitted on the record the plaintiff's claim, and did not authorize a defendant to put the plaintiff's claim in issue, and at the same time to interpose a set-off. It is insisted, therefore, that the words, "either on the one side or on the other," in the Act of 1768, authorizing compulsory references, must be construed as referring only to cases where a long account was connected with the plaintiff's claim, or arose on the defendant's set-off interposed in connection with an admission of the demand of the plaintiff. The conclusion is therefore deduced that the power of compulsory reference, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1777, not having been extended to cases of set-off connected with a denial of the plaintiff's claim, the right of trial by jury, in such a case, then existed, and was forever preserved by the constitution. This argument and conclusion, even if founded upon correct premises, is very technical, and unsatisfactory in its results; but it also proceeds, as I think, upon a misapprehension of the true meaning of the constitutional provision. But the argument puts upon the Statute of 1714 a construction contrary to the practical construction uniformly applied by the courts to statutes of like character. The clause in the Statute of 1714 (Van Schaick's Laws, p. 93) authorizing set-offs—that "if the defendant cannot gainsay the deed, bargain, or assumption upon which he is sued, it shall be lawful for such defendant to plead payment of all or any part of the debt or sum demanded, giving notice in writing with the said plea upon what he will insist at the trial for his discharge, and give any bond, bill, receipt, account or bargain so given notice of in evidence"—is claimed to limit the right of set-off under the statute to cases where the defendant admits, and does not put in issue, the plaintiff's demand. But the words "cannot gainsay the deed, bargain, or assumption upon which he is sued," and the subsequent words, were inserted simply to declare a rule of pleading, and to enable a defendant who had no defense to the plaintiff's claim to prove, under a plea of payment, a set-off, of which notice had been given; and these words were not intended to confine the right of set-off to cases where the defendant affirmatively admits the plaintiff's demand. There are no negative words. Proof of disconnected demands would not support the plea of payment, except by statute. If there might originally have been a question as to the construction of the statute in this respect, the construction put by the courts upon similar words has removed any doubt. The Statute of Set-off of 1714 and the Act of 1768, authorizing compulsory references, were, in substance, re-enacted and incorporated into the "Act for the amendment of the law and the better advancement of justice," of February 27, 1788, chap. 46 (2 Greenl. Laws, 102); also, in the act of the same title, chapter 90 of the Laws of 1801 (1 Webster, Laws, p. 847); also, in the Laws of 1818, 1 Rev. Laws, chap. 56, p. 515. In each of these statutes the section relating to set-offs contains the same words found in the Statute of 1714, "if the defendant or defendants cannot gainsay the deed, bargain, or assumption upon which he, she or they is or are sued, it shall be lawful," etc. Numerous cases are found in the Reports of this state, commencing from an early period after the formation, of the state government, arising under these statutes, where, in connection with the general issue, the defendant gave notice of set-off. The set-off was in some cases allowed, and in some cases disallowed; but in none of them was it suggested by court or counsel that the defendant, in order to avail himself of the right of set-off, must admit the plaintiff's demand. On the contrary, not only was the plaintiff's claim put in issue in all these cases, but in some of them it was litigated on the trial. Gordon v. Bowne, 2 Johns. 150; Burgess v. Tucker, 5 Johns. 105; O'Callahan v. Sawyer, Id. 118; Tuttle v. Bebee, 8 Johns. 152; Root v. Taylor, 20 Johns. 137; Bridge v. Johnson, 5 Wend. 842. These cases refute the claim that prior to the revised statutes a defendant could not contest by his pleading, and upon the trial, the plaintiff's claim, and at the same time insist upon a set-off in case he failed to establish his defense to the plaintiff's cause of action. It cannot be supposed that the judges and lawyers of that time were unacquainted with the practice of the colonial courts, or that they overlooked so easy an answer to the defense of set-off as that furnished by the words, "if the defendant cannot gainsay the deed, bargain, or assumption upon which he is sued," if they have the construction now claimed for them. It is noticeable that, in the case of Root v. Taylor, Spencer, Ch. J., quotes the Statute of 1818, and included in the quotation are the words, "if the defendant cannot gainsay," etc.; and in that case, which was assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, the defendant had pleaded the general issue, with notice of set-off.

The rule that a defendant may at the same time deny the plaintiff's claim, and give notice of set-off, and thereby put the defendant to proof of his demand, prevailed in England under the English statutes of set-off, 2 Geo. II., chap. 22, § 13, and 8 Geo. II., chap. 24, § 4. Harington v. Macmorris, 5 Taunt. 228, was an action for money had and received, money lent, etc. The defendant pleaded the general issue, with notice of set-off, the particulars of which were furnished. The jury found against the set-off. The plaintiff relied for the proof of his claim on the admission of the notice of set-off, and had a verdict. The verdict was set aside on the ground that the admission in the notice of set-off was not available to the plaintiff to establish his demand. Lord Mansfield said: "It is every day's practice that the defendant's language in one plea cannot be used to disprove another plea, as in the familiar instance I have given of trespass, and justification pleaded, when the justification would certainly, if admissible, prove the act in case the reason of justification fails. Therefore, the particulars of the set-off must be incorporated with the notice of set-off, and cannot be given in evidence to prove the plaintiff's demand on the issue of nonassumpsit." The quotation from Blackstone (3 Com. p. 304) is quite consistent with the opinion of Lord Mansfield. The commentator is there speaking of the rule relating to tender, and the payment of money into court to mitigate damages and costs; and he says, in substance, that under a plea of set-off (which, standing alone, necessarily admits the plaintiff's claim) it is necessary, if the set-off does not equal the plaintiff's debt, that the defendant should pay the balance into court, to have the benefit of tender in mitigation of further costs, etc. The rule that the general issue, with notice of special matter, puts in issue the plaintiff's cause of action, is elementary. 1 Chitty, Pl. 478; Vaughan v. Havens, 8 Johns. 109. It has been frequently applied by other courts in this country in case of set-off. Price v. Combs, 12 N. J. L. 216; Morgan v. Boons, 1 J. J. Marsh. 585. There are no records showing the practical construction placed by the colonial courts upon the Statute of 1714 upon the point now in question; but the English statutes of set-off were enacted nearly fifty years before the organization of our state government, under which the practice prevailed of permitting a defendant to deny the plaintiff's claim in connection with notice or plea of set-off. It is presumable that the same practice was followed in the colony, and the practice of the state courts, following the English practice under statutes similar to that of 1714, makes this presumption almost a certainty. The English decisions, says Chief Justice Kent in Gordon v. Bowne, on the construction of the English statute of set-off, "are perfectly in point as to the construction of our act," and statutes of set-off from the time of their enactment, have been "liberally expounded to advance justice, and prevent circuitry of action." Thompson, J., in Tuttle v. Bebes, 8 Johns. 152. The argument against the power to order a compulsory reference in this case, based upon the assumption that when the Constitution of 1777 was adopted no long account could be litigated, arising on a set-off, except where the defendant admitted the plaintiff's claim, and that the Act of 1768, authorizing compulsory references, did not apply in a case like the present one, where the plaintiff's claim is denied, proceeds upon false premises, and cannot be maintained.

But there is, I think, another conclusive answer to the objection based on the constitution. The words in the Constitution of 1777, "trial by jury in all cases in which it hath heretofore been used in the colony of New York, shall be established and remain inviolable forever," were intended to preserve the right of jury trial in the classes of cases where trial by jury before, as of right, existed. In expounding this provision, the principle which governed the colonial practice permitting compulsory references is to be applied. Cases of the same class, and governed by the same principle of public policy, as those within the Act of 1768, may be referred, consistently with the constitutional provision, although the exact case in hand was not within the terms of that statute. The policy upon which the Statute of 1768 was enacted is recited in the preamble, which, after referring to the disuse of the action of account, and to the Law of 1714 permitting discounts in support of the plea of payment, proceeds to declare: "So that by the change in the law and practice above mentioned, the suits of merchants and others upon long accounts are exposed to erroneous decisions and jurors perplexed and rendered more liable to attainments, and by the vast time necessarily consumed on such trials, other causes are delayed and the general course of justice greatly obstructed; it is enacted, therefore," etc. It cannot be supposed that the Constitution of 1777 intended to prevent a reference of cases of the same general class as those specified in the Act of 1768, and as to which the same considerations of public policy applied, even although, by reason of the rules of pleading and procedure prevailing in the colony, a set-off in a particular case involving the examination of a long account was not permitted. The principle established by the colonial legislation was that actions on contract involving litigations of long accounts "on either side" should be referred for trial to referees, to relieve jurors from perplexity, and to prevent the obstruction of justice. This legislative power was not abrogated by the constitution. It would be a narrow and injurious construction of the constitutional provision that, unless you are able to point out the precise case under colonial laws, a compulsory reference cannot be had. The Act of 1768 excepted from its operation suits "brought by or against executors or administrators." This exception was expressly abrogated in the Act of 1788 and the subsequent statutes of the state. But this abrogation of the exception was inoper-ative, and in violation of the constitution, if you say that no compulsory reference can be authorized in any case not referable under the colonial laws, although the case is within the principle and policy upon which these laws were based. If the constitution restricts, as is claimed, the power of compulsory reference to the exact cases specified in the colonial Act of 1768, then I perceive no escape from the conclusion that whenever, now, an executor or administrator is a party to an action, it cannot be compulsorily referred, although the action may be on contract, and involves a long account on either or both sides. The present case is an action on contract, for debt. The set-off was also a matter of account. It was properly pleaded. The statute of set-off permits the defendant to contest the plaintiff's claim, and at the same time to insist upon a set-off. The trial of the set-off involves the examination of a long account. The statute permits a compulsory reference, in such case; and no constitutional right, I am persuaded, stands in the way of its enforcement.

But it is said that the question involved in this case has been decided adversely to the power exercised in three cases in this court, viz.: Townsend v. Hendricks, 40 How. Pr. 148; Welsh v. Darragh, 52 N. Y. 590; and Untermeyer v. Beinhauer, 105 N. Y. 521. This is a plain misapprehension. It is said in those cases that the referable character of an action is to be determined by the complaint. This was an accurate expression, having reference to the cases in which it was used, and the sense intended. Bearing in mind two well-settled principles established by the decisions—First, that actions ex delicto were not the subject of compulsory reference, either in the colony of New York or afterwards, Johnson v. Parmely, 17 Johns. 129; Green v. Patchen, 18 Wend. 293; Dederick v. Richley, 19 Wend. 108; second, that set-offs are not allowed in actions for unliquidated damages, although arising on contract, "as for not delivering goods according to contract," 1 Chitty, Pl. 572; Duncan v. Lyon, 8 Johns. Ch. 351, 1 L. ed. 644, 8 Am. Dec. 513; Hepburn v. Hoag, 6 Cow. 614,—the principle upon which the decisions in this court proceeded in the cases referred to is readily ascertained. Townsend v. Hendricks was an action for damages for false representations. The court, after referring to the pleadings, said: "The action must therefore be held to be one founded in tort, and not referable, against the will of either party." Welsh v. Darragh was an action on a contract for the sale and delivery of merchandise sold by the plaintiff to the defendant. The defendant, among other things, set up in his answer fraud and deceit in the sale of certain other merchandise, not included in the complaint. A reference having been ordered on the application of the plaintiff, the defendant appealed from the order. He resisted the reference on the ground that the issue of fraud raised by the answer was not referable, seeking to apply to the case the rule that actions of tort are not the subject of compulsory reference. This court affirmed the order of reference, and, in its opinion, first stated that, the action being on contract, the case was referable in its nature. The court then considered the claim of the defendant that the issue of fraud raised by the answer prevented the order of reference, and, deciding against this construction, said: "If the action is a referable one, the answer cannot make it non-referable." Having disposed of these questions, it proceeded to consider whether, upon the facts, a long account was involved in the plaintiff's cause of action, and, reaching a conclusion that there was, affirmed the order. There is no hint in the opinion of the doctrine now contended for,—that in an action upon contract a compulsory reference may not be ordered, where the examination of a long account will become necessary on the trial of a counterclaim arising on contract, unless the plaintiff's cause of action involves the examination of a long account, or the plaintiff's claim is admitted. Untermeyer v. Beinhauer, was an action to recover unliquidated damages for the breach by a builder of a building contract; and the court held that such an action was never referable, against the will of either party, saying: "It was simply an action for unliquidated damages for the breach of a contract, and in no sense involved any account." Neither of these cases sustain, or tend to sustain, the contention here. The case of Kain v. Delano, decided by this court, and reported in 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 29, was an appeal from an order of reference made on the ground that the trial of an issue raised by a counterclaim would require the examination of a long account. The plaintiff's claim consisted of but a single item, and was denied by the answer, which also set up a counterclaim. This court reversed the order of reference on the ground that the fact upon which the order proceeded did not appear. It assumed that the order would have been justified if it had appeared that the issue on the counterclaim would require the examination of a long account. The rule here contended for is plain, simple, and practical. It is consistent with the constitution. It is in harmony with the public policy upon which statutes for compulsory references are based. The opposite rule violates the language of all statutes on the subject framed since colonial times. It is based on views so close and critical that they can be comprehended only with difficulty. It puts it in the power of a plaintiff, by exaggerating his own claim, to prevent its admission by the defendant, and thereby defeat a reference of a long account arising on a counterclaim. If the order in this case is reversed, the court will, I think, reverse the practice which has prevailed in the courts of this state without question for more than a hundred years. It is the strongest confirmation of the view that the words "on either side" mean what they plainly import, that no suggestion can be found in any of the Reports, so far as I can discover, of the limitation now contended for. If a practice prevailed in opposition to the natural import of the words, a trace of it would have been found. There would have been some judge or lawyer who would have queried how this could be. The distinction is between actions of a referable quality, and such as are not referable by their very nature. In the one class the court may compel a reference, if on "either side" there is a long account; in the other, no reference can be compelled, however many items of damage there may be. I think the order should be affirmed.

All concur with Earl, J., for reversal, except Andrews, Ch. J., and Finch and O'Brien, JJ., dissenting.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

George W. WOOLSEY, Admr., etc., of Harry Y. Woolsey, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,

v.

CHICAGO, BURLINGTON & QUINCY R. CO.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. A person riding on the locomotive engine of a freight train, by agreement with the fireman of such engine to shovel coal for the privilege of riding (such person being on such train without the knowledge or consent of the conductor in charge thereof), is not a passenger of the carrier operating such train.

2. To constitute one a passenger of the carrier on whose train such a person is, it is essential that such person should be rightfully on such train, or should be thereon with the knowledge or consent of the carrier, or its agent in charge of such train.

3. In a suit by an administrator against a common carrier for damages for negligently causing the death of his intestate, it appeared that the deceased was a man eighteen years of age; that he rode on a locomotive engine by permission of the fireman thereof, agreeing with him to handle coal in consideration of being permitted to ride; that the conductor in charge of the train did not know of the deceased's presence on the engine; that the fireman told the deceased to get off the engine before the train reached McCook, for, should he be found on the engine at that place, he would be arrested; that no one attempted or threatened to put deceased off the engine; that the fireman did not tell the deceased to get off at the time and place he did; that there was no impending danger from a wreck, collision, or otherwise, which caused deceased to jump from the engine. The administrator pleaded: "When said engine was running at a rate of speed which made it dangerous to life to attempt to alight therefrom," the deceased jumped from the engine and was killed, and was induced to make such jump by the fear of arrest, should he be found thereon when the engine stopped. Held: (1) That the deceased was not a passenger of the carrier on whose engine he was riding; (2) that reasonable men can draw but one conclusion as to the character of the act of the deceased in leaping from the engine at the time and under the circumstances that he did, and that conclusion is that the act of the deceased was criminal negligence, and the proximate cause of his death; (3) that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the carrier, or its servants, which the trial court would have been justified in submitting to the consideration of the jury; (4) that the trial court did not err in instructing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the carrier.

ERROR to the District Court for Nuckolls County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. D. F. Osgood for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. T. M. Marquett and J. W. De-weese, for defendant in error:

Virginia Midland R. Co. v. Roach, 83 Va. 375, holds that where the engineer of a train invited another to ride on the engine, and even though he was there by the invitation of the engineer, and both the engineer and conductor, he was still a trespasser upon the train, the rules of the company prohibiting any person from riding on the engine excepting the engineer and fireman, and that such a person had no claim against the company for personal injuries sustained by him through the negligence of the company's servants.

Robertson v. New York & E. R. Co. 22 Barb. 91, holds that where the engineer gave his consent to the plaintiff to ride on the engine without paying fare, it conferred no legal right upon the plaintiff, and that not being lawfully on the engine, he was a wrongdoer and could not recover damages of the company for an injury sustained while riding in that place.

Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Michie, 83 Ill. 428, holds that an engine driver has no authority or right to say who shall ride upon the train, or give permission to any one to ride upon his engine against the rules of the company.

Where a verdict in favor of the plaintiff would be set aside by the court for the reason that the plaintiff under the pleadings and evidence is not entitled to recover, it is the duty of the court to direct a verdict and avoid the trouble and expense of another trial.

Ragan, C., filed the following opinion:

George W. Woolsey, administrator, sued the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company (hereinafter called the railroad company), in the district court of Nuckolls county, for damages for negligently causing the death of his intestate, Harry Y. Woolsey. At the close of the evidence the jury, in obedience to an instruction of the court to that effect, returned a verdict for the railroad company. The court refused to set this aside, and overruled a motion for a new trial, and the administrator brings the case here for review.

The evidence in the record shows, or tends to show, that the deceased, at the time of his death, was eighteen years of age, and, on the day that he was killed, he and a man named Guidici, his companion, by an agreement with the fireman of an engine pulling a freight train of the railroad company that they (the deceased and Guidici) would break and shovel coal, got upon the engine of said freight train to ride; that such persons' presence on the train was without the knowledge or consent of the conductor in charge of the train; that they paid no fare, nor agreed to pay any, further than to assist the fireman in handling coal; that they were not in the employ of the railroad company, nor in any manner whatever connected with it, or the train on which they rode; that as the train was approaching the city of McCook, and running at a high rate of speed, the fireman told the deceased to get off the train before it stopped at McCook, as, if he should be found on the train there, he would be arrested; no employé of the company put, attempted, or threatened to put the deceased off the train; there was no impending or threatening danger from a wreck or collision, or otherwise, at any time; that the deceased, while the train was moving at a high and dangerous rate of speed, said to his companion that he was about to jump off; that Guidici put his hands on his shoulder, and advised him not to jump, but the deceased voluntarily jumped from the train, and was killed. It is now said by counsel for the administrator that the deceased was a passenger on this train. We do not think he was a passenger, within the meaning of any statute, rule of law, or decision, with which we are acquainted. The deceased was fraudulently on this train. He did not go upon this train having a ticket or free pass, nor with the intention of paying his fare. His agreement with the fireman to shovel coal in consideration of a ride was a fraud on the company. It was the duty of the fireman to handle the coal himself. He could not put the corporation which he served under obligations to the deceased, as a passenger, by allowing him to ride upon the engine in consideration of his shoveling coal, nor for any other consideration, certainly without the presence of the deceased on the engine being known to the conductor in charge of the train. One may become a passenger of a common carrier without ever being actually on the train of the common carrier. It is not easy to lay down a rule defining what, in all cases, constitutes one a passenger of the carrier on whose train such person is; but it is essential, to constitute one a passenger riding on a train of the carrier operating such train, that such person should be rightfully on such train, or should be thereon with the knowledge or consent of the carrier, or his agent in charge of said train. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Nichols, 8 Kan. 505, 12 Am. Rep. 475; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Brooks, 81 Ill. 245; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Michie, 83 Ill. 427.

If we should hold, as a matter of law, that the deceased, at the time he met his death, was a passenger on the train of the railroad company, the judgment here sought to be reversed would still have to be affirmed. By section 8, art. 1, chap. 72, Comp. Stat. 1893, railroad companies are made insurers of the safety of a passenger, except in cases where the injury of such passenger arises from his criminal negligence. The administrator pleaded in his petition, and the evidence supports the plea, that the decedent jumped from the train "when said engine and cars were running at a rate of speed which [made it] dangerous to life to attempt to alight there [from]." All reasonable men can draw but one conclusion as to the character of the act of the deceased in leaping from this train at the time and under the circumstances that he did, and that conclusion is that in so doing the deceased was guilty of criminal negligence. It has been many times said in this court, and so often ruled as to be no longer an open question, that "when a given state of facts is such that reasonable men may fairly differ upon the question as to whether there was negligence or not, the determination of the matter is for the jury. But, where the facts are such that all reasonable men must draw the same conclusion from them, the question is one of law, for the court." Omaha Street R. Co. v. Craig, 88 Neb. —, and the cases there cited.

The only act of negligence charged against the railroad company is that the fireman told the deceased to get off the train before it reached McCook, as, if he should be found upon the train there he would be arrested. But it is neither pleaded nor proved that the fireman told the deceased to jump off the train at the time he did jump. He told him to get off the train before it reached McCook. The deceased was not an infant of tender years, insane, or idiotic; and, as before stated he did not leap from this train in pursuance of any threat made to push him off if he did not jump, nor under the stress of a fear implanted in his mind by reason of an impending danger, wreck, or collision. There is no evidence in the record which shows that any employé of the train knew that the deceased was about to jump from the train at the time that he did. His companion, Guidici, who was a witness for the administrator, remained upon the train, and advised the deceased that it was dangerous for him to leap therefrom, and advised him not to do so. There is in all this record not one word of evidence of any negligent act or omission of duty on the part of this railroad company that conduced to the death of the deceased. We must not be understood as deciding that because the deceased was not a passenger upon the train of the railroad company,—because he was wrongfully and fraudulently on its train, and a trespasser thereon,—therefore the railroad company would not be liable for negligence in injuring or killing him. What we do decide is that the deceased, at the time he was killed, was not a passenger upon the train of the railroad company, and that the district court properly held that the uncontradicted evidence shows that he met his death, not from any negligence of the railroad company, or any of its agents or servants, but from his own criminal negligence. The law does not require of district courts to do useless things, and in this case, had the jury returned a verdict in favor of the administrator, it would have been the duty of the district court to have set such verdict aside; and in such a case the court was entirely right in directing the jury to find a verdict for the railroad company.

(.....S. Dak.....)

1. A special contract made in the state of Wisconsin, between a railroad company and a shipper, for transporting a car load of livestock and emigrant movables from a point in that state to a point in this state, is to be interpreted according to the law of the former state.
2. In an action tried in this state, where the interpretation of such contract is involved, the courts of this state will not take judicial notice of the law of Wisconsin, but such law must be alleged and proven like any other fact in the case.
3. In the absence of such proof, the law of that state will be presumed to be the same as the law of this state, and such contract will be interpreted in accordance with the law of this state.
4. By the law of this state, a common carrier of property or passengers may limit his liability by an express contract signed by the parties, except as to gross negligence, fraud, or willful wrong of such carrier or its servants.
5. A special contract for transporting a car load of livestock and emigrant movables, made between a railroad company and a shipper, in which it is stipulated that the shipper shall be entitled to pass upon the same train to care for, feed, and water his stock, and load and unload the same, at his "own risk of personal injury, from whatever cause," is a valid contract, and exonerates the railroad company from all liability for any injury to the shipper while a passenger upon such train, not caused by the gross negligence, fraud, or willful wrong of the company or its servants.
6. If when acting under such contract, the shipper is injured while unloading his stock at the place of destination, by reason of the negligence of the railroad company or of its servants, not amounting to gross negligence, such railroad company is exonerated from liability for such injury.
7. The shipper, while unloading his stock under such contract, is within the exemption clause of the contract,

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Day County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. H. Field, with Mr. John H. Perry, for appellant:

Sections 3886, 3887, and 3888 provide, in substance, that the obligations of a common carrier may be limited by a special contract, except as against liability for the gross negligence, fraud, or willful wrong, of itself or its servants, by a special contract, signed by the passenger or consignor. These provisions taken together, constitute the law of this state and abrogate the rule of the common law forbidding a common carrier from limiting its liability for negligence.

Hartwell v. Northern Pacific Exp. Co. 8 L. R. A. 342, 5 Dak. 468.

The contract was made in Wisconsin. There was no evidence offered upon the trial as to the law of that state in regard to such contracts, and the presumption therefore is that the law of Wisconsin is the same as that in force in this state.

The general rule is that the validity of a contract for the carriage of persons or property from one state into another is to be determined by the law of the place where the contract is made.

There are many decisions, however, which hold that where a contract is made in one state for the carriage of persons or property into another, the law of the state where the contract is to be finally performed will govern.

the carriers of persons have never made any distinction between the degrees of care and prudence exacted of the defendants. The requirement in this case being the most exact that the law imposes, no matter what the relation may be, any failure or omission of the person upon whom this duty rests is negligence, and this negligence is not subject to division into degrees. Hence, the courts hold that any negligence of a carrier of passengers is gross negligence.

Corson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In March, 1887, the plaintiff shipped from Avoca, Wis., a carload of livestock and emigrant movables over defendant's road, consigned to himself at Bristol, D. T. The car containing the freight arrived at Bristol, and the plaintiff, while removing the livestock from the car, was injured, to recover for which this action is brought. The livestock and movables were shipped under a special contract, by the terms of which the plaintiff was permitted to pass on the train to care for and look after his stock. The material parts of the contract, so far as they affect this case, are as follows:

"(Exhibit A.) Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway. Livestock Contract. . . . Persons in charge of livestock will be passed on the train with, and to care of it, as follows: One man with two or three cars, two men with four to seven cars, three men with eight cars, which is the maximum number that will be passed for one owner. Passes will be furnished in manner provided on back of this contract, to persons, who, as above, may have been in charge of two or more cars of stock. No return passes given on west-bound shipments. No person will be passed with one car of livestock, except that one car of horses or mules or emigrant movables containing livestock will entitle the owner or man in charge to pass one way on the same train, to take care of it. . . . Such entry of persons in charge and certificate of billing agent to that effect will be the authority of conductors to pass them with the stock. All persons are thus passed only at their own risk of personal injury from whatever cause. A. O. Bird, Gen'l Freight Agent."

" . . . Received of Anton Meuer, one car livestock and emg. mov. as per margin, to be delivered at Bristol, Dakota, station, at special rates, being $45.00 per car; which stock is to be loaded and unloaded, watered and fed by said Anton Meuer, or his agents. . . . The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co., by D. Bohan, Agent. Anton Meuer, Shipper." Indorsement on back: "Parties actually in charge of and accompanying the within stock must write their own name in ink here. [Signed] Anton Meuer."

The contract was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence, and again at the close of all the evidence in the case, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant on the ground that, by the terms of the contract, the plaintiff assumed all risk "of injury from whatever cause," and could not, therefore, recover in this action. These motions were denied, and exceptions duly taken.

The learned counsel for the appellant contend that, under the terms of the contract signed by the plaintiff, he agreed to assume all the risk of personal injury from whatever cause; that such a contract was authorized by the laws of this state, and was a legal, valid, and binding contract, exonerating the defendant from all liability for personal injuries to the plaintiff, from whatever cause received. They further contend that the contract, though made in Wisconsin, would nevertheless be interpreted by the laws of this state, in the absence of evidence as to the laws of Wisconsin in relation to the contracts of common carriers, and that the law of Wisconsin will be presumed to be the same as the law of this state relating to such contracts. The contract in this case, having been made in Wisconsin, may be regarded as a contract of that state, and to be interpreted in accordance with the laws of that state. Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, 32 L. ed.

788; Hazel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 82 Iowa, 477. This court, however, will not take judicial notice of the laws of another state. Such laws must be alleged and proven on the trial, the same as any other facts in the case. No such evidence appears, from the record in the case, to have been given. In the absence of such evidence, this court will presume that the law of Wisconsin as to the right of a common carrier to limit the liability of himself or servants is the same as the law of this state upon that subject. Sandmeyer v. Dakota Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (S. Dak.) 50 N. W. Rep. 358. There is some conflict in the decisions of the different courts upon the question as to whether or not the court will presume that the law of another state is the same as the statute law of the state where the action is tried, but the weight of authority seems to support this view. In the case of Palmer v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., decided by the supreme court of California in the present year, and reported in 85 Pac. Rep. 680, the court says: "The cause, so far as can be determined from the record, was tried upon the theory that the law of California is applicable. There is no suggestion that the law of Missouri, where the contract for transportation was made, was put in evidence. Under such circumstances, we are not at liberty to assume as a fact that the state of Missouri has a special statute on the subject, but must presume as a question of law that the law of that state is the same as our own. Norris v. Harris, 15 Cal. 226; Hill v. Grigsby, 32 Cal. 56; Taylor v. Shew, 39 Cal. 540, 2 Am. Rep. 478; Brown v. San Francisco Gaslight Co. 58 Cal. 426; Marsters v. Lash, 61 Cal. 622; Shumway v. Leakey, 67 Cal. 458. Judged by our own statute, and by the lawful limitation which defendant might and did embrace in its bill of lading, it was bound to transport to Albuquerque, and deliver to the Atlantic & Pacific, connecting road, within a reasonable time, plaintiff's goods." See also, 19 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 47; Nesse v. Farmer's Ins. Co. 55 Iowa, 604; Walsh v. Dart, 12 Wis. 636; Hadley v. Gregory, 57 Iowa, 157.

The first question, then, to be determined is, What is the law of this state as to the right of a common carrier to limit his liability? for the contract in this case must be interpreted by our law upon this subject. There is a direct conflict in the decisions of the various courts upon the question of the right of common carriers to limit their common-law liability for the negligence of themselves and their servants by special contracts. In New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, the Supreme Court of the United States held that common carriers do not possess the power to limit their liability, even by express contract, for the negligence of themselves or their servants; and this view was affirmed in Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 897, 32 L. ed. 788. On the other hand, the court of appeals of New York, in a number of cases, has held that common carriers possess such power. This doctrine is clearly laid down in Bissell v. New York Cent. R. Co. 25 N. Y. 442, 82 Am. Dec. 369, and affirmed by that court, after the decision in New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, supra, in Mynard v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 71 N. 53 L. R. A.

Y. 180, 27 Am. Rep. 28. This court, however, is not called upon to decide between these conflicting opinions, as the Code of this state has settled the question within this jurisdiction. Hartwell v. Northern Pacific Exp. Co. 5 Dak. 463, 8 L. R. A. 342; Hazel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 82 Iowa, 477; Kirby v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (S. Dak.) 55 N. W. Rep. 759. The sections of the Code bearing upon this question constitute sections 3881-3888, Comp. Laws, and read as follows: "Every one who offers to the public to carry persons, property, or messages, is a common carrier of whatever he thus offers to carry." 3886: "The obligations of a common carrier cannot be limited by general notice on his part, but may be limited by special contract." 3887: "A common carrier cannot be exonerated by any agreement made in anticipation thereof, from liability for the gross negligence, fraud, or willful wrong of himself or his servants." 3888: "A passenger, consignor or consignee, by accepting a ticket, bill of lading, or written contract for carriage, with a knowledge of its terms, assents to the rate of hire, the time, place, and manner of delivery therein stated. But his assent to any other modification of the carrier's rights or obligations contained in such instrument can only be manifested by his signature to the same." By section 3886 it will be noticed that common carriers may, in this state, limit their liability by special contract; and by section 3887 an exception is made in cases of "gross negligence, fraud, or willful wrong." It would seem, therefore, that, subject to the exceptions specified, a common carrier, by the laws of this state, may, by special contract, limit his common-law liability in all cases not included in the excepted cases. This case seems to have been tried, and the jury instructed, upon the theory that the defendant, notwithstanding the stipulations in the contract, was liable for the ordinary negligence of itself and servants, and the question of gross negligence is eliminated from the case. The record discloses the fact that the defendant's counsel requested the court to instruct the jury that there was no evidence of gross negligence, and it was refused, the court stating "that he did not submit the question of gross negligence to the jury, but simply the question of ordinary negligence." We shall assume, therefore, for the purposes of this decision, that there was no evidence of gross negligence, fraud, or willful wrong on the part of the defendant or its servants, and that the verdict of the jury was based entirely upon the theory that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the ordinary negligence of the defendant or its servants. Taking this view of the case, was the defendant entitled to have his motion for an instruction to the jury to find for the defendant, granted at the close of the plaintiff's evidence? As before stated, the special contract was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff, and was therefore a part of the plaintiff's case. It appears from this contract between the parties that defendant, in consideration of the plaintiff's stipulations to load and unload the car, and feed and water the livestock on the trip, agreed to transport the car of stock and household movables at a reduced rate, and to pass the plaintiff on the same train, to care for and look after the livestock, but at plaintiff's "own risk of personal injury from whatever cause."

Assuming that plaintiff's injuries occurred while such passenger upon the train, and that they occurred from the ordinary negligence of the defendant or its servants, the limitation in the contract would seem to be such a one as is permitted by the statute, and would exonerate the defendant from liability for the injuries plaintiff sustained, the contract being a special contract, and signed by the respective parties, as required by the statute. The terms of the contract are clearly stated. There is no ambiguity in its stipulations, and the intention of the parties is clearly ascertainable from the terms of the contract. The plaintiff was, by the terms of the contract, to be carried upon the same train with his livestock and movables, without extra charge, to care for and feed and water his stock; but at his own "risk of personal injury from whatever cause." This contract the law permitted the parties to make. Section 8881 defines who are common carriers, and section 8886, in the same chapter, provides "that the obligations of a common carrier . . . may be limited by special contract." And section 8887 uses the same general term, "a common carrier," etc. Interpreting the contract by the law, it is difficult to perceive any valid reason for holding the defendant liable for plaintiff's injury. The contract, as we have seen, is one which the law permits the common carrier to make, and by its terms it clearly exonerates the defendant from liability for injuries caused by the ordinary negligence of the defendant or its servants. The motion, therefore, should have been granted. The learned counsel for respondent contend that under the law of this state the contract is void. It is not claimed that the legislation of this state is not within the proper exercise of the legislative power, or is in violation of the organic act or the state constitution. But it is contended that under the common law a common carrier of passengers is required to exercise the utmost diligence and the highest degree of care and prudence in transferring passengers from one place to another by steam power, and that "there has never been any attempt to relax the rule requiring the utmost vigilance by the carriers of passengers in operating by this mode of conveyance." The requirement in this case being the most exact that the law imposes, no matter what the relation may be, any failure or omission of the person upon whom the duty rests is negligence, and this negligence is not subject to division into degrees; hence the courts hold that any negligence of a carrier of passengers is gross negligence. The counsel, after further argument, concludes as follows: "We therefore conclude, in view of the law as established by the judgments of the courts placing upon the carriers of persons the responsibility of exercising the greatest degree of care and vigilance in the conveyance of human beings, that section 8887 of the Compiled Laws does not relieve from responsibility the carriers of persons in cases where negligence is shown, even though the carrier has a pretended release from liability in the form of a special contract. That, while the section apparently applies to common carriers in general, it must be limited in its operation to carriers other than those who engage in the transportation of persons. . . . " While it is true that the utmost care is required on the part of the carrier of passengers, and that such carrier is ordinarily liable for negligence, whether gross, ordinary, or slight, still there may be in fact degrees of negligence in the management of its business by itself or its servants; and it is upon this theory that the legislature has deemed it proper to permit such carriers to limit its liability for ordinary or slight negligence, when, under the law, it would ordinarily be held for injuries to persons caused thereby. The law-making power might properly permit special contracts exonerating such carriers from liability, when injury is caused to a person by ordinary or slight negligence, or even by gross negligence, if it deemed it proper. In New York, as we have seen, and other states, such contracts are permitted, and held valid, even without the aid of a statute. We are unable to discover any reason for holding that the law-making power may not make any provision governing the liability of common carriers, and authorizing them to limit their liability as it may deem proper.

It is further contended that the contract in this case is invalid, under the provisions of section 8578, Comp. Laws, which reads as follows: "All contracts which have for their object, directly or indirectly, to exempt any one from responsibility for his own fraud, or willful injury to the person or property of another, or violation of law, whether willful or negligent, are against the policy of the law." But the contract in this case is not a contract to violate any express law. It cannot be said that a contract permitted and sanctioned by express law is a contract to violate the law. If we are correct, the section of the statute relating to common carriers permits common carriers of passengers as well as common carriers of property to make the contract in question, subject, of course, to the exceptions contained in the law. The argument of counsel would have much more weight as applied to carriers of freight than as applied to the carriers of passengers, as carriers of freight at common law were absolute insurers of the safe delivery of the property intrusted to them, except where the loss occurred "by the act of God, or the public enemy, or by their own decay from inherent infirmity, or by the fault of the owner thereof." Further exceptions are made in the carrying of livestock, not material now to be stated. If, therefore, the contention of counsel is correct, the statute could have no effect, as there would be no class of carriers to which it would apply. We are of the opinion that the statute does apply to carriers of passengers as well as to carriers of freight, and we cannot assent to the contention of counsel for respondent that the contract in this case is void.

The counsel further contended that, as the stipulation in the contract is general, and does not specifically limit the liability of the defendant to the negligence of itself or servants, such negligence is not included; in other words, the language of the stipulation, "risk of personal injury from any cause," does not include injury caused by the negligence of the defendant or its servants. There is force in the contention, and it has some support from the New York decisions. The doctrine is thus stated in Mynard v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co., 71 N. Y. 180, 27 Am. Rep. 28. "When general words may operate without including the negligence of the carrier or his servants, it will not be presumed that it was intended to include it." But this doctrine has generally been applied to contracts by carriers of freight. And even in this class of cases, when there is nothing in the contract upon which the general words can operate, unless the negligence of the defendant or his servants is included, such negligence is included in the general words, "for whatever cause." This doctrine is illustrated in Cragin v. New York Cent. R. Co. 51 N. Y. 61, 10 Am. Rep. 559, and Holsapple v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 86 N. Y. 275. In the former case the court says: "In this case the plaintiffs assumed and agreed to take the risk of injuries to the hogs in consequence of heat. Effect should be given to this stipulation. The parties must be held to have meant something by it. In consideration that the plaintiffs would assume and take certain risks, which would otherwise devolve upon the defendant, it agreed to carry at a reduced rate. If it be held that this stipulation simply exempts the defendant from liability for injuries to the hogs from heat without any fault on his part, then it gets nothing; for in such case, without the stipulation it would not be responsible. Force and effect can be given to this stipulation only by holding that it was intended to exempt the defendant from negligence, in consequence of which the hogs died from heat. The judge, at the trial, however, entirely ignored this special contract, and put the case to the jury upon the defendant's common-law responsibility, charging that it was liable if they found it guilty of negligence in the transportation of the hogs; and he refused to the defendant any benefit whatever from the special contract. In this I cannot doubt the learned judge erred." In the latter case the court says: "The doctrine of Mynard v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 180, 27 Am. Rep. 28, is decisive upon this question. It was there held that, where general words, limiting the liability of a carrier, may operate without including his negligence or that of his servants, such negligence will not be within the exemption of the agreement. To this extent, at least, we all concur. However broad or general may be the language of the contract which does not specifically and in express terms release the carrier from the consequences of his own negligence, it will not effect such release if the general words may operate without including such negligence. That is the case here. The precise injury might have occurred which actually happened without fault or negligence on the part of the carrier. . . . It is in this respect that the present case differs from that of Cragin v. New York Cent. R. Co. 51 N. Y. 61, 10 Am. Rep. 559. In that case the injury resulted from the vitality of the animals, and their inherent nature and characteristics. For such injury the carrier was not liable at common law, and the general words of release and exemption could not operate at all, unless upon the negligence of the defendant. The case was decided upon that precise ground." In Kenney v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 422, the rule was extended to a contract for the carriage of passengers, but under special circumstances. It was held in that case that the general clause in question was capable of another construction, as applied to the facts in that case, and the same rule was applied as in the case of contracts for the carrying of freight. In this case there are no special circumstances taking the case out of the general rule that in a case of a passenger the only basis of the carrier's liability is negligence, and such a stipulation in the contract would be deprived of all operation unless it would cover negligence. A carrier of passengers is not an insurer of the safety of the passengers as is a carrier of goods, for the safe delivery of the goods. A carrier of passengers is only liable for negligence, and hence the stipulation in the contract has nothing to operate upon unless negligence is included.

In the discussion thus far we have assumed that the plaintiff was injured while a passenger upon defendant's road. It is contended, however, by respondent, that he had ceased to be a passenger when the injury to him occurred, he having arrived at Bristol, the place of his destination, and left the car. It appears from the evidence that after plaintiff's car was sidetracked at the station, the plaintiff went to an hotel in Bristol to get lanterns and assistants to aid him in unloading his car; that he was absent a short time,—how long does not appear, but evidently only for a short period,—when he returned, and proceeded to unload his stock. While it may be true, as contended by respondent, that when an ordinary passenger arrives at his destination, and leaves the train and the depot, his relation to the carrier as passenger ceases, but, when one sustains to the carrier the relation sustained by the plaintiff in this case, we think a different rule applies. Being required by his contract to load and unload his stock, we are of the opinion that by the terms of the contract it must be held to extend to the final unloading of the stock. The stipulation is not limited, but provides that "all persons are thus passed only at their own risk of personal injury, from whatever cause." This would seem to include loading and unloading as well as transportation in the train. The plaintiff was unloading the car under the terms of the contract, when the injury occurred. To hold that he was acting under the contract in loading the stock, but still absolved from the stipulations of the contract as to defendant's liability for injuries to him, would be giving to the contract a construction not warranted by its terms. The plaintiff was permitted to go on the train with, and to take care of, his stock; and he was in and about the car for that purpose when injured. In Poucher v. New York Cent. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 263, 10 Am. Rep. 364, the plaintiff was injured before the train started from the depot, by a stick of wood thrown from the tender, and the court held that defendant was exempt from liability under its contract. In that case the court said: "The injury complained of was sustained by plaintiff while he was on the defendant's premises, moving about the train on which his animals were laden, for the purpose of taking care of them, and engaged in the performance of that duty. His only business there was to take charge of the stock in pursuance of the terms of the contract. The train was about starting, and he was to go in it according to the terms of the contract, being provided with a free pass for that purpose. The contract provided that he should go or send some person on the same train with the stock, to take charge of it, who should be carried free of charge; and that such person so riding free should take all the risk of personal injury from whatever cause, whether of negligence of the defendant or its agent or otherwise. We do not think it necessary, to bring the plaintiff within the operation of this stipulation, that he should have been actually riding at the time of his injury. The train had been formed, and was about to start. The plaintiff was there, under the contract, as a passenger furnished with a pass, entitling him to ride free, and coming from the performance of the duties contemplated by his contract." We think that by a fair and reasonable construction of the contract the plaintiff, while unloading his stock, was within the terms of his contract, whether he was called a passenger or not. He was doing what the contract stipulated he should do, —unloading his stock under the contract; and defendant's exemption from liability continued so long as the plaintiff continued to act under the contract, or the contract was in force. It was evidently the intention of the parties in entering into the contract that the plaintiff was to assume all risk for personal injury from whatever cause until the car was unloaded as provided in the contract.

There were a number of other questions discussed in the briefs of counsel and in the oral arguments, but, as these questions may not arise on another trial, we do not deem it necessary to discuss them. Our conclusion is that, under the contract, construed by the law of this state and the record on this appeal, the motion of defendant that the court direct a verdict in its favor should have been granted.

The judgment of the court below is therefore reversed, and a new trial is ordered.

Kellam, J.:

I express no opinion upon the independent proposition, that the statutes of a foreign state will be presumed to be the same as those of the forum. I concur, however, in the decision of the case. It is the duty of the courts to sustain as valid and binding the deliberate agreement of parties, until some reason is shown against it. Assuming that, in the absence of evidence, the courts of this state may not know what the statute law of Wisconsin is, or indulge any presumptions in regard to it, it still remains a fact that the laws of Wisconsin may be such as to allow or authorize a contract like this, and the court ought to treat the contract as valid, until it is affirmatively shown that the laws of that state do not allow it.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

John A. QUIRK, Respt.,

v.

Anna MULLER, Appt.

(.....Mont.....)

A contract to procure for a consideration testimony that will win a lawsuit is void as against public policy and as tending to impede the administration of justice.

(June 11, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Lewis and Clark County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover compensation for services rendered in procuring evidence to be used in the prosecution of a law-suit. Reversed.

Statement by De Witt, J.:

This is an appeal from the judgment, upon which the only contention made is that the complaint does not support the judgment. Gillette v. Hibbard, 8 Mont. 412.

The action was for compensation for certain personal services rendered by plaintiff to defendant, under an alleged contract. The complaint is somewhat voluminous, but the portions material to this inquiry may be stated

NOTE.—As to validity of contracts to procure testimony, see note to Goodrich v. Tenney (Ill.) 19 L. R. A. 371.

therefrom as follows: One Buyck was in possession of certain property of defendant herein, Anna Muller, under a deed from said Muller to Buyck, which she claimed was fraudulent. She desired to recover possession of this property. It may be stated in passing that the action which she brought for this purpose was finally decided in this court, under the title of Muller v. Buyck, and reported in 12 Mont. 854. The complaint in this case then alleges that she, Anna Muller, "made and entered into an agreement with this plaintiff, whereby she employed this plaintiff to make search and inquiry, and ascertain the names of persons who were familiar with the said property, and acquainted with the defendant and the said Sully Buyck, and with the facts and circumstances connected with the execution of the instrument aforesaid, and of the financial circumstances of the said Sully Buyck, and to procure such other testimony which, when introduced in court in an action duly and regularly brought, would entitle the said defendant to the possession of the said property, and the cancellation of the said instruments, and restore her to all her rights in and to said property; and the said defendant then and there promised and agreed that if this plaintiff would ascertain and procure the names of such witnesses, whose testimony would enable her to recover her rights in and to said property, and the possession thereof, that she, the said defendant, would pay to this plaintiff, for such services, an amount equal to 10 per cent of the value of the property so recovered, to be paid when the said property would be recovered; and plaintiff agreed and entered upon said employment, and procured the names of witnesses to establish said facts, if such witnesses could be procured. That thereupon this plaintiff, relying upon said agreement, commenced an investigation of the facts and circumstances connected with the execution of the instruments aforesaid, and to obtain all information he could with reference to the said Sully Buyck, and to procure the names of persons who were familiar with the facts and circumstances relating to the ownership of the said property, and with the execution of the said instruments, and the financial condition of the said Sully Buyck, and the consideration that was paid for said property, and the source from which such consideration was derived, and all other facts necessary to establish the right and title of the said Anna Muller in and to the property aforesaid; and plaintiff avers that he did procure the names of witnesses who were familiar with the facts aforesaid, and did secure sufficient testimony to establish defendant's right, title, and interest and claim in and to said property, and each and every part thereof." The complaint then goes on to set up the commencement of the action of Muller v. Buyck, and the trial thereof, and the judgment in favor of Muller. Speaking of the trial of that case, the complaint alleges: "And the said testimony procured by this plaintiff in his said employment was introduced, and the witnesses whose testimony he procured were produced and testified in said action in behalf of said Anna Muller; and, upon due consideration of said testimony, the court adjudged and decreed," etc. The judgment being for the plaintiff in this action, the defendant appeals.

Mr. J. M. Clements for appellant.

Messrs. Walsh & Newman, for respondent:

To make a contract champertous under the ancient law, there should be a bargain to receive part of the property in litigation. But such contracts are not now held void. They have been upheld in California and many other states.

Where the contract specifies that the party shall receive as compensation an amount equal to a certain percentage of the value of the property recovered, as in this case, the contract will be upheld.

De Witt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are of opinion that the complaint is not sufficient to sustain the judgment. The learned district judge would have doubtless so held if the point had been made before him. We believe that the contract set out in the complaint is void as against public policy, and as tending to impede the administration of justice. The plaintiff was employed, not only to make search and inquiry for witnesses, and to ascertain the names of persons acquainted with the facts and circumstances, but also, in addition to this, to procure such other testimony which, when introduced in evidence, would entitle the said Anna Muller to recover possession of the property. The searching for witnesses who had disappeared or documents which had been lost, or the performance of legitimate detective work, is not subject to objection. But the plaintiff was, according to his contract, to do more than this. These things he was to do, but they were not considered sufficient. He added to them, and contracted in connection with them, that he would, in effect, procure testimony that would win a lawsuit. It is alleged, further, in effect, that the testimony which he thus procured did win the lawsuit. Indeed, the contract, brought down to a simple statement, is that plaintiff agreed, for a consideration, to procure testimony that would win the lawsuit. He procured the testimony, and it won the suit. We do not hold the contract void because it was an agreement to procure perjury, or because it did procure perjury; but the contract had the tendency and opened the very strong temptation to the procurement of perjury. Mr. Bishop says: "The mere tendency of a contract to promote unlawful acts renders it illegal, as against the policy of the law, without regard to any circumstances indicating the probable commission of such acts." Bishop, Cont. § 476. In the case of Wellington v. Kelly, 84 N. Y. 548, the court found that the particular contract there under review was a legitimate and proper one, but, upon the general principle of contracts to furnish evidence for a lawsuit, Judge Andrews, in the opinion, says: "In Stanley v. Jones, 7 Bing. 369, it was held that an agreement made by a third person to communicate to a person claiming to have been defrauded such information as would enable him to recover damages for the fraud, and to exert his influence to procure evidence to substantiate the claim, upon condition of receiving a portion of the sum recovered, was illegal. In that case the person making the agreement to communicate the information was an entire stranger in interest to the proposed litigation, and professed to have knowledge of facts of importance to the party, but which he did not disclose. Lord Denman said that such an agreement was illegal, from its manifest tendency to pervert justice, and we fully assent to the decision in that case. An agreement by a stranger to furnish evidence to substantiate a claim or defense, for a compensation depending upon the success of his efforts, is dangerous in its tendency, as furnishing an inducement for perjury and the subornation of witnesses." In the English case cited in the New York Report, the person contracting to furnish the evidence agreed that "he should and would use and exert his utmost influence and means for procuring such evidence as should be requisite to substantiate the claims of the said defendant." Stanley v. Jones, 7 Bing. 879. There is a very considerable similarity between the contract which was condemned by the English court and that which is now before us.

The supreme court of Illinois took occasion, in the case of Gillett v. Logan County Suprs., 67 Ill. 256, to treat this subject in very vigorous and pertinent language. A case was about to be tried involving the legality of an election to determine whether the county should subscribe for certain railroad bonds. The legality of the election which had been held being questioned, and the county supervisors, apparently desiring to overthrow the result of the election, made certain contracts as to the procuring of testimony to attack the result of that election. In the contract which the supervisors made with one McNeal, they provided as follows: "That if he [McNeal] will hunt up testimony and prepare the same, and present it to the proper authorities who may be authorized to receive it, and after said testimony or evidence is fully received and shall be acknowledged as legal, then, for said services, said McNeal is to receive from Logan county the following amounts: For ten illegal votes, so proved, $100; for ten other illegal votes, so proved, $200; for ten other illegal votes, so proved, $300; for ten other illegal votes, so proved, $400; for ten other illegal votes, so proved, $400; for ten other illegal votes, so proved, $400; for ten other illegal votes, so proved, $400. The above-mentioned illegal votes must be in place of, answer to, or represent certain unknown names on the East and West Lincoln poll books of the election above mentioned. The condition of this obligation is such that the said McNeal is to pay all his own individual expenses and the expenses of any parties whom he may employ in preparing such testimony, and finding such witnesses; and that above amount, or any part of the same, shall not be due or payable until the illegality of such votes is legally proven. It is further agreed that, in case the county of Logan is finally released from any liability to pay said bonds now in dispute between said county and the P., L., and D. R. R. Company, by means of proving the majority in said election to be illegal, the county of Logan further agrees to pay the said M. B. McNeal the sum of twelve hundred dollars, which said amount is to be in addition to the scale of prices above mentioned, and payable only after the courts have decided the case in favor of the said county." The supreme court of Illinois, in passing upon this contract, said: "The evidence disproved the actual use by the committee of any corrupt means or any corrupt design, on their part, in the use of the money. But the contracts themselves are pernicious in their nature. They created a powerful pecuniary inducement on the part of the agents so employed that the testimony should be given of certain facts, and that a particular result of the suit should be had. A strong temptation was held out to them to make use of improper means to procure the needful testimony, and to secure the desired result of the suit. The nature of the agreement was such as to encourage attempts to suborn witnesses, to tamper with jurors and to make use of other 'base appliances' in order to secure the necessary results which were to bring to these agents their stipulated compensation. The tendency of such arrangement must be to taint with corruption the atmosphere of courts, and pervert the course of justice. A pure administration of justice is of vital public concern. It tends to evil consequences that any such venal agency as is constituted by these contracts should have a part in the conduct of judicial proceedings where the attainment of right and justice is the end. Should such contracts of this character receive countenance, we might, among the multiplying forms of agency of the time, have to witness the scandalous spectacle of a class of agents holding themselves out to the public as professional procurers of desired testimony for litigants in court, for pay, contingent upon success of their suits. In Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 57 U. S. 16 How. 314, 14 L. ed. 953, it was held that a contract or a contingent compensation for obtaining legislation was void by the policy of the law. With much greater reason, we think, should the contracts under consideration be held vicious. We cannot sanction them. On account of their corrupting tendency we must hold them to be void, as inconsistent with public policy." Gillett v. Logan County Suprs. 67 Ill. 256. See also Patterson v. Donner, 48 Cal. 369.

We fully concur in the views expressed in these cases, and we are of opinion that the contract under consideration falls within the objectionable class. To be sure, under the contract the plaintiff, Quirk, may have performed only innocent acts and there is nothing to indicate that both his intentions in making the contract and his acts in carrying it out were other than wholly innocent and lawful. But the contract was just such a one as to encourage an unlawful act. It invited subornation of perjury. It held out a large reward for success. The amount claimed by plaintiff was some $1,800. The obtaining of this large sum depended upon plaintiff procuring testimony which would win the lawsuit. The law does not tolerate the offering to any one, no matter how virtuous, of such temptations to crime. The evils and vices of such a contract are strongly stated in the language of the Illinois court, quoted above. It would, indeed, be a sad spectacle to see springing up in this state the business of procuring testimony sufficient to win lawsuits. We regretfully express the fear that perhaps such a business might find a patronage. But from such a result we will secure ourselves by declaring void a contract the manifest tendency of which is to present the direct temptation and the great inducement to one to procure subornation of perjury. There is here too close an approach of the evil maxim, sometimes quoted: "Get money; honestly, if you can; but get money." The contractor in plaintiff's position could only too easily be led to say to his conscience: "I will procure the necessary testimony, honestly if I can; but I will procure the testimony." The evils of such contracts are illustrated in the very case for which this plaintiff contracted to procure the testimony which would succeed in winning a judgment for plaintiff therein. That case was before us on appeal, and was reported in 12 Mont. 85. In our investigation, it appeared that practically the only witness for the plaintiff was herself. It seems that the case rested solely upon the testimony of plaintiff, Muller, and the defendant, Buyck. So, if it be true that plaintiff herein, Quirk, procured the testimony which won the judgment in Muller v. Buyck, he procured the plaintiff herself to testify, and the only construction of the situation by which it could be claimed that he procured any testimony, would be that he procured or instructed her to testify as she did, because it was her testimony that won the case. It does not appear, on an inspection of the decision in that case, that plaintiff herein did or could have rendered service of such nature, or any other. We speak of this as an illustration of the evil tendency of such a contract as is pleaded in the complaint in this case. We think that nothing here said can be interpreted as forbidding the offering of rewards for the detection of crime, or the employing of persons to search for material witnesses or important papers or documents or exhibits which have been lost. We think that no difficulty will arise in sustaining contracts for the performance of legitimate services, while the stamp of disapproval is put upon contracts clearly contra bonos mores.

The judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded with directions to dismiss the complaint.

2. The illegality of an agreement by a corporation for the purchase of property by which to avoid the statutes and to de-

NOTE.—The duties and liabilities of promoters to the corporation and its members.

Until recently very little attention has been paid in this country to the doings of the promoters of corporations, or to their relation to the perfected concern which their exertions produce or its members. In England, however, the matter has been the subject of much attention on the part of both the courts and parliament and a very complete scheme for the government of the relation has been evolved.

The duty of the promoter.

The general rule is that the relation of the promoter to the corporation and its members is one of trust, and, while all dealings by him with the corporation are not prohibited, yet he must act in all things fairly and openly and place the corporation in possession of all his information which would be likely to affect its action.

As stated in one case it is the duty of a promoter toward those who are invited to co-operate in the enterprise not only to abstain from stating as a fact that which is not so, but not to omit to state any fact within his knowledge, the existence of which might in any form affect the extent or the quality of the advantages held out as an inducement. Cortes Co. v. Thannhauser, 45 Fed. Rep. 780.

Sales by promoter to corporation.

A property owner may organize a corporation to purchase the property and sell to it at any price he can get, provided he is guilty of no fraud or misrepresentation. He is not compelled to reveal his entire relation to the property and the profit he is making if he makes no pretensions of doing so and does not lead the corporation to think that he has done so.

The mere fact that the owner of land makes a profit in selling it to a corporation which he promotes will not make him liable to account for such profits in the absence of fraud. Burbank v. Dennis (Cal.) Jan. 11, 1894.

The owners of property may form an association and sell the property to it at any price which may be agreed upon, no matter what it may have originally cost, provided there was no fraudulent misrepresentation. There is no duty to disclose the profits made out of the transaction. Densmore Oil Co. v. Densmore, 64 Pa. 42; Lungren v. Pennell, 10 W. N. C. 297.

To make one liable for the profit made in selling property to a corporation, he must be shown to have occupied a fiduciary relation to the corporation. McElhenny's App. 61 Pa. 188.

If the promoters represent that they have been acting for the benefit of the corporation in purchasing the land, they will not be permitted to make a profit out of it. Simons v. Vulcan Oil & Min. Co. 61 Pa. 202, 100 Am. Dec. 628.

A promoter cannot make a profit by advancing the price of land which he had offered to sell to the corporation after the enterprise is so far under way as to seem probable of success. Rice's App. 79 Pa. 168.

Where a person projecting the formation of a corporation invites the public to join him in the project on a representation that he has acquired property which was intended to be applied for the purpose of the company, this is an invitation to participate in the benefit of the property purchased on the terms on which the purchaser acquired it, and the fiduciary character of the purchaser will, in such cases, commence from the time when he first begins to deal with the public, and will, in equity, be controlled by the representations he then makes to the public. But if, intending to form a corporation, he should purchase land with a view to the formation of it, and should state at once that he is the owner of it and proposes to sell it for a fixed price for the purposes of the corporation about to be formed, the transaction, so far as fraud the public a secret contract was made for the purchase of patents, will not defeat the right of a corporation to recover from the promoter the avails of a secret agreement between him and the seller of the property.

3. No offer of rescission is necessary to obtain an accounting by a corporation from a promoter who has secretly received profits on property sold to the corporation by his frauds.
4. A corporation 'instead' of its stockholders should sue for the avails of a secret agreement between a promoter and one from whom the corporation purchases property.
5. Neither party can have the aid of a court to enforce rights under a contract which is opposed to public policy.

(February 12, 1894.)

RESERVATION by the Superior Court for New Haven County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Errors of actions by the Yale Gas Stove Company against Jedediah Wilcox and Wife for damages and equitable relief because of the conduct and representations of Wilcox as a promoter of the plaintiff corporation, and also of an action by Wilcox against John B. Foley for damages for breach of contract to divide with the plaintiff the proceeds realized by defendant from the corporation for defendant's interest in certain patents which the corporation was organized to obtain and operate. Judgment for plaintiff in the first action and for defendant in the second.

the public are concerned, commences with that statement, and he will not be necessarily charged with the profit he makes out of the land. Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 489.

The property may be bought and sold at an advance to the corporation, if it is done fairly; but a full disclosure must be made to the corporation and an independent board of directors must act on the question of purchase; if the property is bought for the company by the promoter as agent, or if he acts as a director in completing the purchase, he will not be permitted to retain any profit that he may have made. Plaquemines Tropical Fruit Co. v. Buck (N. J.) Nov. 29, 1893.

To make an alleged promoter liable for the amount of paid-up shares allotted to him in consideration of the transfer by him to the company of property standing in his name, it must be shown that at the time of its acquisition he stood in such relation to the intended corporation that he could not claim to have bought the property for himself. Re Hess Mfg. Co. 21 Ont. App. 66.

If the owner agrees with the subscribers that all the property he sells shall be put in at cost price, he will be liable to refund all the profit which he realizes out of the transaction. Burbank v. Dennis (Cal.) Jan. 11, 1894.

That the promoter acting in good faith fell into an error of judgment as to the value of the property cannot be regarded as a fraud which will render him liable for its consequences. Young v. Erie Iron Co. 65 Mich. 111.

There seems to be a tendency among the lower English courts to be more lenient towards promoters than the higher courts were willing to sanction. Several transactions which have been countenanced by vice-chancellors have been condemned on appeal. In fact some of the language found in opinions of the latter courts might lead to the conclusion that they would not sanction transactions which would be good in this country.

The facts found by the trial court were as follows:

"In December, 1889, John B. Foley, being the owner of certain valuable patents for inventions in gas stoves, which he was desirous of disposing of, offered, in a conversation with Jedediah Wilcox, to sell letters-patent for the sum of $2,500. The said Wilcox, believing said letters-patent to be valuable, and having had experience in the organization of joint-stock companies for similar purposes, proposed to said Foley the organization by said Wilcox of a joint stock company for manufacturing gas stoves under said patents, the sale to such company of said letters-patent, and a division between said Foley and Wilcox of the avails of such sale. Said Wilcox, after interviews with various persons, believing that he could organize such a joint-stock company for the purpose of carrying out said plan of organizing such company to manufacture said stoves under said patents, and of selling such letters-patent to such company, and dividing between himself and Foley the avails of such sale, on the 14th day of January, 1890, entered into the following agreement with said Foley: 'This agreement, entered into this 14th day of January, 1890, by and between John B. Foley, of the town and county of New Haven and state of Connecticut, of the first part, and Jedediah Wilcox of said town and county, of the second part, witnesseth as follows: Whereas, said John B. Foley is the

Thus in a late case it was said that persons who purchase property and then create a corporation to purchase from them stand in a fiduciary position towards the company and must faithfully state to it the facts which apply to the property and which would influence the company in deciding on the reasonableness of acquiring it. Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. 3 App. Cas. 1218, 48 L. J. Ch. 73, 39 L. T. N. S. 269, 27 Week. Rep. 65, affirming L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 73, 46 L. J. Ch. 425, 36 L. T. N. S. 223, 25 Week. Rep. 436, where it appeared that a syndicate purchased the lease of an island containing phosphate and then organized a corporation to purchase the lease, obtaining from it twice the amount paid for it, and the chancery division, reversing the vice-chancellor, held that the syndicate, being the promoters of the corporation, stood in a fiduciary relation to it and were bound to make a full and fair disclosure of their interest in the property; and that, as they had suppressed the fact that they were the real vendors and that they gave for the property only one half what the company gave for it, and had in addition control of the board of directors, which ratified the contract, there was no contract binding on the corporation, and the sale was set aside and judgment given against the members of the syndicate for repayment of the purchase money.

It will be observed that the facts brought out in the report in L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 73, make a plain case for relief and do not require such sweeping language as was used in the appellate court.

The New York court of appeals has taken quite an advanced position upon the subject.

In Getty v. Devlin, 54 N. Y. 403, where persons owning oil land were compelled to account for profits they made by selling it to a corporation which they organized for that purpose, one of the grounds of the decision is that after the subscriptions were made one subscriber will not be permitted to make a profit by buying land to be sold owner of letters-patent of the United States of America, dated the 30th day of August, 1887, and numbered 368,938, for improvements in gas stoves, and he is also the inventor of a certain other improvement in gas stoves, for which he has applied for letters-patent of the United States, by application filed the 14th day of November, 1889, and serial number 330,244; and whereas, said Jedediah Wilcox is desirous of owning one-half part of the letters-patent, and of the invention and improvements above described: Now, therefore, in consideration of the covenants hereinafter contained, and of one dollar, and other valuable considerations, the said Jedediah Wilcox hereby covenants and agrees with said John B. Foley, and with his heirs and assigns, that he, together with his associates, will forthwith, and within a reasonable time, organize a joint-stock company, under the statute laws of the state of Connecticut, for the manufacture and sale of gas stoves containing the improvement described, and secured by said letters-patent of the United States, and to be secured; and said Wilcox also agrees to cause to be paid to said Foley the sum of three thousand dollars, in cash, upon the organization of said company, and also five thousand dollars of the capital stock of the company above described. Said John B. Foley, his heirs and assigns, hereby covenants and agrees with said Jedediah Wilcox, and with his heirs and assigns, that, upon the execution of his covenants herein above described, he will assign and transfer, by written conveyance, one half of the letters-patent above described; also one half of the invention and improvements in gas stoves for which application for letters-patent has been made, and of any letters-patent which may be issued for said improvements; and also that he will assign to said Wilcox one half of any future improvements which he may hereafter invent in gas stoves while he is associated with him in the gas-stove business; and also one half of any letters-patent which may be issued to him for any of the improvements above mentioned, invented while so associated with him in said gas-stove business, or any reissue thereof. Said Foley also covenants and agrees to give said Wilcox one half of the three thousand dollars cash, as soon as received, and one half of the five thousand dollars of the capital stock of said company, as he shall receive it. Said Jedediah Wilcox also hereby agrees to subscribe for one thousand dollars, par value, of the capital stock of said proposed company, and to pay for the same as called for by the directors thereof. And said John B. Foley hereby agrees to take one half of said one thousand dollars worth of stock, when issued, and to pay to said Wilcox therefor one half of what said one thousand dollars worth of stock shall have cost him. And said John B. Foley hereby also agrees to unite with said Wilcox in the execution of all necessary papers giving to the proposed to the corporation, and the court says: "If this be so as to a purchase of land made after the subscriptions are written, why should not the same rule be applied to a purchase made before; the wrong and breach of faith is just as great, and every reason advanced to show that the rule should be applied in the one case would show that it should be applied in the other." And that rule was recognized in Getty v. Devlin, 70 N. Y. 504.

In St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. v. Tiernan, 37 Kan. 630, one who signed the charter of a railroad company on January 20, purchased a roadbed on February 17, and filed the charter with the secretary of state on February 23, by which act the company for the first time had a legal existence. The court in discussing his liability to the company for profits on the roadbed says to make him responsible there must be an affirmative showing that at the time that he made the purchase he was either acting for or on behalf of the corporation, or that he so assumed to act, or that he occupied such a relation of trust and confidence with respect to the corporation that his purchase resulted to its benefit and not to his own profit. And then the court decides that he was not acting on behalf of the corporation and that at the time of the purchase he did not occupy such a position of trust to the corporation as to make him liable to it for the profits, on the ground that he was not a promoter of the road.

Commissions, profits on options, and profits on property bought for the corporation.

Concealed profits of this character are universally condemned.

If the promoters agree with the owners of the patents which the company is organized to operate, to receive a certain number of shares of stock without making payment for it, and this agreement is not disclosed to those who subsequently subscribe for stock, the corporation has the right to elect: (1) to have the shares transferred back to it; (2) if the shares have been sold, to take the entire profits from the sale; (3) to require payment of profits which the corporation itself would have made by disposing of the stock at the market price. Chandler v. Bacon, 30 Fed. Rep. 538.

In Lydney & W. Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, L. R. 31 Ch. Div. 323, 55 L. J. Ch. 383, 54 L. T. N. S. 242, 34 Week. Rep. 437, the owners of a mine employed agents to form and launch a corporation for the purchase of the mine. This was done, the mine sold, and the agents were allowed a commission for their services, and the court held that the agents were acting solely for the vendors, and as it appeared that the purchase money was not increased because of the commission, and that it was in fact paid by the vendors, the agents could not be regarded as promoters of the company within the rule as to liability of such persons.

But that case was reversed in L. R. 33 Ch. Div. 85, 55 L. T. N. S. 538, 55 L. J. Ch. 375, 34 Week. Rep. 749, and it was held that if defendant was really a promoter of the company, the fact that he had acted as agent for the vendors did not exonerate him from accounting to the corporation for secret profits so made.

Where the owner of the property offered a commission to defendant in case he brought out a corporation which purchased the property, and he procured a third person who contracted with the owner of the property and then found directors and launched the corporation, he was held liable for his secret profit. Emma Silver Min. Co. v. Grant, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 913, 40 L. T. N. S. 804.

In Barnall v. Carlton, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 371, 47 L. J. Ch. 30, 26 Week. Rep. 243, 37 L. T. N. S. 431, persons were compelled to refund a commission allowed them by the vendors of property for getting up a corporation to purchase it, but were allowed their commissions and a fair compensation for their ser-company, and to all other companies organized for similar purposes, the full right to manufacture and sell gas stoves containing the improvements secured by all the letters-patent above described, whenever so requested by said Wilcox. In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands, the day and year above written. [Signed] John B. Foley. Jedediah Wilcox. Signed and delivered in the presence of Julius Twiss.

"The said Wilcox performed the work of procuring subscribers for the stock of the contemplated company, and of organizing said company, and carrying out said plan for the sale to said company of said letters-patent. It was agreed between said Wilcox and Foley that said agreement and arrangement between themselves that said Wilcox should receive a share of the avails of the sale of said patents to said company should be kept secret. The plan for the organization of such company, and which was stated by said Wilcox to those whom he solicited to subscribe for the stock of said company, and who became the stockholders of said company, and upon which said company was organized, was as follows: The capital stock of the company was to be $30,000, divided into 600 shares, of $50 each. There were to be ten subscribers of said stock, of whom said Wilcox was to be one, each of whom was to subscribe for twenty shares, and to pay in $600 in cash. After the organization of the company the company was to purchase of

Foley the said letters-patent, paying him therefor $3,000 in cash, and issuing to him 400 shares of paid-up stock, of the par value of $20,000 for which said Foley was to subscribe. After having received said stock, said Foley was to transfer twenty shares to each of said ten subscribers to the stock of said company, and one hundred shares to the treasurer of said company, retaining the remaining one hundred of said four hundred shares, which, with said $3,000, was to constitute the purchase price of said letters-patent. Thereby, each subscriber, by payment of $600, was to receive stock of the par value of $2,000; said Foley was to receive for his patents $3,000, $3,000 being in cash, and the remainder in paid-up stock; and there was to remain in the treasury of the company, as its working capital, $5,000 in stock and $3,000 in cash. Said Wilcox, in soliciting subscriptions for said stock, did not inform any person of said agreement between himself and Foley, or that he was to receive any of the avails of the sale of said patents, but, for the purpose of inducing persons to subscribe for said stock, stated to nearly all of the persons who subscribed for said stock, and who now constitute the stockholders of said company, that he (Wilcox) was putting his money into said enterprise upon precisely the same basis as the others of said subscribers; and it was with that understanding that nearly all said persons subscribed for said stock. Said Wilcox, with nine others,

Under the English Companies Act of 1862 if a promoter takes a bonus of shares from the owner of the property for his services in effecting the sale to the corporation, he is liable to account to the corporation for their value. McKay's Case, L. Rep. 184, where one who was in the habit of selling goods to a partnership, to purchase the business of which a corporation was formed of which he became a promoter and director, continued to supply goods to the firm and to the concern after it was incorporated, it was held that he must account for profits made after the incorporation, but not those made prior thereto.

Where five persons undertook to form a corporation to purchase and operate a mine, and one made a bargain with the owner for a bonus of £20,000 in case of the sale, and deceived his co-workers as to the amount for which it could be purchased, and they issued a prospectus in which they stated that the property could be obtained at a certain price, including all expenses and a premium to the persons who incurred the risk, it was held that although the mine proved cheap at the price paid, the company upon discovering the concealment could recover the £20,000. Beck v. Kantorowicz, 8 Kay & J. 230.

That one of the promoters obtains from the owner of the property a certain commission for effecting the sale of the property is sufficient to compel him to share the advantage with his associates in the corporation. Emery v. Parrott, 107 Mass. 95.

To obviate the apparent hardship of a rule which forbids a promoter from taking from the owner of the property compensation for services which he may have rendered he is allowed in England to take it if the fact is stated in the prospectus of the company which is sent out to secure subscriptions.

But the promoters will not be allowed the amount stated in the prospectus, if there is a concealment as to further compensation to be made them. Ex parte Williams, L. R. 2 Eq. 216, 35 L. J. Ch. 474, 14 Week. Rep. 703, 14 L. T. N. S. 456.

Rep. 836, metal brokers, who had been handling the metal from a certain mine and who assisted a promoter in disposing of the mine to a corporation which was formed to purchase it, were held to be themselves promoters and compelled to refund the amount which they had received for their services in the transaction.

From the time that the formation of the company is initiated the promoters stand in confidential relations to each other, and it is not then competent for any of them to purchase property for the purpose of the corporation and sell it at an advance, without a full disclosure of the facts. South Joplin Land Co. v. Case, 104 Mo. 572; Paducah Land, Coal & Iron Co. v. Mulholland, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 22.

Where promoters represented that certain silver subscribed for said one hundred shares of said stock; each receiving ten shares, and each paying the sum of $600. Said Wilcox was present at the first meeting of the stockholders, and was elected temporary clerk and a director, and voted in favor of the following resolution, which was adopted: 'Whereas, John B. Foley is the owner of certain letters-patent of the United States for improvements in gas stoves, issued to said John B. Foley (the one, No. 368,938, granted August 30, 1887; the other, No. 421,258, granted February 11, 1890); and whereas, said letters-patent are necessary and convenient for the purpose of this company, and are valued at the sum of twenty-three thousand dollars; and whereas, the said John B. Foley is a subscriber for the capital stock of this corporation to the amount of twenty thousand five hundred dollars: Therefore, voted, that the directors be, and hereby are, authorized and instructed to purchase said letters-patent Nos. 368,938 and 421,258 from said John B. Foley for the sum of twenty-three thousand dollars, and to pay him for the same by crediting his stock account the amount of his subscription, to wit, twenty thousand dollars, and issuing to him full-paid certificates for same, and to pay him the balance of said purchase price, to wit, three thousand dollars, in cash.' On the same day, at the first meeting of the directors of such corporation, said Wilcox was present, and voted in favor of the following resolution, which was passed: 'Voted, to purchase of John B. Foley, as authorized and instructed by vote of the stockholders passed this day, letters-patent of the United States Nos. 368,938 and 421,258, and that in payment therefor the president and secretary be instructed to issue to him stock certificates, full paid, to the amount of twenty thousand dollars, and that the treasurer be instructed to pay him the sum of three thousand dollars in cash, upon receipt of proper deeds of said letters-patent.' At a meeting of the directors of the plaintiff corporation, held February 24, 1890,—three days after the organization of the corporation,—it was agreed between Foley and the Yale Gas Stove Company that three notes for one thousand dollars each, payable two, four, and six months from that date, should be given by the company, and accepted by Foley, in place of the $3,000 in cash which it had been arranged should be paid Foley as a part of the purchase price of said letters-patent. Said Foley was also a director of said corporation. Said three notes were duly received by said Foley, and 400 shares of paid-up stock of said company, of the par value of $20,000, were issued to said Foley, in payment of his subscription for said amount of stock. As soon as could be conveniently arranged thereafter, he transferred to each of his ten associate subscribers, including said Wilcox, twenty shares of the stock so issued to him, and also transferred to the treasurer of the corporation one hundred shares of said stock; mines were of great value and could be obtained for $30,000, and the corporation after purchasing them discovered that they were worthless and that the amount paid was only $10,000, the promoters having divided the $20,000 between them, the corporation was held entitled to recover the purchase price, all sums expended on the mines prior to the discovery of the fraud, and interest thereon. St. Louis & U. S. Min. Co. v. Jackson, 5 Cent. L. J. 317.

Where certain persons bid in land at auction at $5.06 per acre, and organized a corporation to take it at $25 per acre, taking back notes and mortgage to themselves for the purchase price, which was subsequently foreclosed, the court compelled them to surrender the notes and mortgage and cancelled the foreclosure decree on such mortgage, by which means the promoters were compelled to restore to the corporation an amount about equal to the secret profit which they made out of the transaction. Ex-Mission Land & Water Co. v. Flash, 97 Cal. 610.

Where persons who had an option to purchase property for $20,000 represented to the subscribers that the option would cost $30,000, and, after securing the subscriptions and the money thereon, paid the $20,000 and converted $70,000 to their own use, it was held that an action on behalf of the corporation to recover the $70,000 was maintainable. Pittsburg Min. Co. v. Spooner, 74 Wis. 307.

Liability to corporation.

The cases above cited have been mostly suits by or on behalf of the corporation and the doctrine to be deduced from them is that the promoter may be compelled to turn over to the corporation his secret profits, and that is distinctly held in Hobens v. Congreve, 1 Russ. & M. 150.

There may also be a liability to the corporation on the ground of misrepresentations.

Thus in a case where the corporation was unregistered and was therefore nothing but a partner—25 L. R. A.

ship, it appeared that the promoters had advertised that all except a certain amount had been paid in and they were held liable to make up all that had not been paid, to the amount stated by them. Re Royal Victoria Palace Theatre Syndicate, L. R. 18 Eq. 661, 43 L. J. Ch. 751, 22 Week. Rep. 873, 29 L. T. N. S. 663.

If the promoter was also the owner of the property which was sold to the corporation, his fraud may entitle the corporation to a rescission of the contract.

Upon discovering that the promoter had an undisclosed interest in the sale, the whole contract may be rescinded and the consideration must be refunded. Lindsay Petroleum Co. v. Hurd, L. R. 6 Q. P. 221, 22 Week. Rep. 492.

And if the owner of the property assists the promoter in making a secret profit out of the transaction, the contract may be rescinded against him. Atwool v. Merryweather, L. R. 5 Eq. 464, note, 37 L. J. Ch. 86.

Where the owners of property, the title of which was defective, organized a corporation to purchase it and concealed the defect in title from the company, they were held liable to return the whole of the purchase money. Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Hartmont, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 394, 46 L. J. Ch. 661, 37 L. T. N. S. 2.

But in such cases the promoter is held entitled to have the property returned in case he is required to account for profits.

The mere fact that the promoter did not disclose the fact that he was the seller to the corporation and that he was making a profit, will not render him liable to return to the corporation the profit made after the property has been sold by the corporation, so that rescission of the contract has become impossible. Re Cape Breton Co. L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 221, affirmed in L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 705.

If at the time of the purchase of the property subsequently sold to the corporation, the pur-and, between Wilcox and Foley, transfers were made, as provided in said agreement, between them; Foley receiving ten of the twenty shares subscribed for by Wilcox, and Wilcox receiving on or before December 1, 1890, from Foley, fifty of the one hundred shares issued to Foley as a part of the purchase price of said patents. The first note for $1,000 was paid to said Foley, and out of the proceeds thereof, on April 30, 1890, he paid to said Wilcox $300, which was expressed to have been received by Wilcox on 'account of contract.' When the second note matured, though the corporation had the funds in the bank to pay the same, and though said Foley could have had the payment of the same at once, and was requested by said company, to receive payment, yet Foley declined to receive payment. His reason for so doing was his unwillingness to pay any further sum to Wilcox. Foley did not draw the payment of the second note until a few days before the 9th of October, 1890; and on the 9th of October, 1890, he paid Wilcox $500, and took from him a receipt for such sum 'on account.' Foley did not draw the payment of the third note when due, although he could then have done so, and was requested so to do by the company. Said note has never been paid, and said company, having learned of said agreement between Foley and Wilcox respecting the division of the proceeds of the sale of said patents to the company, now decline to pay the same. Payment of said note has never been demanded by said Foley. His reason for not having demanded the same was his unwillingness to make any further payment to Wilcox.

"On the — day of —, 1891, Wilcox brought suit against Foley upon the said written agreement between them, the same being one of the suits in which this finding is made. If said agreement between Foley and Wilcox is valid, there is due thereon from Foley to Wilcox the sum of $1,000. After said suit was brought the terms of the written agreement between Wilcox and Foley first became known to the directors of the Yale Gas Stove Company, whereupon said company, having been advised that said agreement between Wilcox and Foley was illegal and void, instituted their action against said Wilcox, which is one of the cases in which this finding is made. Of the eighty shares of stock so received by said Wilcox, five shares had been transferred by him to one Starr before the commencement of said suits, fifty-five of said shares stand in the name of Henrietta B. Wilcox, and twenty are owned by said Wilcox. Of the fifty-five shares owned by Henrietta B. Wilcox, twenty shares were the shares originally subscribed for by Wilcox in his own name. He in fact acted at the request of his wife, and as her agent, in making such subscription, and the $500 paid for said stock was the money of said Henrietta B. Wilcox. Said twenty shares were issued to said Wilcox as trustee.

chasers are not in the relation of promoters to the corporation, the mere fact that they subsequently become so will not render them liable for secret profits made on the sale, if no rescission of the contract can be had. Ladywell Min. Co. v. Brookes, L. R. 24 Ch. Div. 398, affirmed L. R. 35 Ch. Div. 400, 56 L. J. Ch. 684, 56 L. T. N. S. 677, 35 Week. Rep. 785.

The general rule also is as shown above that the promoter will not be permitted to receive shares as full paid when they are not so.

Hence if the promoter takes from the vendor of the property part of the shares given for the property under a secret agreement between them, he may be compelled to pay to the liquidator of the company their full value. Re Morvah Consols Tin Min. Co. 24 Week. Rep. 49.

So where four persons organized a corporation and took all the shares themselves, paying therefor only three fifths of their value, but entering on the books of the company the fact that the shares were fully paid, after which the stock was sold to other persons, the company upon discovering the fraud were held entitled to compel them to pay in the balance of the amount. Society for Illustration of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott, 3 Beav. 559.

But circumstances may arise under which it would not be equitable to compel the payment of the money and it will not then be done.

Thus, where all the shares of a corporation are allotted to the owners of the property in payment for it, the corporation cannot compel certain of the owners, who take a prominent part in the affairs of the company, to pay the difference between the nominal value of their shares and their interest in the property. Ex parte Taylor, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 320.

So where a number of persons associated together to work a patent, and issued shares to themselves without paying for them, the mere fact that subsequently other persons were taken into the concern who paid for their shares does not render the original members liable to pay up their shares to the liquidator upon the winding up of the corporation. Re British Seamless Paper-Box Co. L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 467, 50 L. J. Ch. 497, 44 L. T. N. S. 498, 20 Week. Rep. 600.

In Patty v. Hillsboro Roller Mill Co., 4 Tex. Civ. App. 224, a subscriber, whom the court calls a promoter, was held entitled to withdraw his subscription before the organization of the corporation, if the one who was to furnish the consideration for which the capital of the corporation was to be paid, consisting of a plant to be operated by the corporation, consented to the withdrawal.

Liability to subscribers.

In addition to the liability to the corporation as such a separate liability is recognized under certain circumstances to individual subscribers.

In England the charter is not granted until the stock is subscribed for and everything in readiness to proceed with the business of the concern. Hence some provision must be made for the custody of the money paid in, and for the necessary work preparatory to obtaining the charter. This was formerly done by the promoters, but is now generally done by a provisional committee of directors. These persons are, however, generally found by the promoters or are the promoters themselves, so that many of the decisions applying the law to a given state of facts have dealt with members of a provisional committee. These decisions are collected here because of the light which they throw upon the general question.

If the scheme proves a failure the money paid in must be returned.

If the ones originating the scheme, after procuring the money to be paid in, abandon it, the subscribers may recover back the money paid without any deduction for expenses incurred. Noekels v. Crosby, 8 Barn. & C. 814, 5 Dowl. & B. 751.

Twenty shares were afterwards, at the request of Wilcox, transferred to her by said Foley as bonus upon said subscription. The remaining fifteen of said fifty-five shares were transferred to said Henrietta B. Wilcox by her husband in consideration of an indebtedness of said Wilcox to his wife in about the sum of $800. Said Wilcox at no time informed his wife of said agreement between himself and Foley. Since its formation said corporation has continued to manufacture and sell gas stoves under said patents, the business of said company has been prosperous, and said company has paid in each and every year upon its capital stock dividends ranging from 10 to 16 per cent. I find the value of said stock to be $50 a share. Said corporation has never offered to return or transfer to either said Foley or said Wilcox said patents, or any part or interest therein, and has not done any act in rescission of its purchase of said inventions.

"At the request of all the parties to said causes, the questions of law arising upon the same, and upon said facts, are reserved for the advice and consideration of the supreme court of errors, next to be holden at New Haven, within and for the third judicial district, on the third Tuesday of January, 1894, except that judgment is rendered, in favor of Henrietta B. Wilcox in the first-entitled case."

The authority of that case was recognized in Hutton v. Thompson, 8 H. L. Cas. 161, 6 Railw. Cas. 708.

Upon abandonment of the project, the deposits may be recovered back. Chaplin v. Clarke, 4 Exch. 402; Moore v. Garwood, 4 Exch. 681, 19 L. J. Exch. 15.

If sufficient deposits are not paid to make it possible to undertake any of the business of the concern, all must be returned to the depositors. Walstab v. Spottiswoode, 15 Mees. & W. 501.

So the projectors may be compelled to return the money subscribed and paid in for the construction of a railroad, if they have aided in the formation of another rival line, which has made the projected line impossible, and have been speculating with the money so paid in. Wilson v. Stanhope, 2 Colly. Ch. Cas. 629, 10 Jur. 421.

The finance committee may be compelled to account. Clements v. Bowes, 1 Drew. 684, 1 Week. Rep. 442, 1 Eq. Rep. 553, 22 L. J. Ch. 1022.

In Manistee Lumber Co. v. Union Nat. Bank of Chicago, 143 Ill. 490, a contract by the promoters with the holder of claims against an insolvent corporation whose property was to be purchased, which claims were to be taken at a certain price and paid for in cash and stock of the new company, to turn over the dividends received on such stock in case the new company was not formed, was enforced.

A liability to subscribers may also arise in case the promoters are guilty of fraud or misrepresentation.

If the entire scheme is fraudulent, all the projectors may be held liable for the money paid in. Colt v. Woollaston, 2 P. Wms. 154.

If the project is a bubble, the subscribers may maintain an action to recover back their deposits. Green v. Barrett, 1 Sim. 45.

If the scheme is known by the promoters at the time of the subscription to be impracticable, the subscribers may recover their deposits. Harvey v. Collett, 15 Sim. 832, 4 Railw. Cas. 387, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 978, 10 Jur. 608.

One induced to purchase shares by false representations in the prospectus has a right of action to recover his damages. Gerhard v. Bates, 2 El. & Bl. 476, 20 Eng. L. & Eq. 183.

A stockholder who was induced to take his stock by the fraudulent representations of a promoter may maintain an action against him for the damages. Miller v. Barber, 66 N. Y. 558.

Promoters are liable in damages to a subscriber whose subscription is procured by fraud. Paddock v. Fletcher, 43 Vt. 389; Cridland v. DeMauley, 1 DeG. & S. 469, 12 Jur. 1015; Vollans v. Fletcher, 1 Exch. 20.

Judgment was entered for plaintiff in Owen v. Challis, 6 C. B. 115, 5 Railw. Cas. 537, 1 Dowl. & L. 802, 17 L. J. C. P. 236, 12 Jur. 701, and Coupland v. Challis, 2 Exch. 622, because of the entry of a bad plea.

A promoter may be held liable for false information furnished to be used in a prospectus, although he does not in fact himself see or approve the prospectus after it is ready for circulation. Glasier v. Rolls, 60 L. T. N. S. 591.

In Kempson v. Saunders, 4 Bing. 5, 13 Moore, 44, 2 Car. & P. 363, an action to recover money paid for stock to one who was not an original projector was sustained, the court remarking that the seller may sue the one from whom he bought until at last they come to the original projectors, and in getting at them a great service will be done.

If one procures subscriptions by representing that the property belongs to a third person and can be bought for a certain price, when it in fact belongs to him and the price stated is a large advance on what he paid for it, one induced to subscribe by such representations may recover back his subscription. Short v. Stevenson, 63 Pa. 95.

Where the promoters only allotted a few of the shares, determining to take the rest themselves if they could make a profit on them and if they could not to reject them, a suit was sustained for a return of the deposits. Blain v. Agar, 1 Sim. 87, 5 L. J. Ch. L.

A statement that the consideration for the prop-

A promoter is not allowed to receive or retain a secret profit given to him by the parties with whom the corporation contracts.

The promoters of a corporation stand in a confidential relation, not only to each other, but to all who may subsequently become members of the corporation, from the time they begin to promote the association, and will be required to account for the profits made by the purchase of the property for the company, and its sale to it at an advance.

Paduach Land Coal & Iron Co. v. Mulholand, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 23.

That no fiduciary relations existed between the corporation and its promoters, at the time the latter obtained a contract for the purchase of land, will not prevent the retention on their part of the secret profits in the sale of the land to the corporation, from being fraudulent.

Ex-Mission Land & Water Co. v. Flash, 97 Cal. 610.

Wilcox should not be heard to say that the plaintiff is not the proper party to bring suit.

Gray v. Lewis, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 1085; Hershey v. Veazie, 24 Me. 9, 41 Am. Dec. 864.

Messrs. Doolittle & Bennett, for Wilcox: The objections, that a resale to some new corporation was contemplated, that the purchase price was to be stock of such corporation, that but little time elapsed between the two contracts are not fatal.

Ladywell Min. Co. v. Brookes, L. R. 84 Ch. Div. 398, L. R. 85 Ch. Div. 400; Gover's Case, L. R. 20 Eq. Cas. 114; New Sombrero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 78; Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. 8 App. Cas. 1318.

If it be assumed that Mr. Wilcox, as director or while holding a fiduciary relation to the corporation, sold the patents to it without disclosing his interest therein, such sale is yet not void but is voidable only. Until rescinded by the company it is good.

Barr v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 268.

Inasmuch as Mr. Wilcox was acting for himself alone and was not a fiduciary of the company at the time when he acquired his interest in the patents, there were but two courses open to the company, to wit: they could affirm the sale, or rescind it, return the patents and sue for their price. They cannot, as they are here attempting, keep the patents, and recover the consideration received by Wilcox from Foley.

erty is $231,000 when that amount included $25,000 for promotion money is so far untrue that all who issued the prospectus containing the statement will be held liable for a return of the deposits—Capel v. Sim's Ships Composition Co. 58 L. T. N. S. 87, 36 Week. Rep. 689, 57 L. J. Ch. 713.

If the payment of the deposit and the signing of the contract are induced by a fraudulent misrepresentation that all the shares have been allotted, the shareholder will not be bound by the agreement so as to preclude recovery back of the deposit. Wontner v. Shairp, 4 C. B. 404.

One who is induced by the fraud of the promoter to put money into a corporation for the purpose of purchasing property, the value of which is largely overstated by the promoter, who is its owner, may recover the amount of the overpayment, and it is not necessary that the action be brought in the name of the corporation. Teachout v. Van Hoesen, 1 L. R. A. 664, 76 Iowa, 113.

Promoters who acquire the property to be used by the corporation wholly at the cost of those who pay for their shares and retain for themselves a majority of the stock, which cost them nothing, will be required to pay to the defrauded subscribers the damages caused by such action. Brewster v. Hatch, 122 N. Y. 349, affirming 10 Abb. N. C. 400.

The promoters cannot be held liable on the ground of fraud, if they proceed to form a corporation different from that stated in the prospectus. Stewart v. Austin, L. R. 8 Eq. 299.

It seems that in such case the remedy is at law against the company into which his money was put. Ship v. Crosskill, L. R. 10 Eq. 73, 30 L. J. Ch. 52, 22 L. T. N. S. 365, 18 Week. Rep. 618.

But the fact that the prospectus contains a guarantee that a certain percentage shall be paid each year does not give one who purchases shares a right of action against the promoters for the dividends, if they are not paid. Gerhard v. Bates, 2 E. & Bl. 479, 20 Eng. L. & Eq. 129.

Under the English statute the promoters are liable to subscribers if in the prospectus they do not insert contracts made by themselves for property to be subsequently sold to the corporation and for a commission for awarding construction contracts to third persons. Twycroes v. Grant, L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 469, 46 L. J. C. P. 689, 36 L. T. N. S. 812, 25 Week. Rep. 701.

If contracts required by statute to be set out in the prospectus are not so set out, the promoters and directors may be held personally liable for the injuries thereby caused to subscribers. Charlton v. Hay, 31 L. T. N. S. 437.

Where there was an understanding but no agreement that the promoters should receive from the owners a compensation for their services which was not settled upon at the time of the issuance of the prospectus, the mere fact that the existence of such understanding was not inserted in the prospectus was not such fraud as to render the promoters liable to subscribers in an action for deceit. Arkwright v. Newbold, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 301, 50 L. J. Ch. 372, 44 L. T. N. S. 898, 26 Week. Rep. 455.

In Craig v. Phillips, L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 722, 46 L. J. Ch. 49, 35 L. T. N. S. 198, the vice-chancellor held that there was no deceit which would entitle a subscriber to recover on the following facts: On March 26 defendant wrote a letter which was sent to plaintiff among others recommending a certain colliery as a first-class investment; on May 10 he bought it with £16,124; on May 29 he agreed with trustees for a corporation to be formed to sell it for £23,725; on June 21 a prospectus was issued in which only the last-named contract was mentioned, and in which defendant's name appeared as director, on the faith of which plaintiff subscribed for shares in the company.

To render one of the promoters liable to refund deposits, it must be shown that he was one of the persons to whom the deposits were paid. Burnside v. Dayrell, 3 Exch. 224, 19 L. J. Exch. 46, 6 Railw. Cas. 67.

So the provisional committee is not liable unless the money came to their hands. Watson v. Charlemont, L. R. 18 Q. B. 65, 18 Q. B. 856, 18 Jur. 117.

Upon the facts appearing upon the record, it is claimed in behalf of Jedediah Wilcox, the defendant in the principal case, that the agreement between Foley and himself was a valid and proper contract, which could be carried out without fraud, and contemplated none; that, therefore, when he began to solicit subscriptions to the stock of the new corporation, he had an interest in the patents; that he was in fact a partner with Foley; that, in making this contract with Foley he acted wholly for himself, and stood in no fiduciary relation to the Yale Gas Stove Company, or any of its stockholders. "There was," says his counsel, "no man, and no body of men, who had any hold upon him, at the time he made this contract, nor any to whom he owed a duty, nor any selected, and in contemplation, to whom he might owe a duty." The objections "that a resale to some new corporation was contemplated, that the purchase price was to be new stock of such corporation, that but little time elapsed between the two contracts," are said to be "all met and answered" by the cases of Ladywell Min. Co. v. Brookes, L. R. 84 Ch. Div. 398, and, on appeal, L. R. 85 Ch. Div. 400; Gover's Case, L. R. 20 Eq. Cas. 114; New Sombbrero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 73; and Erlanger v. New Sombbrero Phosphate Co. 8 App. Cas. 1218. It is further said that these cases, and also the case of Barr v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 263, 277, and Re Cape Breton Co. L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 795, are authorities for the defendant's further claim, that "if it be assumed that Mr. Wilcox, as director, or while holding a fiduciary relation to the corporation, sold the patents to it without disclosing his interest therein, such sale is yet not void, but is voidable only," and that "but two courses are open to the company, to wit, they could affirm the sale, or rescind it, return the patents, and sue for the price. They cannot, as they are here attempting, keep the patents, and recover the consideration received by Wilcox from Foley."

In the light of the above claims, we will first examine the cases cited in their support, and see precisely what they hold. The principal and most recent of these English cases is that of Ladywell Min. Co. v. Brookes, supra, in which the facts were that on February 1, 1878, one Palin and three associates purchased a leasehold mine for £5,000, with a view of reselling it at a profit to a company

If one making advances to others to aid in the promotion of a corporation to purchase property which he states can be bought for a certain price, which is to go to the owners, they are entitled to rescind their contract to purchase upon learning that there is a considerable profit which he is to make by effecting the sale. Cortes Co. v. Thannhauser, 45 Fed. Rep. 780.

A contract releasing the provisional directors from liability made in ignorance of their fraud may be avoided when the fraud is discovered. Grand Trunk & S. & P. U. R. Co. v. Brode, 9 Hare, 823.

Intimately connected with the question of the recovery back of deposits is the further question of the payment of the expenses of the undertaking.

The English parliamentary subscription contract provides that the expenses of the undertaking shall be paid out of deposits. Aldham v. Brown, 7 El. & Bl. 164, 8 Jur. N. S. 158.

And the letter allotting the shares may reserve to the promoters the right to apply deposits to the payment of expenses in such a way as to prevent a recovery back of deposits in case the scheme proves a failure. Jones v. Harrison, 2 Exch. 52, 5 Railw. Cas. 138, 17 L. J. Exch. 132, 12 Jur. 122.

Where the letter calling for deposits expressly states that the money is for necessary expenses, it cannot be recovered back upon failure of the scheme, if it has been so expended. Willey v. Parratt, 8 Exch. 211, 6 Railw. Cas. 32, 18 L. J. Exch. 82.

But after an application for shares the provisional committee cannot require the applicant to execute an agreement which is broader than that which is provided for by the Act of 7 & 8 Vict., chap. 110, § 23. Ashpitel v. Seroombe, 5 Exch. 147, 6 Railw. Cas. 224, 19 L. J. Exch. 82.

Signing the agreement to permit deposits to be used to pay expenses will preclude a recovery of any part of them, if they are necessary to pay such 25 L. R. A.

expenses. Garwood v. Ede, 1 Exch. 264, 5 Railw. Cas. 13, 17 L. J. Exch. 23.

And such result will not be prevented by the mere fact that the parliamentary contract is not signed, if the scrip certificate received by the subscriber states that it has been. Clements v. Todd, 1 Exch. 268, 5 Railw. Cas. 132, 17 L. J. Exch. 31.

And if the contract has been signed a nonsuit should be granted. Atkinson v. Pocock, 1 Exch. 730.

In the absence of fraud, the promoters will not be prohibited from applying deposits to the payment of current expenses by the fact that the scheme fails because of failure to raise the amount required by statute, if the subscription papers contained an agreement to raise a sum not exceeding a certain amount, with no minimum limit, and provides that deposits may be applied to expenses. Watts v. Saiter, 10 C. B. 477, 20 L. J. C. P. 42.

On the other hand if the prospectus contains a provision that in case the projected corporation is not put through all the deposits will be returned, the promoters are alone liable for the expenses, including those of winding up the concern. Re Dover & D. R. C. P. T. & C. J. Co. 4 DeG. M. & G. 411.

An undertaking to return the whole of the deposits without deductions is binding on the promoters. Ward v. Londeborough, 12 C. B. 252.

And the enforcement of the promise of the prospectus that all deposits will be returned will not be superseded by a clause in the subscription contract that deposits may be applied in satisfaction of expenses incurred in the interest of the concern. Mowatt v. Londeborough, 3 El. & Bl. 307.

But a promise in the prospectus to return the deposits will not save them from being attached at the suit of creditors. Moseley v. Cressey's Co. L. R. 1 Eq. 406, 12 Jur. N. S. 46, 35 L. J. Ch. 360, 14 L. T. N. S. 99.

In England it would seem that the allowance for expenses would include some compensation for the promoter.

to be formed. They afterwards made a provisional contract with a trustee for an intended company for £18,000 in cash. The company was formed, having for its principal object the purchase of the mine; and Palin and his associates received their purchase money, of £18,000, April 4, 1878. The contract of February 1, 1878, was not disclosed to the company, nor did it become known to it until about June, 1883, after it had gone into voluntary liquidation. In June, 1883, the company allowed judgment by default to go against them in an action by the lessor to recover possession of the mine. In 1884 the company commenced two actions—one against the executors of two deceased vendors, and the other against the two surviving vendors—to recover the secret profits made by the vendors on their sale to the company, on the ground that they stood in a fiduciary capacity to the company at the time they bought the mine. It was held that the evidence failed to show this to be the fact, and that they were not liable to refund the profit they made on the transaction. The judgment of Justice Stirling, L. R. 34 Ch. Div. 398, was appealed from; and this appeal constitutes the case in L. R. 35 Ch. Div. 400, in which the former judgment was sustained. There are several opinions. In that by Cotton, L. J., it is said that the plaintiff claims that the defendants stood in such a position at the time of their purchase that they could not have claimed to have bought the mine for themselves, and could not, therefore, sell it at an advanced price to the company. This is said to be mainly a question of fact, and on that question the contract of February 1, 1878, was, in its terms, perfectly absolute, and not dependent on any company being formed; that though, doubtless, it was contemplated a company should be formed, no part of the purchase money was to be provided for out of the funds of the company, or to consist of shares of the company. And it is added: "One thing which is very strong in favor of the defendants is that the whole of the price, £5,000, was in fact completely paid when the lease was granted, out of their own money, and not in any way out of money provided by means of this company." And, finally, it is said that the facts found did not make the defendants, at the time when they entered into the contract to purchase, persons so acting as to entitle the company afterwards to say: "When you bought this mine, you were acting for us. This purchase, although made by you, is one which must be considered as having been made by you for the company which was afterwards formed at your invitation." Lindley, L. J., concurring, said there might be a case for rescission, if rescission were possible, but that rescission was not possible, because the property assigned by the company did not belong to it any longer. He added: "Then we are driven to consider the point which was really raised and decided in Re Cape Breton Co.—whether, rescission

In Carden v. General Cemetery Co. 5 Bing. N. C. 253, 7 Scott. 97, 7 Dowd. P. C. 275, it was held that debt would lie to recover for services rendered and expenses incurred in obtaining the charter, which expressly provided for the payment of such expenses, and the reporter's note states that it is immaterial that the plaintiff was a member of the corporation, although the effect of such fact is not brought out in the opinion.

But where the promoters concealed from the corporation the fact that they received certain remuneration from the owners of property for procuring its purchase by the corporation, it was held that their action operated as a fraud on the company and precluded them from recovering from the company any compensation for their services to it. Re Hereford & S. W. Wagon & Engineering Co. L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 621, 45 L. J. Ch. 461, 35 L. T. N. S. 40, 24 Week. Rep. 953.

A statement in a prospectus that subscribers shall incur no liability in case the project does not go through, will not prevent the promoter from proceeding under the statute, in case of the winding up of the concern, for the value of his services, since the promise is to the subscribers and is not available in favor of the corporation. Re Brampton & Longtown R. Co. L. R. 10 Ch. App. 177, 44 L. J. Ch. 670, 33 L. T. N. S. 5, 23 Week. Rep. 818.

In Connecticut it has been held that no compensation can be collected for procuring subscriptions to stock. New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Ketchum, 27 Conn. 171.

In Hall v. Vermont & M. R. Co., 28 Vt. 401, charges for procuring the charter were disallowed, but those for securing stock subscriptions were allowed on the ground that the services were necessary and that a promise to pay for them would be implied.

A lump sum cannot be allowed a promoter for the expenses of organization, regardless of the actual cost of such proceedings; but, if such a sum is put into their hands, they may be compelled to render an account. Mann v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. [1892] A. C. 69, 68 L. T. N. S. 96.

Duty to bondholders.

The trust relation of promoters does not appear to have been extended so as to operate in favor of bondholders. In England it has been said that non-disclosure of contracts is not made by the statute a fraud as against bondholders. Cornell v. Hay, L. R. 8 C. P. 328, 49 L. J. C. P. 136, 38 L. T. N. S. 475, 21 Week. Rep. 580.

And in Banque Franco-Egyptienne v. Brown, 34 Fed. Rep. 162, a case in which plaintiffs sought to hold persons who had been made trustees to receive and disburse money raised by mortgage bonds on a railroad liable as trustees ex maleficio for a return of the subscription money because of their connection with the formation of the company and the publication of a false prospectus, the court apparently makes a distinction between the rights of shareholders and bondholders in favor of the former, by stating that misrepresentations by prospectus, except as between promoter and shareholder, is to be tried by the ordinary criterion of misrepresentation. But that case is not a valuable authority on the subject of liability of promoters, because defendant had assumed so many other relations and the discussion is based more upon such other relations than upon their standing as promoters pure and simple.

Character of promoter's liability.

Promoters are jointly liable for false representations, if they are all acting together for a common object. Hornblower v. Crandall, 7 Mo. App. 220, affirmed 73 Mo. 581.

The promoters are liable as partners. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 73, 45 L. J. Ch. 425, 36 L. T. N. S. 222, 26 Week. Rep. 436.

Persons who promote a corporation are liable as partners to the corporation for any illegal profits being impossible, the company can obtain from Palin an account of the profit which he made by the transactions which have been alluded to,—and that depends really upon the evidence. But the evidence is not sufficient to enable them to succeed. It is not proved that when Palin bought—that is, on the 1st of February, 1873—he bought for the company which was ultimately formed, nor that when he bought the company was so far formed as to entitle it, or its members, to claim the benefit of the purchase, on any theory of trusteeship. Nor is it proved that persons were induced to take shares on the faith that the new company was buying from the old company. It is plain that the new company did not in fact find the money which the vendors were paid. Under those circumstances, can we say that there was any such relation between Palin and the company as to entitle the company to say, 'You bought for us?' It appears to me that the evidence is not sufficient for that purpose. If it were, we could see our way to give relief." Loopes, L. J., also concurring, said: "The question is, Did Palin and his associates, on the 1st of February, stand in a fiduciary position towards this company that was thereafter to be formed? Or, in other words, were they then acting for the company about to be formed? If they were, the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed." This, he said, was entirely a question of evidence, and that in his view the evidence did not establish this conclusion.

"They bought the mine themselves, and paid for it out of their own pockets. No person is called to say they were asked to take shares by any of these vendors because they were forming a company." He concludes: "No doubt, having regard to the secret profit that was made by these vendors, the company might have claimed rescission of the contract: but, in the circumstances, rescission had become impossible." The other cases may be more briefly stated. In Gover's Case, supra, one Mappin agreed to buy a patent from Skoines for £65,000, payable partly in cash, and partly in shares of a company to be formed to use the invention. Mappin also engaged to use his best efforts to organize the company. Three months later, Mappin agreed with one Wright, who acted as trustee for the proposed company, to sell the patent to it for £125,000, payable in cash and shares, and it was also agreed that Mappin should be appointed managing director. The company was formed, and Mappin became a director. The suit was an application by Miss Gover, a subscriber pressed to pay "calls," to have her name removed from the company's register of members because of the failure to disclose the Mappin-Skoines contract in the prospectus. It was decided that the statute did not give a remedy against the company, but only against a delinquent promoter, and it held that Mappin was not a promoter when he made the contract. In Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. supra, a leasehold inwhich they have made, or for the damages which are adjudged to the corporation for failure to return the stock which they received without payment therefor, in case the corporation elects to take the stock. Chandler v. Bacon, 30 Fed. Rep. 538.

Promoters occupy towards each other the relation of partners, as to subscribers suing for a return of subscriptions. Getty v. Devlin, 54 N. Y. 403.

In Boulter v. Peplow, 9 C. B. 493, 19 L. J. C. P. 191, 14 Jur. 248, where three of the provisional committee had hired offices for the use of the corporation, which was not yet organized, and one was compelled to pay the rent, he was held entitled to contribution from the other two for their shares of the amount paid.

If a person procures others to associate themselves with him for the purpose of forming a corporation, and then acts as their secretary, he cannot maintain an action against them for his services expended on behalf of the project. Parkin v. Fry, 2 Car. & P. 811.

In Holmes v. Higgins, 1 Barn. & C. 74, 2 Dowl. & B. 196, in which it appeared that certain persons had associated for the purpose of procuring a charter for a railroad, it was held that they were partners in the enterprise, so that one could not maintain an action against others for services rendered by him as a surveyor, although there is no discussion of the relative rights of the parties in the character of promoters of a corporation.

That the promoters made a large profit out of property which they undertook to purchase for the corporation will not relieve a subscriber from paying his subscription to a receiver of the company. Dorris v. French, 4 Hun, 292.

The mere fact that the subscriber is not informed that only a portion of the subscriptions have been paid in is not such fraud as will avoid a subscription agreement. Vane v. Cobbold, 1 Exch. 796.

In Gover's Case, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 182, 45 L. J. Ch. 88, 33 L. T. N. S. 619, 24 Week. Rep. 125, affirming L. R. 20 Eq. Cas. 114, which was an application to have the name of a subscriber removed from the list, after the affairs of the corporation had begun to be wound up, it appeared that a certain person had terest in the island of Sombrero was purchased by a syndicate acting for themselves alone, and not as the representatives of any corporation existing or proposed. Soon afterwards, they formed a joint-stock company, and sold the lease to it for double the price paid by them. The contract of purchase by the corporation, at its instance, was set aside. In Re Cape Breton Co., supra, the facts, briefly, were: One Fenn was the agent of a company to purchase a specific property, in which, before the commencement of his agency, he had acquired an interest. He did purchase it for the company, without disclosing to the company his interest in the property. After his purchase the facts were fully disclosed, and, with the knowledge so acquired, the company elected to retain the property. It was held the company could not recover, but the court said: "This case is not the case of an agent who, after he has accepted the agency, has acquired property, the purchase of which was within the scope of his agency, and then has resold that property to his principal at a larger sum, in which case it is obvious that the principal may say that the original purchase by the agent at a small price was a purchase in behalf of the principal." In Barr v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 125 N. Y. 263, 277, it is sufficient to say that the principle is laid down that a voidable contract remains good until rescinded, and that, to rescind, the property obtained under the contract must be returned.

Who and what are "promoters," so called, of corporations, and what their relations to the corporations which they help to form, has been more frequently judicially considered and determined by the English courts than by those of this country. Some English cases appear to be more in point, as applicable to the questions arising upon the record, than those cited by the defendant, to which we have just referred. A "promoter" has been defined to be a person who organizes a corporation. It is said to be, not a legal, but a business, term, "usefully summing up, in a single word, a number of business operations familiar to the commercial world, by which a company is generally brought into existence." Brown, J., in Whaley Bridge Calico Printing Co. v. Green, 28 Week. Rep. 851, 852, L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 109. That such persons occupy a fiduciary relation towards the company or corporation whose organization they seek to promote is well settled by the decisions of both countries. Lord Cotton prefers to call them "trustees." Bagnall v. Carlton, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 885. Sir George Jessel, M. R., in New Sombrero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, supra, said, "Promoters stand in a fiduciary relation to that company which is their creature." In Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. supra, the lord chancellor said of promoters: "They stand, in my opinion, undoubtedly, in a fiduciary position. They have in their hands the creation and molding of the company. They have the power of agreed with the owner of a patent to purchase it for a certain price, and three months afterwards he made an agreement with a trustee for a corporation to sell it to the corporation for a price nearly double that paid for it, and two of the judges held that at the time he made his purchase he was not a promoter of the corporation, and that his failure to specify that agreement in the prospectus was not fraudulent, either under general law or under the statutes. One judge held that since, after the agreement, he became a promoter he should have made a disclosure, and one held that the failure to make the disclosure was fraudulent under the statute, and three judges to one held that the plaintiff was not entitled to have her name removed from the list.

But the company is not bound by promises made by a promoter in securing subscriptions. Joy v. Manion, 28 Mo. App. 55.

So violation of the promoters' guarantee that the railroad would pass near a certain tract of land will not release a subscriber. Braddock v. Philadelphia, M. & M. R. Co. 45 N. J. L. 363.

Feigned subscriptions.

In many cases the promoter has made an agreement with some one whose influence was needed in the enterprise that if he would subscribe for shares he would not be called upon to pay them, or fictitiously paid-up shares have been furnished him by the promoter. In such cases the corporation is generally held to be entitled to enforce the liability apparently assumed by the subscriber.

A promoter's promise that a subscriber will not be required to pay for his shares is without avail. Litchfield Bank v. Church, 29 Conn. 137.

So an agreement by the promoters that the stock issued to one of the subscribers is given him for the influence of his name and that he will not be required to pay for it is not binding on the corporation. 25 L. R. A.

tion. York Park Bldg. Asso. v. Barnes (Neb.) March 21, 1894.

So a secret agreement that a subscriber may, at his option, be relieved from a portion of his subscription is not valid as against other subscribers. White Mountain R. Co. v. Eastman, 34 N. H. 124.

Nor is it binding on a corporation. Miller v. Hanover Junction & S. R. Co. 87 Pa. 97, 30 Am. Rep. 349.

A subscriber will not be permitted to defend against a subscription on the ground that it was feigned. Graff v. Pittsburgh & S. R. Co. 81 Pa. 489.

Persons to whom promoters give shares to qualify them as directors are liable upon the winding up of the concern to pay the value of them. Re Pearson's Case, L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 222, affirmed in L. R. 5 C. H. Div. 836, 46 L. J. C. H. 839, 25 Week. Rep. 618.

A director accepting shares from a promoter to qualify him to act, which the promoter obtained without paying for them as part of his profit in getting up the concern, is liable to pay for them at their highest market value at any time after he received them. Nant-y-glo & B. Ironworks Co. v. Grave, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 738, 38 L. T. N. S. 345, 26 Week. Rep. 604.

Each of several directors who accepts from the promoter certain unpaid promotion shares is liable to the company for the whole amount due on all, and he cannot set off amounts which he has advanced to the corporation for expenses. Re Carriage Co-op. Supply Asso. 51 L. T. N. S. 286, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 823, 53 L. J. Ch. 1154, 33 Week. Rep. 411.

Directors must account for shares given them by promoters. Re Drum Slate Quarry Co. 53 L. T. N. S. 250, 55 L. J. Ch. 36.

In Re Postage Stamp Automatic Delivery Co. [1892] 8 Ch. 566, 67 L. T. N. S. 88, directors who had been rendered eligible by stock given them by the owner of the property and promoter of the company under an agreement which was afterward ratified by the company, were held not bound to defining how, and when, and in what shape, and under what supervision, it shall start into existence, and begin to act as a trading corporation. If they are doing all this in order that the company may, as soon as it starts into life, become, through its managing directors, the purchasers of the property of themselves (the promoters), it is, in my opinion, incumbent upon the promoters to take care that in forming the company they provide it with an executive; that is to say, with a board of directors, who shall both be aware that the property which they are asked to buy is the property of the promoters, and who shall be competent and impartial judges as to whether the purchase ought or ought not to be made. I do not say that the owner of property may not promote and form a joint-stock company, and then sell his property to it; but I do say that if he does he is bound to take care that he sell it to the company through the medium of a board of directors who can and do exercise an independent and intelligent judgment on the transaction, and who are not left under the belief that the property belongs, not to the promoter, but to some other person." Lord O'Hagan, referring to the same subject, expressed a similar opinion in even more emphatic language; declaring that while an original purchase might be legitimate, and not less so because the object of the purchaser was to sell it again, and to sell it by forming a company which might afford them a profit on the transaction, yet "the privilege given them for promoting such a company for such an object involved obligations of a very serious kind. It required, in its exercise, the utmost good faith, the completest truthfulness, and a careful regard to the protection of the future stockholders." The test, therefore, of the validity of such transactions, is that it must, in all its parts, be open and pay up the amount of them, but were required to pay up the amount of other shares received by them under an agreement which was concealed from the company.

And equal strictness is observed in all cases of feigned subscriptions or transactions amounting thereto.

An agreement, by which persons organizing a corporation are to have bonds of the corporation to an amount equal to the stock subscribed for, secured by mortgage on the company's property, is illegal and void and cannot be enforced against the company. Morrow v. Nashville Iron & Steel Co. (Tenn.) 8 L. R. A. 37.

A promoter cannot make an agreement with a director to take from him his qualification shares at any time he may wish to resign, at the price he paid for them. Re North Australian Territory Co. (Archer's Case) [1892] 1 Ch. 322.

Directors who accept shares from the promoters to qualify themselves may be rendered personally liable for the return of deposits which have been induced by false misrepresentations in the prospectus. Henderson v. Lacon, L. R. 5 Eq. 249, 18 L. T. N. S. 27, 16 Week. Rep. 323.

Where the provisional directors professed to the shareholders that they had taken enough additional stock to float the concern, they were not allowed to pay back to themselves the whole amount so advanced, upon the failure of the scheme. Williams v. Page, 24 Beav. 664, 4 Jur. N. S. 102, 27 L. J. Ch. 426.

Waiver of fraud.

A fraud practiced on stockholders cannot be ratified or even waived by the directors. Burbank v. Dennis (Cal.) Jan. 11, 1894.

How suit should be brought.

The result of the promoter's owing a duty to both corporation and subscriber is that breach of duty may render him liable to different kinds of action. Of course in many cases the remedy is plain and the proper plaintiff a matter of no doubt. But cases have arisen in which relief has been in a form which has been adjudged to be improper.

A distinction was made between an action by the company for rescission and by subscribers for deceit, in Arkwright v. Newbold, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 201, 50 L. J. Ch. 372, 44 L. T. N. S. 303, 29 Week. Rep. 455.

If the agreement of the individual subscribers is merely to take stock in the corporation and the corporation agrees to purchase the property, it is the proper party to bring suit for a rescission of 25 L. R. A.

the contract to purchase. Ex-Mission Land & Water Co. v. Flash, 97 Cal. 610.

And if the promoters have received money on subscriptions and used it in purchasing property, from which a profit has been realized, it may be secured for the benefit of the subscribers at the suit of some on behalf of all, although the corporation has never been formed and the subscribers are not limited to the remedy of suing for a return of their deposits. Butt v. Monteaux, 1 Kay & J. 98, 24 L. J. Ch. 99.

If the promoters are charged with having sold land to the corporation at a profit and with having squandered the funds of the corporation, individual members of the corporation cannot maintain a bill on behalf of themselves and others without showing that the company was prevented from maintaining the suit in its corporate capacity. Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 439.

But in case the corporation will not bring an action to recover the secret profits, it may be maintained by a stockholder. Burbank v. Dennis (Cal.) Jan. 11, 1894.

One shareholder may maintain a bill on behalf of himself and all others for an account of the receipts and expenses of the promoters and a return of the unexpended balance. Cooper v. Webb, 15 Sim. 464, 4 Railw. Cas. 582, 11 Jur. 443.

If a majority of the stock is owned by the promoter, so that the corporation cannot be prevailed upon to bring the action, it may be brought by one subscriber on behalf of himself and others. Atwood v. Merryweather, 37 L. J. Ch. 35.

In Apperley v. Page, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 100, some of the subscribers were held entitled to maintain a bill on behalf of all, where it sought an account, alleged that the promoters had been expending money for unauthorized purposes, and asked that only legitimate expenses should be paid out of the deposits and the remainder returned to subscribers.

The plaintiff need not proceed under the winding-up acts, and neither the directors nor the other shareholders need be parties to the record. Clements v. Bowes, 17 Sim. 167, 16 Jur. 96, 21 L. J. Ch. 306.

If the promoters have paid back a portion of the deposits, individual subscribers cannot maintain an action on behalf of themselves and all others for an account, since if there has been an overpayment the promoters are entitled to have a pro rata return of it, and are therefore entitled to have all the subscribers before the court. Williams v. Salmond, 2 Kay & J. 463, 2 Jur. N. S. 251.

H. P. F.

fair, so that the promoters shall not, in fact substantially "act both as vendors and vendees, and in the latter capacity approve a transaction suggested by them in the former." Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 461, 488; McElhenry's App. 61 Pa. 188; Simons v. Vulcan Oil & Min. Co. Id. 202; Densmore Oil Co. v. Densmore, 64 Pa. 43; Pittsburg Min. Co. v. Spooner, 74 Wis. 307; South Joplin Land Co. v. Case, 104 Mo. 572; Re British Seamless Paper-Box Co. L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 487; Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Hartmont, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 594. In the last case the distinctive feature was that the vendors paid the commission to the trustees who received the property on behalf of the company. They were compelled to pay it to the company. In Hichens v. Congreve, 1 Russ. & M. 150 (on appeal, 4 Russ. 563), three promoters induced their company to buy a mine for £25,000, of which they received from the vendor, and divided among themselves, £15,000. This they were compelled to account for to the company. Similar cases are Beck v. Kantorowicz, 8 Kay & J. 230; Whaley Bridge Calico Printing Co. v. Green, supra; Rinna Silver Min. Co. v. Grant, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 918; Bagnall v. Carlton, supra; Kent v. Freehold Land & Brick-making Co. 17 L. T. N. S. 77; Re Mission Land & Water Co. v. Flash, 97 Cal. 610.

It is an undoubted rule of law that where two or more persons associate themselves for the purpose of purchasing property, and one of them represents to the others that particular property can be bought for a designated price, which he procures to be paid by his associates, when in fact he receives a difference between said sum and a less one, he may be compelled to account for such difference without any rescission of the contract, and although the property may be worth all or more than was paid for it. Emery v. Parrott, 107 Mass. 95. The same principle is applied against promoters of corporations, in case of any secret contract more favorable than that disclosed. Pittsburg Min. Co. v. Spooner, supra, and the very numerous cases therein cited, and an exhaustive note, by Mr. Freeman, to said case, 17 Am. St. Rep. 149, 187. See also, as applied to directors, Cook, Stock & Stockholders & Corporation Law, §§ 649, 650; Gilman, C. & S. R. Co. v. Kelly, 77 Ill. 426; Wardell v. Union Pac. R. Co. 103 U. S. 651, 28 L. ed. 509; McGourkey v. Toledo & O. Cent. R. Co. 146 U. S. 536, 36 L. ed. 1079.

A careful examination of the cases will, we think, disclose two grounds of the liability of defendants to corporations for undisclosed profits resulting from transactions with such corporations: First, where the defendants are corporate fiduciaries. The characteristic of this relation is trust. Such a relation undoubtedly exists between companies and their officers, such as directors. Mallory v. Mallory-Wheeler Co. 61 Conn. 185. With reference to promoters, since a man cannot receive an appointment from a non-existent company, the proof may be less obvious; but it may nevertheless be shown conclusively, by a variety of representations, admissions, and acts. The second ground of liability is fraud. The law does not prohibit a promoter from dealing with his company, but he must make full disclosure to the company of his relations to the property that is the subject of his deal. Suppression, concealment, or misrepresentation of material facts is fraud, upon proof of which rescission of contract, or repayment of the secret profits, will be compelled. A very recent English case, in which a secret arrangement between a promoter and a director of a company was considered, is that of Re North Australian Territory Co.—Archer's Case—[1892] 1 Ch. 822. The facts in the case were these: Archer, being requested by the promoter of a projected company to become a director, agreed to do so upon the terms that if he should, at any time, desire to part with the shares he was to take in order to qualify him as director, the promoter should purchase them of him at the price he should pay for them. The company was subsequently formed, and Archer became a director, took the qualification shares, and paid for them at par, out of his own money, and from time to time acted as director; but he never disclosed to his codirectors, or to the company, his agreement with the promoter. He afterwards resigned his office of director, and, subsequently to his resignation, the promoter, at his request, paid to him the sum which he had paid for the shares, and accepted a transfer of them. At that time the shares were valueless in the market. In the winding up of the company, the liquidators asked that Archer be ordered to pay to them the sum received by him from the promoter, with interest; and it was held (reversing the lower court) that having regard to his position as director of, and therefore agent for, the company, whatever benefit or profit accrued to him under the indemnity constituted by his secret agreements with the promoter belonged to the company, and that the retention by him of the proceeds of the indemnity occasioned a loss to the company, for which he was accountable, with interest, upon what was declared to be the principle of Hay's Case, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 598, and Re Pearson's Case, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 386. During the argument the counsel for the liquidators, in support of the appeal, were stopped by the court; and counsel for Archer, then proceeding, were submitted to some peculiar interruptions by the judges. Fry, L. J., asked: "Why should not Archer be accountable for the £500, as property of the company retained by him?" Counsel replied: "The real question is, Did the company suffer loss by what was done? They never had the £500, and therefore cannot be said to have lost it. In the majority of cases in which a director has been held accountable to the company, he has, in effect, received money which originally came from the coffers of the company, as in Hay's Case, and the cases already mentioned." Bowen, L. J.: "Smith, being in a fiduciary relation to the company, had no right to give a director a benefit without the company knowing it. An indemnity against loss is a valuable consideration." Counsel said: "At the time the letter was written, Archer had not taken the shares, and had not then agreed to become a director. Again, there is no evidence that the contract was not disclosed to the company." Fry, L. J., asked: "Would an honorable man assent, as Archer did, to accepting this indemnity, on the terms that he was to keep it secret? If it was not actually dishonest, it seems to me to be a very improper course of proceeding." Bowen, L. J.: "Is it right that the wolf should give a sop to the watchdog without his master's leave?" This question appears to have practically "closed the debate." The opinions of the judges, separately declared, appear at considerable length in the report, and are so able and apposite that we regret that we cannot feel warranted in quoting from them.

Applying the principles recognized in the decisions to which we have referred to the case before us, it seems clear that the plaintiff in the principal case is entitled to recover. The finding is explicit that the original arrangement between Wilcox and Foley contemplated no acquisition of any interest in the patents by Wilcox, but the organization by Wilcox of a corporation, and the sale to it of such patents; then a division between Foley and Wilcox of the avails of such sales. The written contract between Wilcox and Foley was entered into for the purpose of carrying out said plan of organizing the company, selling the patent, and dividing the avails. In the agreement itself, while it is stated, under a "whereas," that Wilcox is desirous of owing one half of said patents, yet the very writing discloses that the proper construction of this language is that the patents, as belonging to Foley, should be sold to a joint-stock corporation, to be organized by Wilcox, for twice the sum that Foley was willing to dispose of them for, namely, for the sum of $3,000 in cash to be received from the company, and $5,000 of the capital stock of the company, and that then Foley should give to "said Wilcox one half of the three thousand dollars cash, as soon as received, and one half of the five thousand dollars of the capital stock of the company, as he shall receive it." Such being the arrangement, it was, very appropriately, agreed that it should be kept secret. Wilcox, in soliciting subscriptions for stock, most scrupulously observed such obligation of secrecy, and also went further, and, "for the purpose of inducing persons to subscribe for said stock, stated to nearly all of the persons who subscribed for said stock, and who now constitute the stockholders of said company, that he (Wilcox) was putting his money into said enterprise upon precisely the same basis as the others of said subscribers, and it was with that understanding that nearly all of said persons subscribed for said stock." The corporation was organized, and Wilcox, at its first meeting, was present, and was elected temporary clerk and a director, and voted in favor of a resolution (which was adopted) which recited that Foley was the owner of certain letters-patent, necessary and convenient for the purposes of the company, and which directed their purchase for certain stock and the sum of $3,000 in cash. It will thus be seen that the transaction between Wilcox and Foley contemplated, and 25 L. R. A.

Wilcox, in its execution, both as promoter and director, used, every possible species of bad faith, breach of trust, and infidelity, while occupying such a fiduciary relation. Placing the actual conduct of Wilcox side by side with the standard of conduct required of those in such positions, as declared by the judges in the New Sombrero Phosphate Co. Case, supra, so much relied upon as authority by the defendant, the contrast is overpowering. Although many of the very numerous cases which we have cited, and almost numberless others to which reference might also be made, are direct authorities for the doctrine that, in such cases as that before us, a defendant may be compelled to account, though no offer of rescission is made, and the property may be worth as much or more than was paid for it, and although the subject has already been incidentally referred to and considered, in certain aspects of it, in this opinion, yet, in view of certain language in some of the cases upon which the defendant relies, including Mallory v. Mallory-Wheeler Co., supra, and Tryon v. White & Corbin Co. 62 Conn. 171, 20 L. R. A. 291, it may be useful, further, to say that, properly understood, there is nothing in any of such cases cited by the defendant in conflict with the doctrine stated. Thus, in Mallory v. Mallory-Wheeler Co., supra, the plaintiff sought to recover a sum as balance of salary claimed to be due him for services rendered as chief manager and director of the defendant's business. It was claimed that the contract under which such service was performed was void, or, if not void, that it was voidable at the option of the corporation. This court, treating it as a case in which a director had made use of a fiduciary relation to secure for himself an advantageous contract for a salary, held that, independent of the question of public policy, such transaction was voidable at the election of the corporation. The court then added: "It may fairly be gathered from the authorities cited that the rule we are now considering does not operate, ipso viro, to avoid every transaction of a trustee, made with his beneficiary, in which he is interested. It is generally limited in its operation to rendering it voidable at the election of the party whose interests are concerned in the question of its affirmance or disaffirmance. If, therefore, nothing was done in avoidance, the transaction remains. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1077; Duncomb v. New York, H. & N. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 190, 198. Much more if the transaction has been ratified by that party. Barr v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 255. This court, in that case, was considering a transaction in which there was no concealment or secret profit, and nothing proved to have been done in actual, as distinguished from constructive, bad faith or fraud; and the plain distinction between such a case and the one under consideration, in reference to equitable relief, is clearly shown in the section referred to in Pomeroy (1077), and the very numerous authorities cited in the exhaustive note to that section, in the second edition. The same thing may be said in reference to other cases relied upon by the defendant; and we think the contention that a person who, first as a promoter, then as a director, induces a corporation to embark its capital in a business, in such a way that the rescission of its purchase of property essential to the continued life of the company can only be made by the sacrifice of such existence, can retain his secret profits in the transaction, unless the contract shall be rescinded and the enterprise abandoned, is contrary to the doctrine of numerous cases, and without the intended sanction of any. Such a rule would permit retention of secret profits, and its enforcement would turn the courts into promoters, not of corporations, but of frauds upon them, numerous enough as they are, and needing no such promotion. "It is a general rule that a party defrauded in a bargain may, on discovering the fraud, either rescind the contract, and demand back what has been received under it, or he may affirm the bargain, and sue and recover damages for the fraud." Cooley, Torts, 589, 591, and cases cited in note 2. Thus, if, after discovering a shortage in goods, the price is paid, an action lies for the fraud, although the contract may not be disaffirmed. Nauman v. Oberle, 90 Mo. 666. So, also, in case of wrong dealing by a trustee, the rule is, when the facts come to the knowledge of the cestui que trust, he may either affirm or repudiate the transaction, and if he does the former he may yet recover secret profits. Thus, where a partner sold his own goods to a partnership without the knowledge of his associates, he was held liable to account to them for the profits. Bentley v. Craven, 18 Beav. 75. See also, Kimber v. Barber, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 56; Gelty v. Devlin, 54 N. Y. 412. The same rule applies in the law of principal and agent, and of attorney and client; indeed, in every case where one improperly conducts himself to his own advantage while acting in any fiduciary capacity. The language, therefore, cited from Mallory v. Mallory-Wheeler Co. and the statement in Tryon v. White & Corbin Co. 62 Conn. 178, 20 L. R. A. 291, that "an acceptance of the benefits of the transaction imposes an obligation to assume its burdens," and the principles stated in other decisions relied upon by the defendant, have no legitimate application to cases where a corporation seeks to recover from a promoter or director money had and received, which, in equity and good conscience, belonged to the corporation. Instead of rescinding the transaction of purchase, the corporation, by its suit, affirms it, and enforces the real contract, as made for its benefit, and not the pretended contract, as simulated, in order to defraud it. In such a case the corporation recognizes the obligation to assume the burdens, and only demands that it shall receive "the benefits, of the transaction." Indeed, the principle of Murray v. Jennings, 42 Conn. 9, 19 Am. Rep. 527, is decisive of this whole matter.

The defendant in the principal case further contends that the Yale Gas Stove Company does not appear in court with clean hands.

It is said the finding shows that "the real bargain between Foley and the Yale Gas Stove Company fixed the price to be paid for his patents at $3,000 in cash and $5,000 in stock," but that, to avoid the joint-stock law, and to defraud the public, a sham contract was made; that thereafter a court of equity should leave them where they have placed themselves. "With what propriety," it is asked, "can the court decree that one party shall give up to the other an illegal profit, while permitting that other to keep an equally illegal profit obtained in the same transaction?" The maxim that "he who comes into equity must come with clean hands" has no such application as the defendant seeks to give it. It refers solely to willful misconduct in regard to the matter in litigation. Snell, Eq. 35. Though an obligation be indirectly connected with an illegal transaction, it will not thereby be barred from enforcement, if the plaintiff does not require the aid of the illegal transaction to make out his case. Armstrong v. American Ech. Nat. Bank, 188 U. S. 488, 83 L. ed. 747; Lewis's App. 67 Pa. 158, 166; Woodward v. Woodward, 41 N. J. Eq. 224; Pittsburg Min. Co. v. Spooner, supra.

Finally, the suit was properly brought by the corporation, instead of by its stockholders. The question arose in New Sombraero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, supra, and James, L. J., said (L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 122): "The company represent the contracts of yesterday as of to-day, as they will the contracts of tomorrow or the next day or next year. They represent the contracts which were made by the company. They are liable upon the contracts, and they have every right, in respect of those contracts, which an individual being would have if he had the like case, or was under the like liability. Therefore, I am of the opinion that the company not only can sue, but that the company was the only proper plaintiff that could sue, upon the case made by this bill." See also, 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 546; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1094, 1096, and the numerous cases therein cited. Indeed, no contention upon this point was made.

In reference to the suit of Wilcox v. Foley, the contract between them was manifestly opposed to public policy, to good morals. It is illegal, and cannot be enforced. If any one has a cause of action against Foley, not upon the contract, but by reason of the transaction to which it led, it is the corporation, and not Wilcox.

The superior court is advised that judgment be rendered for the plaintiff in Yale Gas Stove Co. v. Wilcox, to recover $3,000, with interest on $500 of said sum from October 9, 1890, to the date of said judgment, and interest on the balance, of $2,500, from December 1, 1890, with costs, and, in the case of Wilcox v. Foley, that judgment be rendered for the defendant.

Anthony CARROLL, Appt.

(.....Conn.....)

1. Testimony under oath before a committee of aldermen investigating charges against the city board of public works is not absolutely privileged.
2. The report of a committee of aldermen is admissible to show that the committee did investigate matters not specifically committed to it in order to show that a witness, who is charged with slander in statements made to the committee, was making relevant statements.
3. Pertinent and relevant testimony of a witness before a committee of aldermen having power to compel testimony is within the conditional privilege of the witness, although the committee appointed to investigate certain charges against the board of public works had extended the scope of its investigation to other charges against the board, and in respect to these the evidence was given.
4. The mere fact that words uttered by a witness were not in response to questions does not avoid the privilege, if they were spoken in respect to pertinent and relevant matters, although statements officiously volunteered might be evidence of express malice.
5. A citizen is privileged in going before a committee of aldermen investigating charges against city officials and in good faith giving such information as he may have touching the matter under investigation.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the utterance of an alleged slander. Reversed.

Plaintiffs were general contractors for public works; defendant was a sewer contractor; a committee of aldermen was appointed to investigate charges against the board of public works. Defendant appeared before it and made the following statement:

"I may be poor; I don't own as much money as the Blakeslees; but I tell you, you see the city property go up there, and see the Blakeslees' yard; see the cobble stones and paving stones belonging to the city; look at the city year book, and see how much they drew out of it; no wonder they be rich; and why cast reflections on my name, when I do my work?" By these words, as plaintiffs charged, defendant "meant to be understood and was understood by those who heard him, to mean that the plaintiffs did not honestly obtain said cobble stones and paving stones, and that they had either stolen the same, or they had fraudulently obtained them by collusion with the board of public works; and that they had unlawfully taken into their possession and unlawfully appropriated to their own use a large quantity of paving stones and cobble stones, the property of the city of New Haven, with an attempt to defraud said city."

Mr. William L. Bennett for appellant.
Messrs. E. P. Arvine and R. S. Pickett, for appellees:

The verdict taken with the charge shows that the jury have found that the words were malicious. Carroll departing from any issue before the committee simply took these two occasions to slander a rival firm of contractors.

The admission of the excluded question was claimed on the ground that the defendant might show that he made a complaint in good faith as a citizen, to the committee of the whole, believing his complaint to be true, and might show what he had heard in order to prove his good faith in the matter.

The committee of the whole was not a proper body before which to make such a complaint.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in an action of slander. The complaint sets out the alleged slanderous words in full, and alleges, in substance, that they charge or impute a crime, and are false and malicious. The defendant in his answer, after admitting that he uttered the words set out in the complaint, but denying that they had the meaning therein ascribed to them, alleged, in substance—First, that they were true, and not false and malicious; second, that "said words were spoken by the defendant as a witness testifying under oath before a committee of the board of aldermen of the city of New Haven, a body having power through their presiding officer to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses before them by the issue of subpoenas and the administration of oaths in the manner and according to the rules governing the same in courts of justice;" third, that "said words were spoken by the defendant as a witness at a certain hearing or investigation held by the board of aldermen of the city of New Haven, sitting as a committee of the whole, concerning the performance by the board of public works of said city, as then constituted, of the duties imposed upon said board of public works; and in connection therewith concerning the granting of contracts to persons connected with the government of the city of New Haven, and serving upon any of the boards of said city;" and "that it was the duty and privilege of the defendant, not only as a person employed and making his living in constructing sewers, but as a citizen interested as such in the good and economical government of the city, to bring to the attention of said board of aldermen at said hearing such matters as were believed by him to be true, and as were pertinent and relevant to the matters under consideration by said board; and that the words so uttered were pertinent and relevant, and were uttered without malice and in good faith."

It is quite evident from the record that the main contention between the parties in the court below related to the question whether the occasion upon which the alleged slanderous words were uttered was what is called a "privileged occasion," either absolutely or conditionally; and, if the latter, whether the defendant had exceeded his privilege, or had been influenced by actual malice; and the questions involved in the present appeal relate almost entirely to the same matters. The reasons of appeal are somewhat numerous, assigning errors in the rejection of evidence, in the refusal of the court to charge certain requests, and in certain parts of the charge as given; but it is hardly necessary to consider them all separately or in their numerical order. One of the questions presented, and one that it seems well to consider first, is whether the occasion upon which the words in question were uttered was one of absolute privilege, as it is called, or only one of conditional privilege. It is settled law that in action of slander and libel the defendant is permitted to show, if he can, that the circumstances under which the defamatory words were published were such as to shield him from liability for what would otherwise be an actionable wrong. In such cases the occasion of the publication is, for the sake of common convenience and in the interests of society, said to free the defendant from the liability that would otherwise be imposed upon him, and is called a "privileged occasion." These occasions are usually divided into two classes,—those absolutely privileged, and those conditionally privileged. The general rule is that defamatory words spoken upon an occasion absolutely privileged, though spoken falsely, knowingly, and with express malice, impose no liability for damages recoverable in an action of slander; while such words spoken upon an occasion only conditionally privileged impose such liability, if spoken with what is called express malice. In the former class the freedom from liability is said to be absolute or without condition, as contrasted with such freedom in the latter class, where it is said to be conditioned upon the want or absence of express malice. The freedom from liability in the first class is founded upon the principle that in certain cases it is "advantageous for the public interest that persons should not be in any way fettered in their statements," but should speak out the whole truth, freely and fearlessly. Odgers, Libel & Slander, *186. This class is comparatively a narrow one, and is, speaking generally, strictly confined to legislative proceedings, judicial proceedings in the established courts of justice, acts of state, and acts done in the exercise of military and naval authority. In judicial proceedings the protection of the rule extends to judges, counsel, and witnesses. "I take this to be a rule of law not founded, as is the protection in other cases of privileged statements, on the absence of malice in the party sued, but founded on public policy, which requires that a judge in dealing with the matter before him, a party in preparing or resisting a legal proceeding, and a witness in giving evidence in a court of justice, shall do so with his mind uninfluenced by the fear of an action for defamation or a prosecution for libel." Kennedy v. Billiard, 10 Ir. C. L. Rep. 195; Munster v. Lamb, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 588; Seaman v. Netherclift, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 540; Dawkins v. Rokeby, L. R. 7 H. L. Cas. 744. In the case last cited, which was the case of a witness before a military court of inquiry, Lord Penzance thus states the foundation of the rule: "I wish to say one word on the supposed hardship of the law which is brought into question by this appeal. It is said that a statement of fact of a libelous nature which is palpably untrue—known to be untrue by him who made it, and dictated by malice—ought to be the subject of a civil remedy, though made in the course of a purely military inquiry. This mode of stating the question assumes the untruth and assumes the malice. If by any process of demonstration, free from the defects of human judgment, the untruth and malice could be set above and beyond all question or doubt, there might be ground for contending that the law of the land should give damages to the injured man. But this is not the state of things, under which this question of law has to be determined. Whether the statements were, in fact, untrue, and whether they were dictated by malice, are, and always will be, open questions, upon which opinions may differ, and which can only be resolved by the exercise of human judgment. And the real question is whether it is proper on grounds of public policy to remit such questions to the judgment of a jury. The reasons against so doing are simple and obvious. A witness may be utterly free from malice, and may yet, in the eyes of the jury, be open to that imputation; or, again, the witness may be cleared by the jury of the imputation, and may yet have to encounter the expense and distress of a harassing litigation. With such possibilities hanging over his head, a witness cannot be expected to speak with that free and open mind which the administration of justice demands."

The existence of what is called an absolute privilege at common law in the case of a witness testifying in a court of law is generally recognized by the courts of this country, although they are not perhaps agreed as to the extent of the privilege, or as to the occasions which are absolutely privileged, to the extent of the rule as applied in England. Kirkpatrick v. Eagle Lodge, 26 Kan. 384, 40 Am. Rep. 316; Maurice v. Worden, 54 Md. 238, 39 Am. Rep. 384; White v. Nicholls, 44 U. S. 8 How. 287, 11 L. ed. 591; Bradley v. Fisher, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 335, 20 L. ed. 646; Cooley, Torts, p. 211.

According to the English authorities, the rule undoubtedly is that to a witness in a court of justice, testifying in a cause properly before the court, the occasion is one of absolute privilege from liability for damages in an action of slander. Whether the rule as it prevails in England and elsewhere as to such witnesses prevails in this state as to them, as claimed by the defendant, it is not necessary to determine, because we think the proceeding before the committee was not a judicial or quasi judicial proceeding within the meaning of the rule as to absolute privilege as it is held anywhere. It was a proceeding to investigate the truth of certain statements made to the board of aldermen, and the power and the duty of the committee were simply to obtain such information as it could concerning those statements, and report to the board of aldermen for its action. The persons who were to make the inquiry had no judicial character or office, had no settled jurisdiction or fixed mode of procedure, and they had no judicial function to exercise, for they could decide nothing, and could only report their action to a board, which might altogether disregard what the committee had done. In no proper sense can the committee be called a judiciary body, or its proceedings judicial. A judicial proceeding within the meaning of the rule as to absolute privilege must, we think, be one carried on in a court of justice established or recognized by law, wherein the rights of parties which are recognized and protected by law are involved and may be determined. The proceedings before this committee were clearly not proceedings of that kind. But it is said that, under section 26 of the charter of the city, the presiding officer of the committee had "power to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses . . . by the issue of subpoenas and the administration of oaths in the manner and according to the rules governing the same in courts of justice." This provision, however, cannot be held to confer judicial or quasi judicial power upon the presiding officer, and certainly not upon the committee. All it gives is power to the presiding officer to issue subpoenas for and administer oaths to witnesses whom the committee may desire to improve, and nothing more. If the witness refuses to obey the subpoena, neither the presiding officer nor the committee has power to issue a capias; and if the witness appears, but refuses to testify, neither the committee nor the presiding officer has power under section 26 to commit him for such refusal. Noyes v. Byrbee, 45 Conn. 382. We know of no authority for holding that the proceedings before this committee were either judicial or quasi judicial proceedings within the meaning of the rule now under consideration. The class of occasions where the utterance of defamatory words is absolutely privileged is, as before stated, confined within narrow limits, and the courts as a rule have steadily refused to enlarge those limits. Odgers, Libel & Slander, p. 184; Stevens v. Sampson, L. R. 5 Exch. Div. 53. In Maurice v. Worden, supra, the court enumerates the cases in which absolute privilege has been accorded, and says: "Beyond this enumeration we are not prepared to go. The doctrine of absolute privilege is so inconsistent with the rule that a remedy should exist for every wrong that we are not disposed to extend it beyond the strict line established by a concurrence of decisions." See also White v. Nicholls, supra. We see no good reason upon this record for enlarging it so as to include proceedings of the kind in question. The court below committed no error in refusing to charge that the occasion was one of absolute privilege.

The defendant further claims that, inasmuch as the second defense was not demurred to, the court should have charged the jury that the facts therein stated, if proved, constituted a complete defense to the action. For the reasons already given, we think this claim is unfounded, and the court below committed no error in refusing to so charge.

The defendant further claimed in the court below that the occasion was one conditionally privileged. His grievance here and now is not that the lower court did not so charge, but it is that the instructions given upon this point were misleading in some respects, and erroneous in certain other respects, and failed to present the matter properly to the jury. He also claims that the court erred in rejecting certain evidence bearing upon the question of conditional privilege. We will consider first the claim last stated. From the evidence in the case, it appears that certain written statements of charges had been made to the board of aldermen of the city of New Haven concerning the purchase of a road roller by the board of public works of said city. This matter was, by the board of aldermen, duly referred for consideration and investigation to a committee of the whole of said board of aldermen; and it was before this committee, during its investigation of the matter aforesaid, that the words in question were uttered. The written statements or charges so preferred to the board of aldermen, together with the action of said board in so referring the matter, and a copy of section 26 of the charter of New Haven, constitute Exhibit 1, which was laid in evidence by the defendant in the court below without objection. It was let in "for the purpose of proving the authority and power of said committee before which the words were uttered, and to prove what matters were committed to it for investigation." In the lower court the defendant claimed that the committee did in fact investigate and hear evidence upon other matters than the matter thus specifically referred to it; that the words charged were spoken by the defendant as a witness before the committee with reference to such other matters, and were pertinent and relevant thereto; and that these facts made the occasion one of conditional privilege at least. The plaintiffs denied that the words were pertinent or relevant to any matter before the committee, or at least to any matter properly before the committee. It was to show that the committee did in fact investigate and consider outside matters so or speak, and that the alleged slanderous words were pertinent and relevant to such matters, that the rejected evidence was offered. The record states the matter as follows: "For the purpose of showing the scope of the investigation, and that the committee of the whole included in the investigation all matters of grievance which any person might have against the board of public works, and in order to show the pertinency and relevancy of the evidence of the defendant before the committee of the whole, the defendant offered to produce in evidence the report of the committee of the whole concerning said investigation, and the record of the board of aldermen accepting said report." This was defendant's Exhibit 2. It was admitted that it contained no reference to the defendant's statement made before the committee. Upon a general objection, the exhibit was excluded. For the same purpose the defendant then offered the stenographer's notes of the evidence taken at said investigation, which also, upon a general objection, were rejected. The defendant then for the same purpose offered the testimony of a number of the committee, who were present at all the hearings of the committee, but, on a general objection, the court excluded the testimony. The court thus apparently excluded all evidence of this fact from the jury; for if it could not be shown by the record evidence, nor by the parol testimony of those present at the meeting, it could hardly be shown at all. If the fact was admissible, clearly it must be proved, if at all, in one of these two ways; and we think it was admissible, and that the record offered was competent evidence to prove the fact sought to be established by it, namely, that the committee did in fact investigate and hear evidence upon matters outside of that which was specifically committed to it. In the first place, this record was a public document. By the charter (section 9) it is made the duty of the city clerk to make regular entries of all votes and proceedings of the board of aldermen; and all records kept by him have the same validity as the records of town clerks, and are expressly made "in all courts evidence of the truth of the matter therein recorded." By the express terms of the charter, then, it was admissible to prove the truth of the matters therein recorded. In the next place the record clearly shows that the committee did in fact investigate and hear evidence upon other and outside matters, and also shows in a general way what those matters were, and this was all the defendant claimed to prove by it. That the fact sought to be established by this evidence was admissible is we think quite clear.

The committee, it is true, were by the action of the board of aldermen charged only with the duty of acting upon certain specific statements or charges made against the board of public works. It might, and perhaps ought to, have confined itself to this specific duty, but if it saw fit to extend the scope of its investigation so as to embrace other charges against the board of public works, and invited, permitted, or compelled persons to come before it, and testify or make statements pertinent and relevant to the matters before it, we think the occasion would be, as to such parties making such statements or testifying in good faith, one of conditional privilege. Under the charter (sections 37 and 38) the members of the board of public works are elected by the board of aldermen, and may be removed by them for cause. This power to remove includes the power to investigate the official conduct of the board of public works; and this work of investigating may, at certain stages of it at least, be conducted, we think, by the board of aldermen sitting as a committee of the whole. The outside investigation as to charges or grievances against the board of public works, which it is claimed the committee did in fact make, was certainly a work which the board of aldermen might have originally referred to the committee, and was one of which the board of aldermen by its vote approved. It was thus a work over which the committee had apparent authority, and to a person in the position of the defendant such apparent authority was sufficient to protect him, if his statements before it were pertinent and relevant to the matter in hand, and were made in good faith and without express malice. As the question whether the occasion was a privileged one depended so largely on the further question whether or not the words charged were pertinent and relevant to the matters actually before the committee, the importance of the rejected evidence becomes apparent. Unless the defendant was permitted to show by the record or by parol evidence that the committee did in fact investigate outside matters, and what those matters were, it might be difficult or impossible for him to prove that the admitted words were relevant and pertinent to any matter properly or improperly before the committee; and he would thus lose the benefit of evidence tending to show that the occasion was one of conditional privilege, and that he had complied with the condition. For these reasons we think the court erred in rejecting the record evidence offered by the defendant, and that this entitles him to a new trial.

The fact that a new trial must be granted renders it unnecessary to notice with any degree of particularity many of the other alleged errors assigned, and we will notice only one or two, and that briefly. In its charge to the jury, the court seems to say, in substance, that, in order to make the occasion a privileged one, the words must have been spoken in answer to questions; and the defendant claims that the court thus restricted the words privileged wholly to those uttered in response to questions. The charge as given in the record at pages 29, 30, and 31 seems to support this claim of the defendant. We hardly think the court intended to be so understood, but, if so, we think the charge was erroneous and misleading. If the defendant, present before the committee as a witness or otherwise, was invited or permitted or called upon to make a statement by the committee, for their information, of matters pertinent and relevant to the investigation they were then actually conducting and apparently within their power, we think the mere fact that the words uttered were not in response to questions does not avoid the privilege. The law regards substance, and not form, in matters of this kind; it regards what is said, and the motives for saying it, rather than the precise form of statement. Of course the fact that a statement was officiously volunteered would be evidence to go to the jury upon the question of express malice, but that is quite another matter.

The defendant also complains that by the charge of the court he was deprived of the benefit of part of his third defense. We think there is some foundation for this complaint. The plaintiffs claimed that the defendant, when he uttered the alleged slanderous words, was before the committee, not as a witness, but as a volunteer, while the defendant claimed he was there only as a witness. As the jury might find according to the claim of the plaintiffs on this point, the defendant asked the court to charge, in substance, that in such case the defendant, under the circumstances, would have the right to go before the committee as a citizen of New Haven, and in good faith give such information as he might have touching the matter under investigation. Under the facts as they appear of record, we think the court should have complied in substance with this request.

We deem it unnecessary to notice any of the other alleged errors.

The enactment is not unconstitutional. There is nothing in the constitution of either this state or of the United States forbidding such a grant of power by the legislature.

Where the constitution provides that judicial power of the state shall be vested in specified courts, and "in such other courts as the legislature may from time to time establish" the legislature may vest a part of the jurisdiction of the constitutional courts in those tribunals which it creates by statute.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner was restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of Allen county, under a commitment issued by the county attorney for refusal to answer questions propounded to him touching violations of the prohibitory liquor law. Paragraph 2543 of the General Statutes of 1889 makes it the duty of the county attorney, when notified of any violation of the prohibitory law, to issue his subpoena, commanding witnesses to appear before him, to swear such witnesses, examine them, reduce their testimony to writing, and cause it to be subscribed by such witnesses, and expressly authorizes the county attorney to punish for contempt any witnesses disobeying his process or refusing to answer questions. If the testimony so taken discloses the fact that an offense has been committed, he is required forthwith to file the statements of the witnesses with his complaint or information against the person having committed the offense, and thereupon to proceed with the prosecution of the offender.

The single question presented for our consideration is whether that portion of the statute which authorizes the county attorney to punish as for contempt is in violation of the constitution of this state. Nothing is more firmly fixed in the governmental systems of all English-speaking countries than the division of powers between the three great departments of government,—the executive, legislative, and judicial. The question before us is whether the legislature has power to confer on an executive officer, charged with the duty of searching out violations of the law, inquiring into the facts, instituting and carrying on prosecutions for violations of the criminal laws of the state, the power, at the same time and as ancillary to the performance of his duties as a prosecuting officer, to commit persons to jail as for a contempt of his authority. That a proceeding to punish for contempt is in its nature a criminal proceeding has been directly decided by this court (State v. Dent, 29 Kan. 416), as well as by the courts of other states, Cartwright's Case, 114 Mass. 230; Puterbaugh v. Smith, 131 Ill. 199. The right to appeal from an order punishing for a contempt has been frequently recognized by this court. Re Peyton, 12 Kan. 398; Re Dalton, 46 Kan. 253; State v. Henthorn, 46 Kan. 613; State v. Vincent, 46 Kan. 618; Re Nickell, 47 Kan. 784; Re Noonan, 47 Kan. 771; Re Harmer, 47 Kan. 262; State v. Durein, 46 Kan. 695.

An appeal to a superior court can only be taken from a judicial decision; never from one involving merely executive or legislative discretion. Fulkerson v. Harper County Comrs. 31 Kan. 125; Kent v. Labette County Comrs. 42 Kan. 534. In committing the prisoner for contempt, the county attorney therefore decided a case in its nature criminal, and in making such decision assumed to act in a judicial capacity. That the statute referred to gives him this power in terms is clear. Is the statute valid? The cases of Re Abeles, 12 Kan. 451, and Re Merkle, 40 Kan. 27, are cited in support of the proposition that power to commit for contempt may be given to other than a judicial officer, and it is said that it is not necessary in order to confer judicial power that the legislature should first in terms create a court. The constitution of this state provides that "the judicial power of this state shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, justices of the peace, and such other courts inferior to the supreme court as may be provided by law." Section 1, art. 3. The legislature therefore is at liberty to confer judicial power, and to create courts inferior to the supreme court. It may be conceded that the legislature may confer judicial power on an individual who also fills an executive office. The prior decisions of this court go no further than this. The point here involved, whether executive and judicial power may be mingled and combined,—may be exercised by the same person at the same time and in the same proceeding,—has never yet been decided by this court.

The county attorney is peculiarly an executive officer. He is not only authorized to appear on behalf of the state, and prosecute all criminal cases arising in his county, but it is his duty to do so; and the act concerning the sale of intoxicating liquors imposes which the committee had apparent authority, and to a person in the position of the defendant such apparent authority was sufficient to protect him, if his statements before it were pertinent and relevant to the matter in hand, and were made in good faith and without express malice. As the question whether the occasion was a privileged one depended so largely on the further question whether or not the words charged were pertinent and relevant to the matters actually before the committee, the importance of the rejected evidence becomes apparent. Unless the defendant was permitted to show by the record or by parol evidence that the committee did in fact investigate outside matters, and what those matters were, it might be difficult or impossible for him to prove that the admitted words were relevant and pertinent to any matter properly or improperly before the committee; and he would thus lose the benefit of evidence tending to show that the occasion was one of conditional privilege, and that he had complied with the condition. For these reasons we think the court erred in rejecting the record evidence offered by the defendant, and that this entitles him to a new trial.

The fact that a new trial must be granted renders it unnecessary to notice with any degree of particularity many of the other alleged errors assigned, and we will notice only one or two, and that briefly. In its charge to the jury, the court seems to say, in substance, that, in order to make the occasion a privileged one, the words must have been spoken in answer to questions; and the defendant claims that the court thus restricted the words privileged wholly to those uttered in response to questions. The charge as given in the record at pages 29, 30, and 31 seems to support this claim of the defendant. We hardly think the court intended to be so understood, but, if so, we think the charge was erroneous and misleading. If the defendant, present before the committee as a witness or otherwise, was invited or permitted or called upon to make a statement by the committee, for their information, of matters pertinent and relevant to the investigation they were then actually conducting and apparently within their power, we think the mere fact that the words uttered were not in response to questions does not avoid the privilege. The law regards substance, and not form, in matters of this kind; it regards what is said, and the motives for saying it, rather than the precise form of statement. Of course the fact that a statement was officiously volunteered would be evidence to go to the jury upon the question of express malice, but that is quite another matter.

The defendant also complains that by the charge of the court he was deprived of the benefit of part of his third defense. We think there is some foundation for this complaint. The plaintiffs claimed that the defendant, when he uttered the alleged slanderous words, was before the committee, not as a witness, but as a volunteer, while the defendant claimed he was there only as a witness. As the jury might find according to the claim of the plaintiffs on this point, the defendant asked the court to charge, in substance, that in such case the defendant, under the circumstances, would have the right to go before the committee as a citizen of New Haven, and in good faith give such information as he might have touching the matter under investigation. Under the facts as they appear of record, we think the court should have complied in substance with this request.

We deem it unnecessary to notice any of the other alleged errors.

There is error, and a new trial is granted

The enactment is not unconstitutional. There is nothing in the constitution of either this state or of the United States forbidding such a grant of power by the legislature.

Where the constitution provides that judicial power of the state shall be vested in specified courts, and "in such other courts as the legislature may from time to time establish" the legislature may vest a part of the jurisdiction of the constitutional courts in those tribunals which it creates by statute.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner was restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of Allen county, under a commitment issued by the county attorney for refusal to answer questions propounded to him touching violations of the prohibitory liquor law. Paragraph 2543 of the General Statutes of 1889 makes it the duty of the county attorney, when notified of any violation of the prohibitory law, to issue his subpoena, commanding witnesses to appear before him, to swear such witnesses, examine them, reduce their testimony to writing, and cause it to be subscribed by such witnesses, and expressly authorizes the county attorney to punish for contempt any witnesses disobeying his process or refusing to answer questions. If the testimony so taken discloses the fact that an offense has been committed, he is required forthwith to file the statements of the witnesses with his complaint or information against the person having committed the offense, and thereupon to proceed with the prosecution of the offender.

The single question presented for our consideration is whether that portion of the statute which authorizes the county attorney to punish as for contempt is in violation of the constitution of this state. Nothing is more firmly fixed in the governmental systems of all English-speaking countries than the division of powers between the three great departments of government,—the executive, legislative, and judicial. The question before us is whether the legislature has power to confer on an executive officer, charged with the duty of searching out violations of the law, inquiring into the facts, instituting and carrying on prosecutions for violations of the criminal laws of the state, the power, at the same time and as ancillary to the performance of his duties as a prosecuting officer, to commit persons to jail as for a contempt of his authority. That a proceeding to punish for contempt is in its nature a criminal proceeding has been directly decided by this court (State v. Dent, 29 Kan. 416), as well as by the courts of other states, Cartwright's Case, 114 Mass. 230; Puterbaugh v. Smith, 131 Ill. 199. The right to appeal from an order punishing for a contempt has been frequently recognized by this court. Re Peyton, 12 Kan. 398; Re Dalton, 46 Kan. 253; State v. Henthorn, 46 Kan. 618; State v. Vincent, 46 Kan. 618; Re Nickell, 47 Kan. 784; Re Noonan, 47 Kan. 771; Re Harmer, 47 Kan. 262; State v. Durein, 46 Kan. 695.

An appeal to a superior court can only be taken from a judicial decision; never from one involving merely executive or legislative discretion. Fulkerson v. Harper County Comrs. 81 Kan. 125; Kent v. Labette County Comrs. 43 Kan. 584. In committing the prisoner for contempt, the county attorney therefore decided a case in its nature criminal, and in making such decision assumed to act in a judicial capacity. That the statute referred to gives him this power in terms is clear. Is the statute valid? The cases of Re Abeles, 12 Kan. 451, and Re Merkle, 40 Kan. 27, are cited in support of the proposition that power to commit for contempt may be given to other than a judicial officer, and it is said that it is not necessary in order to confer judicial power that the legislature should first in terms create a court. The constitution of this state provides that "the judicial power of this state shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, justices of the peace, and such other courts inferior to the supreme court as may be provided by law." Section 1, art. 8. The legislature therefore is at liberty to confer judicial power, and to create courts inferior to the supreme court. It may be conceded that the legislature may confer judicial power on an individual who also fills an executive office. The prior decisions of this court go no further than this. The point here involved, whether executive and judicial power may be mingled and combined,—may be exercised by the same person at the same time and in the same proceeding,—has never yet been decided by this court.

The county attorney is peculiarly an executive officer. He is not only authorized to appear on behalf of the state, and prosecute all criminal cases arising in his county, but it is his duty to do so; and the act concerning the sale of intoxicating liquors imposes on him the specific duty of making inquiries and investigations for the purpose of detecting violations of the prohibitory law, to compel witnesses to testify, to reduce their statements to writing, to cause them to be signed by the witnesses, to file them in the district or other court having jurisdiction, and with them his complaint or information charging offenders with such offenses as the testimony shows they are guilty of. In all these proceedings the county attorney acts as an administrative officer, prosecuting on behalf of the people. It is for the purpose of aiding him in the effectual execution of this duty that the power to commit for contempt is given him. It is given to him, not as a judicial officer, but as county attorney, and for the very purpose of aiding him in performing the duties of that office. Such a combination of powers is not in accordance with the theory of our government, nor with the orderly administration of justice as administered in this county and in England. The power to punish for contempt is never exercised except by legislative bodies or judicial officers. Whitcomb's Case, 120 Mass. 118, 21 Am. Rep. 502; Langenberg v. Decker, 181 Ind. 471, 16 L. R. A. 108; Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, 26 L. ed. 877; Atty-Gen. v. McDonald, 8 Wis. 805.

It is sought to distinguish the case before us from those cited, because of provisions in the constitutions of Wisconsin and Indiana with reference to the separation of executive and judicial powers. We think, however, that in our constitution these powers are as clearly separated as though the framers of the constitution had said so in terms. It needs but a suggestion to show that the combination of executive and judicial powers may become tyranny at once. The advancement in the science of government made in modern times is due to the separation of the three great co-ordinate departments. If the legislature may confer on the county attorney one of the highest and most distinctive attributes of judicial power,—that of punishing for contempt,—to aid him in ascertaining from witnesses the facts with reference to violations of law, might the legislature not also confer on any attorney the power to examine witnesses in civil cases in the same manner, and to commit them for contempt if they refuse to answer his questions? Might it not also give to any executive officer, from the governor down, the power to subpoena witnesses to inform his judgment, and to aid him in any executive decision or determination? And, if the rule is established, can it be doubted that the division between executive and judicial offices will be completely broken down, and all constitutional barriers removed from those forms of oppression which have always attended this combination? In this very case the county attorney, as a prosecuting officer, issued his subpoena. When the witness came before him, as a prosecuting officer, he asked him a question. When the witness refused to answer, he at once passed on his own right to ask the question, on its pertinency and propriety, judicially determined that he, as prosecuting attorney, had asked a proper question; and, as a judicial officer, declared and determined that the witness was guilty of a judicial contempt in refusing to answer the question which he himself had asked as a prosecuting attorney. This is a commingling and confusing of executive and judicial functions in a manner incompatible with the constitution, obnoxious to its whole spirit and to the spirit of free institutions, and the act to that extent is void.

The petitioner will be discharged.

Horton, Ch. J., concurring specially:

Paragraph 2548, Gen. Stat. 1889, confers upon county attorneys of the state, when notified of any violation of the provisions of the prohibitory liquor law, the power to inquire into such violation, and for that purpose they are authorized to issue subpoenas for any person they believe has information or knowledge thereof to appear before them and testify. The testimony in every case must be reduced to writing, and signed by the witness, the same as a deposition in a civil cause. Power is also attempted to be conferred upon county attorneys to imprison any witness for refusal to testify concerning any violation of the statute, when required to do so. Laws 1885, chap. 149, § 8. Paragraph 2548 further provides that, if the testimony taken discloses any offense has been committed against the provisions of the statute, the county attorney taking the testimony must file the statement of the witness and a complaint or information against the offender in some court of competent jurisdiction. The complaint or information may then be verified by the county attorney upon information and belief. All of the provisions of the statute are for the purpose of assisting county attorneys in procuring testimony for violations of the act, and in preparing their cases for successful prosecution in the court. So far as the power conferred by the statute is ministerial or administrative, it is constitutional, and must be obeyed; but, if a witness refuses to testify, I do not think county attorneys have, or ought to have, the power to imprison such a witness for contempt. County attorneys are executive or administrative officers, but the power attempted to be conferred upon them, or any other officer taking depositions or testimony, to commit a witness for refusing to answer, is judicial in character. Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, 26 L. ed. 377. If the statute is constitutional and open to no legal objection, county attorneys have the power to ask questions of the witnesses brought before them, and then to pass upon the competency or pertinency of the same, and, if the witness refuses to answer, to imprison him in the county jail, there to remain until he submits to testify. It is an old maxim of the law that "no man can be a judge in his own cause." This wise maxim is infringed upon by conferring on a prosecuting attorney judicial power to commit a witness called before him to testify in a case which he is preparing for trial, or in which he proposes, if his investigation warrants, to file a complaint or information. In such a proceeding, on the examination of a witness, the prosecuting attorney has a pecuniary, professional, and official interest. He is not acting disinterestedly. The statute would be very similar, and liable to like objection, if it authorized notaries public and attorneys-at-law to personally take depositions or perpetuate testimony in actions they were intending to commence for other parties. In a civil action no deposition or affidavit can be taken before a relative or an attorney of either party, or before any one interested in the event of the proceeding. Civ. Code, § 350; Foreman v. Carter, 9 Kan. 681; Warner v. Warner, 11 Kan. 121. The rule in criminal cases ought to be as strict.

The legislature has full authority to confer the power to imprison a witness for contempt, prescribed in paragraph 2543, upon justices of the peace, probate judges, notary publics, clerks of courts, or on any individual not the prosecuting attorney or interested in the proceeding. I fully concur in the judgment pronounced in Re Clayton, 59 Conn. 510, 18 L. R. A. 66, but some of the reasons given are not satisfactory to me. In that case the examination was taken before a police judge, not before a prosecuting attorney or any one interested in commencing criminal proceedings upon the testimony which it was sought to compel the witness to disclose. I am of the opinion, as observed in that case, that "it is the duty of all good citizens, when legally required so to do, to testify to any facts within their knowledge affecting public interest, and no one has a natural right to be protected in his refusal to discharge this duty. Public policy does not forbid, but, on the contrary, often requires, legislation to facilitate the administration of justice." But the power to compel a citizen to testify should be exercised legally, not unconstitutionally. If this ruling shall in any way interfere with full and successful investigations on the part of county attorneys of violations of the provisions of the prohibitory liquor law, it can be remedied speedily. The legislature will convene in a few months, and the power to imprison recusant witnesses, attempted to be conferred upon county attorneys by paragraph 2543, may, as before stated, be constitutionally and legally imposed upon any officer or individual not the county attorney or otherwise interested in the proceeding. My attention has been called recently to the case of De Camp v. Archibald, 81 Ohio L. J. 89, ruling that the power to commit a person for contempt for refusing to answer is not judicial in character. That decision, although made by an able court, is not supported by logical reasoning, is not in line with our own decisions, and is opposed to the great weight of authority.

Johnston, J., concurring specially:

In the enactment of the provisions authorizing the county attorney to make preliminary inquiry as to the commission of offenses, the legislature appears to have proceeded upon the theory that the duties imposed and power conferred in that respect were not judicial in character. If they were executive or merely quasi judicial in their nature, the objections urged against the statute would be without force; and the fact that they were imposed and conferred upon an executive officer indicates the legislative view, and may be some argument that they are not judicial. Some of the steps in the preliminary inquiry are clearly the exercise of executive functions, and whether or not any of them are judicial must be determined from their nature, rather than from the position or station of the one by whom the act is to be performed. Assuming that the authority to punish for contempt was an incident to the exercise of executive power, the legislature vested it in the county attorney; and this is not to be wondered at, in view of the fact that the supreme court of Ohio, in a recent case, has determined that the exercise of such authority is not the exercise of judicial power. De Camp v. Archibald, 81 Ohio L. J. 89. Although I entertain the highest respect for that tribunal, I am unable to reach the same conclusion. The authority to hear and determine a controversy upon both the facts and the law is judicial power. When the witness refuses to answer the question proposed, the county attorney must then determine upon the propriety of the question, and whether, under the circumstances, an answer should be compelled. At that stage of the proceedings an issue is formed, and a controversy arises between the state and the witness. A contempt of court is a substantive criminal offense, and to adjudicate a case of contempt, and to impose punishment for such offense, is generally said to be the highest exercise of judicial power. The county attorney not only inquires and decides, but he is given full power to enforce his decision, and that by one of the most severe methods known to the law. The authority to try one accused of a criminal offense, pronounce judgment against him, and enforce that judgment by imprisonment, is surely an exercise of judicial power. If, then, the power is to be regarded as judicial, it can only be exercised by one of the tribunals mentioned in section 1 of article 8 of the Constitution. Under this constitutional provision, the legislature may vest judicial power in such courts as it may see fit to create, provided, only, that they are inferior to the supreme court. Can the county attorney be regarded as a "court," within the meaning of this constitutional provision? The contention of the state that the legislature may create a court, or confer judicial power, without designating the tribunal created as a court, must be conceded. Malone v. Murphy, 2 Kan. 250; State v. Young, 8 Kan. 445. I am unable, however, to sustain the position of the petitioner, and hold that the vesting of judicial power in an executive officer, and requiring him to perform both executive and judicial functions, is a sufficient objection to the statute. It is highly important to separate the legislative, judicial, and executive functions, and that the officer of one department should not exercise the functions conferred upon another. Under our system, however, the absolute independence of the departments and the complete separation of the powers is impracticable, and was not intended. "It is true, with some exceptions, that the legislature cannot exercise judicial or executive power, that the courts cannot exercise legislative or executive power, and that the executive department cannot exercise legislative or judicial power; but it is not true that they are entirely separate from each other, or independent of each other, or that one of them may not in some instances control one of the others." Martin v. Ingham, 88 Kan. 654. The governor has been vested with some judicial functions, and the legislature acts judicially when it tries a charge of contempt, and adjudges punishment therefor. Ministerial duties have been placed upon courts, and, while scrupulous care should be used to prevent an officer of one department from intruding to any extent upon the duties conferred upon an officer of another department, nothing in our state constitution, as there is in that of some other states, prevents the vesting of more than one function in a single individual. Illustrations of conferring more than one of these powers upon the same person are numerous. It has been held that the mayor of a city of the second class might, while acting as mayor, exercise the powers of a court, although the statute did not in terms create him a court. Prell v. McDowald, 7 Kan. 428, 12 Am. Rep. 428. Judicial powers have been conferred on county commissioners and coroners, whose duties are mainly ministerial. Probate judges, whose duties are mostly judicial, have had conferred upon them many ministerial duties, and legislation giving such powers has been upheld. Re Johnson, 12 Kan. 102; Intoxicating Liquor Cases, 25 Kan. 759, 87 Am. Rep. 284.

Other instances might be cited, but these are sufficient to show that the legislature may confer judicial powers upon an executive officer, provided such duties are not inconsistent with those required of such officer. No case has been sustained, however, where the new duties conferred upon an officer were incompatible with those already imposed by such office. When the petitioner refused to answer the question, and a controversy arose, he was, in effect, accused of an offense. The state was the plaintiff, and the petitioner the defendant. The county attorney is the representative of the state, and required to appear in all prosecutions in its behalf. When the issue was thus formed, the positions of county attorney and judge became antagonistic, and the duties of the respective places incompatible. It is not within the power of the legislature to make a judge an arbiter in his own cause, and to give an attorney for one of two adverse parties the power to determine the controversy is wholly inconsistent with our system of jurisprudence. The legislature has not clothed the county attorney with the paraphernalia of a court, and it does not seem to have been its purpose to invest him with the attributes of a judicial tribunal. Manifestly, it proceeded upon the theory that the powers conferred were such as might be carried out by an executive officer, and are not "judicial," within the meaning of the constitution. As that view cannot be sustained, and as the authority to punish for contempt must be regarded as the exercise of judicial power, it follows that the statute cannot be upheld.

And a judge is disqualified from trying a cause, where he had been under a general retainer from one of the parties. Kern Valley Water Co. v. McCord, 70 Cal. 646; Lux v. Haggin (Cal.) April 28, 1887.

And under a statute prohibiting a judge from trying a case in which he has been attorney or counsel, he cannot impose the payment of costs on the party demanding a change of venue, where the statute does not so provide. O'Connell v. Gavett, 7 Colo. 40.

Under Mo. Act, March 19, 1877, disqualifying a judge who has been of counsel, such judge cannot set aside an election by the bar, where the judge pro tem. is also disqualified for the same reason, but under the statute, the clerk of the court must hold another election. Lacy v. Barrett, 75 Mo. 469.

And a justice is prohibited by Mass. Rev. Stat., chap. 85, § 84, from trying any civil action commenced by his order or direction where he had an interest in the suit and instigated the prosecution of the same. Richardson v. Welcome, 6 Cush. 331.

And in People v. Frederick, 48 N. Y. S. R. 302, the court held that a magistrate who had prosecuted the same matter before another justice was disqualified from trying the same cause, and stated that N. Y. Code, § 48, providing for disqualification where the judge is a party, related, or of counsel, is but a re-enactment of the common law and in a matter which if true reflects so scandalously upon the administration of justice, the appellate court will not indulge in any presumptions to sustain the judgment.

And a judge is disqualified from trying a divorce for voluntary abandonment, brought by the husband, where the judge had been attorney for the husband in a former suit for divorce brought by the wife on the ground of cruel treatment. Newcome v. Light, 58 Tex. 141, 44 Am. Rep. 604. But see Cleghorn v. Cleghorn, 66 Cal. 309, infra.

And an act disqualifying any judge who has heretofore been consulted or employed as counsel, is not limited to cases of consultation or employment before the passage of the act. People v. Saghaw Circuit Ct. Judge, 26 Mich. 342.

Under Mo. Rev. Code 1885, p. 539, § 21, the St. Louis criminal court may, of its own motion, order the removal of a cause to the St. Louis circuit court, where the judge of the criminal court has been of counsel for the defendant. State v. Houser, 28 Mo. 223.

A defendant convicted of murder cannot be sentenced by a judge of another circuit, who was present and was called to preside by the judge who had been prosecuting attorney on the trial, as there is no such provision in the statute. State v. Shea, 95 Mo. 86, 35 L. R. A.

In Cottle, Appellant, 5 Pick. 453, it was said that it is improper for a judge of probate to undertake to act as the attorney or agent of an heir, or person interested in an estate within his jurisdiction, but this was not the question involved.

In Spencer v. Lapsley, 61 U. S. 20 How. 266, 15 L. ed. 903, it was stated that 3 U. S. Stat. at L. chap. 51, p. 643, provides that in suits in the district courts of the United States the judge shall be disqualified when he has been of counsel for either party, but that was not the question involved in the case.

b. Where the causes are not identical.

There are some cases which deny the disqualification of the judge unless the cause, controversy, and parties are identical, or hold that a slight difference of issues or parties will be sufficient to remove disqualification of the judge.

As if the issues are different, a judge is not disqualified, although he had been counsel for the parties in two former suits. Stewart v. Mix, 80 La. Ann. 1036.

So in McMillan v. Nichols, 62 Ga. 36, it was held that an execution from the county court cannot be availed, on the ground that such county judge had filed a suit on a note as attorney for plaintiff in the superior court, and then withdrew it, and suit was then brought before him as county judge on that note. The "causes" are not the same and the defendant only protested to the trial and did not appeal as he might have done.

So where the judge had represented a receiver, in an application by a railroad company, claiming money due for a connecting line, he is not disqualified from sitting in an action testing the appointment of the receiver. State v. Jacksonville, P. & M. R. Co. 15 Fla. 201.

And in Cleghorn v. Cleghorn, 66 Cal. 309, it was held that a judge was not disqualified from trying an action of divorce for the adultery of the defendant, where such judge had been the attorney of this defendant in an action against him by the person with whom the alleged acts of intercourse had occurred and the issue was as to the fact of such intercourse. But see Newcome v. Light, 58 Tex. 141, 44 Am. Rep. 604.

That a magistrate drew up a lease, and a notice to quit and that he was the only subscribing witness to the lease, does not disqualify him from trying an action to recover possession of the same claimed under the lease, where the magistrate had not been advised with by either party or been employed except as stated above. Cook v. Berth, 103 Mass. 372.

So having given an opinion, as an attorney, in regard to the validity of the title to the land in controversy, does not disqualify the judge, as this is not the same, as shall have been of counsel in the case. Hourston & T. C. R. Co. v. Ryan, 44 Tex. 428.

That the presiding judge had been of counsel in another cause involving the same title does not disqualify him, as he had not been consulted by the parties to the suit before him. Taylor v. Williams, 26 Tex. 583.

In The Richmond, 9 Fed. Rep. 363, it was stated qualified from trying a claim interposed to property levied upon by virtue of an execution issued in such main case, although the management of such suit may have been exclusively under the direction of the other member of such firm, and not within the knowledge of such judge.

- 8. A judge who, previous to his commission, was an attorney of record in an attachment suit at the time of the levy of the writ of attachment upon certain property, is disqualified to try a claim interposed to said property, when the same is afterward levied upon under an execution issued in the same suit.

that "of counsel," as provided in U. S. Rev. Stat., § 615, means of counsel for a party in that cause and in that controversy, and if either the cause or controversy is not identical the disqualification does not exist, holding that a judge, who had been one of the parties in a suit in law for damages by a collision, was not disqualified from sitting in the trial on an appeal bond given in that cause, as the cause though growing out of the same cause is distinct.

In Cullen v. Drane, 88 Tex. 484, it was held that where S. R. Frost was one of plaintiff's attorneys, who brought an attachment suit and levied on and sold a lot claimed by a third party, which lot the plaintiffs bought, and then a suit was brought by plaintiffs before Frost as judge to try their title against such third party, it cannot thereafter be claimed that this judgment is void as it did not appear that Frost had ever been of counsel in the case tried before him, or expressed an opinion on the title.

And in Kemp v. Wharton County Bank, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 648, where an attachment against a banking firm was levied on a safe, it was held that although the judge had drawn a deed of assignment for creditors for the bank, and had counseled the assignee, and was also a creditor of the bank, he was not disqualified as this was only a foreclosure of a lien, and the rights of the assignee would not be affected as he was not a party, although it was claimed that this suit involved the validity of the assignment.

In McLouth v. Myers, 40 N. Y. S. R. 858, it was held that a justice who issued the summons was not disqualified although, a few days prior thereto, he had written the defendant a letter stating that the plaintiff had left the account with him for collection, and unless it was settled the plaintiff would bring an action to enforce its collection, as there is nothing to show that the account was left with him as an attorney for collection, although he was an attorney, and the case does not show that any statement was made to him of the facts of the case.

In Karcher v. Pearce, 14 Colo. 557, it was held that it is not ground for change of venue in Colorado, that the judge had as county attorney formerly prosecuted the defendant in a criminal charge, and had been counsel for the other party. The case does not show that the matters were similar.

So a judge was not disqualified from trying a criminal case, by reason of his having been district attorney, during the time a county attorney of his district prosecuted the defendant for the offense charged, but the district attorney had taken no part in the prosecution. Wilks v. State, 27 Tex. App. 381.

And in Hobbs v. Campbell, 79 Tex. 360, it was held that counsel in a murder case does not make him counsel in the case of bail bond given in the murder case, and although when the bond was given such attorney in discussion with other attorneys stated that the bond was void, he was not

MOTION to strike the answer of defendant for insufficiency in a proceeding brought to compel him to take jurisdiction in a certain case which had been brought before him for trial. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edgar P. Allen, for relator:

At common law the relation of attorney and client does not disqualify a judge, and though there is no statute in Florida making this relation a ground of disqualification, yet this court has affirmed that such relation does disqualify.

Tampa Street R. & Power Co. v. Tampa disqualified from presiding as judge on the trial of the bail bond.

A judge is not disqualified from trying the charge of murder, although before elected he had advised a party to take out letters of administration on the estate, such administration involving no inquiry as to who killed the decedent, and his former partner was employed to assist in the prosecution. Woolfolk v. State, 85 Ga. 66.

That a judge to whom a case was sent on a change of venue had been employed as counsel for some of the parties in a similar proceeding, does not disqualify him under the statute, although it was an impropriety for him to act. But one change of venue is allowed for any cause in Indiana. Shoemaker v. South Bend Spark Arrester Co. (Ind.) 22 L. R. A. 382.

A surrogate who had been an attorney for a testator in certain actions, which the deceased had pending, before and at the time of his death, in no way affecting the proof of the will, but whose relation as attorney in those matters had ceased, is not incompetent to sit on probate of such testator's will. People v. Welfant, 30 Hun, 475.

And a judge was not disqualified, where his name had been signed inadvertently and by mistake to interrogatories by the firm of which he was a member, when in fact he had never been of counsel in the case. Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Mackney, 68 Tex. 410.

And the disqualification of one of four appellate judges, by reason of his having been of counsel, will not oust the court of jurisdiction. Hammond v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. 126 Ind. 597.

c. Where the parties are not identical.

There are some cases which hold that the judge is not disqualified unless he has been of counsel to a party in the cause then pending, and if the party who consulted him has no interest in the cause pending, he may try the case. Bryan v. Austin, 10 La. Ann. 612; King v. Sapp, 66 Tex. 519; Glasscock v. Hughes, 55 Tex. 461.

And acting as counsel in another case between two of the parties to the bill which involved some of the same issues does not disqualify a judge. Blackburn v. Cranford, 23 Md. 447.

d. Formal orders.

Although a judge may be disqualified from trying a cause from having been of counsel, yet he may make mere incidental orders as receiving an indictment. Cock v. State, 8 Tex. App. 659.

Or superintending the drawing of the panel of regular jurors. People v. Ah Lee Doon, 97 Cal. 171. If this is invalid an objection must be made before verdict. Ibid.

So he may issue a venire for the panel of jurors, where no names are on the list. Littrell v. Wilcox, 11 Mont. 77.

And may approve the agreement of parties, for

But while the trend of the case referred to in 30 Fla. seems to confine disqualification by relation of attorney and client to the trial of any issues arising or formed during the existence of this relation, or upon which advice to the client has previously been given by the attorney, this court in 80 Fla. 602, has cited without criticism the case of Stewart v. Mix, 30 La. Ann. 1036.

In the present case the issue is the right of property of the receivers. The validity of none of the proceedings in the case of Ambler v. Stevens, Graham & Co. is involved, because their validity cannot be impeached by the receivers who are strangers to said suit. Neither are any of the questions involved in the main case put in issue in the claim case.

The relation of attorney and client does not extend to cases where the relation existed as to a case other than the one at bar. Having been of counsel in other suit involving the same, title to real estate does not disqualify.

Taylor v. Williams, 26 Tex. 593.

Having as counsel given opinion on title to the appointment of a judge pro tem. State v. Sachs, 3 Wash. 601.

And a judge who has been of counsel, in a cause where decree has been taken by default, may allow an answer to be "filed" and then direct a change of venue, where the original decree was not set aside until final decree on cross-bill. Bruen v. Bruen, 43 Ill. 408.

Under Ga. Code, § 8447, authorizing a dismissal of a bill by complainant that does not prejudice the defendant, such bill may be dismissed, where the presiding judge has once been of counsel in the cause, although the first bill obtained an answer under oath, and the second suit on same bill waived a discovery. It may be that the answer under oath, extorted in the first case, would be binding on complainant. Kean v. Lathrop, 58 Ga. 365.

If a judge who is disqualified from sitting, improvidently dismisses a suit for want of prosecution, he may set aside such order of dismissal. Garrett v. Gaines, 6 Tex. 485.

Disqualification without regard to statute, from having been of counsel in the cause.

The decisions are not uniform, in the absence of statute, as to the propriety and necessity of a judge refusing to sit in a cause when he had been of counsel for a party, some cases maintaining that the judge should decline to sit and some that he is disqualified from acting, fully sustaining the doctrine in STATE v. HOCKER.

The courts in many cases in citing authorities do not distinguish between those founded on statutes and those based on common-law doctrine.

Chitry's Practice, 4, 9, states: "The greatest delicacy however, is constantly observed on the part of the judges, so that they never act when there could be the possibility of doubt whether they would be free from bias. Anciently a judge could not try a civil or criminal case in the county in which he was born or inhabited, but that impediment . . . was altered by statute."

So the vice-chancellor was disqualified from approving an appeal bond in a case in which he was solicitor or counsel previous to his appointment to office. Ten Rick v. Simpson, 11 Paige, 179, 5 L. ed. 92.

And where a vice-chancellor before his appointment had been counsel in the cause, the chancellor upon application to him may direct the cause to be heard before any other vice-chancellor at a stated term of his court. Whitney v. Post, 3 Paige, 38, 4 L. ed. 384.

So a master who has acted, or whose partner has acted as solicitor in a cause pending or to be brought, ought not to do any judicial act as master, although neither of them is the solicitor of record. McLaren v. Charrler, 5 Paige, 590, 3 L. ed. 617.

In Tampa Street R. & Power Co. v. Tampa Suburban R. Co., 17 L. R. A. 681, 80 Fla. 595, it was held that the mere statement by the judge that he had been counsel for the appellant would not disqualify him, and that the defendant cannot disqualify him 25 L. R. A.

by alleging matters which are irrelevant and immaterial to the case made by the bill. But the court stated that a judge is disqualified from trying a cause where he has as attorney advised one of the parties as to his legal rights which are in controversy in the case, stating that there was no statute on that question in the state.

And in Oakley v. Aspinwall, 8 N. Y. 547, it was stated that a judge cannot be both judge and party, arbiter and advocate in the same cause, but the question involved in that case was relationship to party.

Where two of the justices of the supreme court had been of counsel and declined to sit, a judgment of the third and remaining member rendered by stipulation of the parties was valid. Walker v. Rogan, 1 Wis. 597.

Other cases hold that a judge cannot be challenged because he has been of counsel for a party in the cause.

By the laws of England also in the times of Bracton and Fleta, a judge might be refused for good cause but now the law is otherwise and it is held that judges and justices cannot be challenged." 8 Bl. Com. 361.

In Townsend v. Hughes, 2 Mod. 151, Scroggs, J., said he was of counsel with the plaintiff before he was called to the bench and might be supposed to give judgment in favor of his former client or against him, but now he had forgot all former relation thereto, and thereupon delivered his opinion.

And in Thellusson v. Rendlesham, 7 H. L. Cas. 420, it was held that a counsel in a cause having been raised to the bench is not disqualified from hearing the case, but he may decline to take part.

And in Morgan v. Hammett, 23 Wls. 30, it was held that the statute did not disqualify a county judge from acting, who had been counsel for the parties, and the fact that he had been of counsel for some parties interested in the matter did not disqualify him from making an order of sale on application of the administrator.

After a continuance and trial, a new trial will not be granted on the ground of surprise, in that the party was not present, that he did not expect a trial to be had as the judge had been engaged by the adverse party as counsel, and if he had known that the court would have tried the case that he would have had material evidence on hand, the failure to object was a waiver. Owings v. Gibson, 2 A. K. Marsh. 515.

And in Lloyd v. Smith, T. U. P. Charit. 143, it was held that the statute providing for the disqualification of the judge of the superior court where he is a "party" or "interested" does not affect him, where as a member of the bar, he had formerly been retained as of counsel for the defendant.

So in Denn v. Tatem, 1 N. J. L. 184, it was held not to be a valid objection to a judge before whom a jury was to be struck that he had been of counsel for one of the parties.

And in Bank of North America v. Fitzsimons, 2 Binn. 454, it was held in a case submitted to the court by three persons where the chief justice had the land in controversy, it not being shown that the opinion was given of the case before the court, is no disqualification.

Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Ryan, 44 Tex. 426.

So as to having acted as counsel in cases growing out of the same transaction and involving the same question.

King v. Sapp, 66 Tex. 519.

The interest that disqualifies a judge under the statutes is a property interest in the action or its result.

Ex parte Harris, 6 L. R. A. 718, 26 Fla. 77.

Messrs. Cooper & Cooper for respondent.

Liddon, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a case of original jurisdiction. The petition filed May 1, 1894, alleges, in substance, that the relator began on February 10, 1893, an action by attachment against G. C. Stevens and H. H. Graham, copartners under the firm name of Stevens, Graham & Co., in the circuit court of Marion county; that the case having been referred to Jesse J. Finley, a practicing attorney, the relator on December 15, 1893, obtained a judgment against Stevens, Graham & Co., the defendants, for $11,216.66 and costs; that execution issued upon said judgment and was levied upon certain personal property, being the same property upon which attachment had been levied; that said property was advertised for sale on the first Monday in March, 1894, but that before the legal hours of sale on said day, Enoch W. Agnew and John A. Bishop, receivers appointed by the United States circuit court for the northern district of Florida, filed a claim to said property and obtained possession thereof from the sheriff; that on the following day the relator, in the circuit court of Marion county, caused said case to be called for trial, whereupon the Hon. William A. Hocker, the defendant, judge of said court, adjudged himself disqualified to sit in the trial of said claim case, and refused to do so, alleging the following ground of disqualification, to wit: That he was one of the attorneys of record in the principal case of D. G. Ambler v. Stevens, Graham & Co. The petition further alleges that prior to said suit or promises, to wit, in November, 1892, the relator brought the written contract therein sued upon to the said William A. Hocker, then a practicing attorney, but thereafter the said Hocker formed a copartnership with the present attorney of the relator, and when action was brought thereafter on the 10th day of February, 1893, the management of the matters pertaining thereto were turned over to the latter, and although William A. Hocker's name appears as an attorney of record in the case in the firm name of Hocker and Allen until his (Hocker's) appointment to the cir-given an opinion while at bar in favor of one, and another of the judges was a stockholder in plaintiff's company, that giving an opinion as counsel was not cause of challenge.

In 1843 the constitution and laws of Texas did not disqualify a judge from sitting in a cause, where he had been of counsel, but the present constitution does disqualify him. Chambers v. Hodges, 23 Tex. 104.

And in Lovering v. Lamson, 50 Me. 384, it was held that the discharge of a poor debtor by two justices was not void, where one had counseled and aided the debtor in preparing for his discharge, although he should not have acted. No statute appears to have been cited in the case. But see McGregor v. Crane, 96 Mass. 530.

Disqualification from having tried the case before.

A judge having once tried a cause is not thereby disqualified from hearing the same case in a subsequent proceeding, or from being a member of the court reviewing the former judgment, in the absence of statutory prohibition. Turnbull v. O'Hara, 4 Yeates, 446; Bachelder v. Norse, 35 Vt. 643; Heflin v. State, 85 Ga. 151; Pearson v. Hopkins, 2 N. J. L. 181; Fry v. Bennett, 28 N. Y. 324; Wetmore v. Winans, 8 Paige, 370, 4 L. ed. 466; Beckham v. Rice, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 281; Edwards v. Wife, 9 La. Ann. 321.

And under a statute disqualifying a committing magistrate from sitting as a member of the examining court, a justice acting as coroner is not disqualified from acting as member of the examining court. Forde v. Com. 16 Gratt. 547.

And in a suit to enjoin the storage of inflammable oils, the fact that the judge had been a member of the city council which had also passed on that question does not disqualify him. Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Cook (Tex.) March 29, 1894.

And that a judge belonged to a vigilance organization whose committee exiled the defendant on grounds unconnected with the present charge does not disqualify him from sitting in the cause. People v. Mahoney, 18 Cal. 185.

Under N. Y. Const. 1821, art. 5, § 1, the chancellor and justices of the supreme court were forbidden to take part in the affirmance or reversal of their own decrees and this was made part of 2 Rev. Stat., 275, but the omission of this clause from the constitution of 1846 virtually repealed the statute, the court saying there is nothing improper in a judge reviewing his own judgments. Pierce v. Deismater, 1 N. Y. 17.

This was changed and now N. Y. Const., art. 6, § 3, provides that no judge shall sit at general term in review of his own decision. Pistor v. Hatfield, 46 N. Y. 249.

But a commissioner of appeals is not a judge of the court of appeals, and section 8 applies only to the court of appeals and supreme court. Settle v. Evrea, 49 N. Y. 233.

And where a case was heard at general term before the election of 1890, adopting article six of the New York constitution, but the decision was not made until after the result of the election showing the adoption of the amendment, such amendment did not not apply to such decision. Rea v. People, 42 N. Y. 270.

And the New Hampshire statute providing that no justice shall sit in any case in which he has acted as judge in the court below applies only to the supreme court. Stearns v. Wright, 51 N. H. 600.

And in Queen v. Justices of London, 13 Q. B. 421, note, it was held that the presence of the magistrate at the hearing of an appeal from his court would not be sufficient to set aside the order made at such hearing, if he did not take part, and did not influence the court, but that it was indiscretion on his part. The question was as to the seating capacity of an omnibus which was exhibited at the hearing and the alderman who tried the case went in the omnibus and seated himself while it was being exhibited.

exit bench, that he at no time took any part in the direction of said case, and since his appointment as aforesaid has had no interest in said case or its outcome by reason of fees or otherwise. The petition further states that the issues in the claim case which the said Judge William A. Hocker refuses to try, are not in any way connected with the issues in the main case in which said Hocker was attorney of record, and have arisen since said Hocker was appointed a judge of the circuit court of Florida, and long after his connection with said case had been severed. The petition concludes with a prayer for an alternative writ of mandamus, commanding the defendant to try the aforesaid claim case, or show cause why he should not do so. This writ issued and the defendant has answered the same.

The answer expressly admits all of the allegations of the petition in reference to the suit by the relator against Stevens, Graham & Co., and the issuing and levying of the execution. The answer also admits that the defendant adjudged himself disqualified for the reasons alleged in the petition, and that the allegations of the petition are true which state his connection with the suit of Ambler v. Stevens et al., and that he had turned over all matters connected with said case to Mr. Edgar P. Allen, as his attorney, and that he had no interest in the same. The answer sets up other matters of disqualification of the defendant, besides those alleged in the petition.

In view of the conclusion we reach in the case, it is only necessary to notice one of these additional matters, which is the allegation that the defendant was one of the attorneys of record of John C. McKibbin, in the suit instituted by him (McKibbin) in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, against the said Stevens and Graham, and in which the said Enoch W. Agnew and John A. Bishop, who interposed said claim, were appointed receivers. The defendant admits that at the time said claim was filed he had ceased to have any relations with said suit as attorney or solicitor. The relator moves to strike out the answer on the ground that it is insufficient. This motion is in the nature of a demurrer to the answer, and of course admits the truth of all of its material allegations.

Two reasons are assumed in the pleadings stated herein for the disqualification of Judge Hocker: The first is that he was disqualified to try the claim case on account of his connection, as an attorney of record for the plaintiff, with the suit in which the execution, which was levied upon the property in dispute, was issued; the second is that he was disqualified by reason of having been an attorney of record for the complainant McKibbin in the case wherein McKibbin sought and obtained the appointment of the receivers who, by virtue of their appointment, interposed said claim. That the previous relation of attorney and client disqualifies a judge, has been determined in that state. Tampa Street R. & Power Co. v. Tampa Suburban R. Co. 30 Fla. 595, 17 L. R. A. 681.

As to the first matter, the connection of the defendant with the suit of the relator against Stevens et al., it is contended by the relator that the defendant, Judge Hocker, is not disqualified, because he was only connected with the main case, and that the claim case presents issues entirely foreign to the main case. It may be true, strictly speaking, that the defendant was not an attorney of record in the claim proceedings, but when we consider that the claim arose and is sought to be maintained in resistance to an effort to enforce the execution issued in a case in which the defendant was once an attorney of record, and that the result of his judgment must be that the execution can or cannot be enforced by a sale of the property levied upon, it must appear that the distinction claimed by the relator is too narrow and technical. The rule of disqualification of a judge who has been of counsel for one of the parties, in the matter of the litigation, or matters intimately connected therewith, is but an evolution of the elementary maxim that no man should be a judge in his own lawsuit. The law which disqualifies a judge who has been of counsel in the case intends that no judge shall preside in a case in which he is not wholly free, disinterested, impartial, and independent. The great principle should not have a narrow or technical construction, but should be applied to all classes of cases where a judicial officer is called upon to decide controversies between the people. 12 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 40; Hall v. Thayer, 105 Mass. 219, 223, 27 Am. Rep. 513; Curtis v. Wilcox, 74 Mich. 69; Gains v. Barr, 60 Tex. 676; Moses v. Julian, 45 N. H. 52, 84 Am. Dec. 114; Slaven v. Wheeler, 58 Tex. 23. Not only is a judge who has been an attorney in a case prohibited from acting in a judicial capacity, in the identical case in which he has been such attorney, but he cannot act in any supplemental or other proceedings closely connected with such case. McLaren v. Charrier, 5 Paige, 580, 3 L. ed. 817.

That the defendant, Judge Hocker, has no interest whatever in the claim suit, which the relator seeks to compel him to adjudicate, cannot affect the question. The matter is simply one of having been of counsel, and is entirely independent and distinct from any question of pecuniary interest, or of the payment to any fee or reward. Newcome v. Light, 58 Tex. 141, 44 Am. Rep. 604; Slaven v. Wheeler, supra. That the main suit of Ambler v. Stevens was entirely in charge of another member of the law firm in which defendant was a partner, does not alter the principle. What a partner does in the firm name in the pursuit of its ordinary business is done by the firm, and upon the firm's responsibility. East Rome Town Co. v. Cochran, 81 Ga. 359, 365; McLaren v. Charrier, supra.

The next question presented by the pleadings as stated is whether the defendant is disqualified by reason of his connection with the suit of McKibbin, Complainant v. Stevens et al., Defendants. In this suit the complainant sought and obtained the appointment of the receivers who interposed the claim in question. It was contended in brief of re-lator that Judge Hocker would not be disqualified, by reason of having been attorney for the relator, in the suit of Ambler v. Stevens et al., for the reason that a claimant could not attack the validity of the proceedings in which the execution issued, and that therefore Judge Hocker would not be called upon to determine the validity or invalidity of any proceeding in a suit in which he was of counsel. It is not contended, however, nor does it appear to us, that the validity of the appointment of the claimants as receivers might not be involved in the claim case, and that Judge Hocker might not in such a case be called upon to adjudicate such matter. The authorities are clear, and the principle is virtually admitted in the brief for the relator, that a judge is disqualified to adjudicate upon the validity of proceedings had and taken in a case in which he was of counsel. Darling v. Pierce, 15 Hun, 542. This matter was one in which Agnew and Bisop, the receivers, appointed at the instance and for the benefit of McKibbin, Judge Hocker's client, were taking such action, probably at his (McKibbin's) instance, as they thought legal and necessary to the performance of their duty, and to reap for him the benefit of their appointment as receivers. It was a proceeding intimately connected with a case in which the defendant had been of counsel. Much that has been stated as to the first question presented by the pleadings is equally applicable to this, and need not be repeated.

We hold that the connection of the defendant with the main suit of Ambler v. Stevens et al., and with the case of McKibbin v. Stevens et al., were either, and each of them, sufficient to disqualify him from trying the claim case of Agnew and Bishop, as receivers, mentioned in the pleadings herein.

The motion to strike the answer is denied.

v.

STATE of Florida.

(33 Fla. 162.)

*1. A state cannot tax or regulate interstate commerce, or make the payment of a tax or the taking out of a license a condition precedent to carrying interstate commerce. A state statute which does so, either expressly or in effect, is offensive to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, and void at least to that extent. The same is true as to foreign commerce.

2. A state statute which imposes a tax, in general terms, on the doing of specified kinds of business, or the pursuit of designated occupations, in the state, and requires that a license shall be taken out before *Headnotes by RANNEY, CH. J.

NOTE.—As to the validity of state taxes or licenses which affect interstate commerce, see authorities collected in Rothermel v. Meyerle (Pa.) 9 L. R. A. 306, and note; and see also the case next following this one.

any such business or avocation shall be done or engaged in, should not be construed to apply to any business of the kind that may constitute interstate commerce, but only to business that is domestic or state commerce and to persons engaged or intending to engage in such domestic or state business.

3. Although interstate commerce cannot be taxed or regulated by state legislation, and the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution exempts all such commerce from regulation or taxation by state authority, yet the doing of business that constitutes interstate commerce by a person who is also at the same time engaged in business of the same kind, that constitutes state or local commerce, cannot be made a bar or exemption of the local or state commerce business from taxation or regulation by state authority.

4. The ninth section of the General Revenue Law of 1893 (chapter 4115, approved June 2, 1893), provides that no person shall engage in or manage the business, profession, or avocation mentioned therein without first taking out a state license as provided therein and paying the occupational tax and license fee prescribed thereby; and it authorizes counties and incorporated cities and towns to impose further taxes. As to express companies its special provisions, substituting figures for words, are as follows: "All express companies doing business in this state shall pay in cities of 15,000 inhabitants or more, a license tax of $200; in cities of 10,000 to 15,000 inhabitants, $100; in cities of 5,000 to 10,000 inhabitants, $75; in cities of 3,000 to 5,000 inhabitants, $50; in cities of 1,000 to 3,000 inhabitants, $25; in towns and villages of less than 1,000 and more than fifty inhabitants, $10." Any express company violating these provisions, or any person that knowingly acts as agent for any express company before it has paid the tax payable by such company is guilty of a misdemeanor, and punishable as therein provided: Held,

(a) The act does not tax or regulate or apply to interstate commerce, as distinguished from state or local commerce carried on by an express company, but applies only to express business that is local or state commerce.

(b) That so long as an express company confines its operations to express business that constitutes interstate or foreign commerce it is exempt from the above legislation, but if it engages in business that is state or local, as distinguished from interstate or foreign commerce, it becomes subject to the statute, notwithstanding it may at the same time engage in interstate or foreign commerce.

(c) The effect of the section, in so far as it imposes license taxes on express companies, is that each company doing any business that constitutes local or state commerce, as contradistinguished from interstate or foreign commerce, shall pay a state license tax and take out a state license when it proposes to do business in any city or town or village having more than fifty inhabitants, the amount of such tax being as above indicated according to the population. When there are in one county several cities or towns or villages belonging to one or more of the stated classes, the company must take out a separate state license for each city, town, or village it may intend to do business in, and pay the tax and the fee for the same. Any county may require each company doing business within its limits to pay, for doing business in any city, town, or village in the county and within the provisions of the act, a license tax not exceeding fifty per cent of the amount paid the state for doing business in such city, town, or village. And any incorporated city or town may impose a tax of as much as fifty per cent of the state tax on any company doing business therein.

(d) That the amount of the tax is not shown to be prohibitory or destructive of the business of express companies, even if it be that any judicial action could be based on such a showing.

(e) The act is of uniform operation throughout the state as to all persons standing in the situation made the test of such taxation.

(f) The ascertainment of population involved in the act is not one that the courts are incapable of dealing with successfully.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Duval County to review a judgment denying plaintiff's application for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain his release from custody, to which he had been committed for acting as agent of an express company without a license. Affirmed.

Statement by Eaney, O. J.:

Section 9 of chapter 4115, Laws approved June 2, 1893, provides that: "No person shall engage in or manage the business, profession, or occupation mentioned in this section, unless a state license shall have been procured from the tax collector, which license shall be issued to each person on receipt of the amount hereinafter provided, together with the county judge's fee of twenty-five cents for each license, and shall be signed by the tax collector and the county judge, and have the county judge's seal upon it. Counties and incorporated cities and towns may impose such further taxes of the same kind upon the same subjects as they may deem proper, when the business, profession, or occupation shall be engaged in within such county, city, or town. The tax imposed by such city, town, or county shall not exceed fifty per cent of the state tax. But such city, town, or county may impose taxes on any business, profession, or occupation not mentioned in this section, when engaged in or managed within such city, town, or county. No license shall be issued for more than one year, and all licenses shall expire on the first day of October of each year, but fractional licenses, except as hereinafter provided, may be issued to expire on that day at a proportionate rate, estimating from the first day of the month in which the license is so issued, and all licenses may be transferred, with the approval of the comptroller, with the business for which they were taken out, when there is a bona fide sale and transfer of the property used and employed in the business as stock in trade; but such transferred license shall not be held good for any longer time, or for any other place, than that for which it was originally issued."

The same section, in various subdivisions, then enumerates divers business occupations and professions that are required to procure licenses, and prescribes the amount of tax that each shall annually pay therefor, until we reach the 12th subdivision of the section, that provides, among other things, that "all express companies doing business in this state, shall pay in cities of 15,000 inhabitants or more, a license tax of $200; in cities of 10,000 to 15,000 inhabitants, $100; in cities of 5,000 to 10,000 inhabitants, $75; in cities of 3,000 to 5,000 inhabitants, $50; in cities of 1,000 to 3,000 inhabitants, $25; in towns and villages of less than 1,000 and more than 50 inhabitants, $10. Any express company violating this provision, and any person that knowingly acts as agent for any express company before it has paid the above tax, payable by such company, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $50, or confined in the county jail not less than six months." Besides the criminal penalty above, section 10 of the same Act provides that "the payment of all license taxes may be enforced by the seizure and sale of the property by the collector." For an alleged violation of this statute, in knowingly acting as agent at Jacksonville, in Duval county, Florida, for the Southern Express Company, a corporation created under the laws of the state of Georgia, but doing business in Florida, without having paid such license, F. R. Osborne, the plaintiff in error, was arrested upon affidavit and warrant, and required to give bond for his appearance before the criminal court of record for Duval county to answer said charge. Upon his refusal to give such bond he was committed to the common jail of the county, there to await trial. Whereupon he applied to the judge of the circuit court for the writ of habeas corpus to test the legality of his arrest and detention. Upon the hearing on habeas corpus the arrest and detention of the plaintiff in error on the charge alleged against him under this statute was adjudged to be legal, and he was remanded to the custody of the sheriff, and this order he brings here for review by writ of error.

The cause was submitted to the court below upon the following agreed statement of facts: "That the said F. R. Osborne is the agent of the Southern Express Company, and that said company is a corporation created, existing, and being under the laws of the state of Georgia. That said Southern Express Company is doing a business in the state of Florida ordinarily done by express companies in the United States, of carrying goods and freight for hire from points within the state of Florida to points in said state, and also of carrying goods and freights for hire from points within the state of Florida to points without the state of Florida in other states in divers parts of the United States, and in carrying goods and freights for hire from points in other states of the United States to points within the state of Florida, and that it has been engaged in such business for more than twenty years, and was so engaged on the 8d day of October, 1893.

That of the business done by the Southern Express Company 95 per cent thereof consists of traffic carrying of goods and freights from the state of Florida into other states and bringing and carrying from other states of the United States to points within the state of Florida, and 5 per cent thereof consists of carrying goods and freights between points wholly within the state of Florida. That F. R. Osborne did knowingly act as the agent of said express company on the 3d day of October, 1893, in the city of Jacksonville, Duval county, Florida, a city having more than 15,000 inhabitants, the said Southern Express Company having then and there failed and refused to pay the license tax as required by article 12, section 9, of an Act entitled 'An Act for the Assessment and Collection of Revenue,' of the Laws of Florida, approved June 2d, 1893. That the Southern Express Company does business in and has agents in more than one town in nearly every county in the state, and that said towns differ in population, and that it has an office and agent and does business in Polk county, Florida, in the following incorporated towns with a population as follows: Bartow, 1,500 inhabitants, Ft. Meade, 600 inhabitants, Columbia, 600 inhabitants, Lakeland, 800 inhabitants, and Winter Haven, 200 inhabitants; in Orange county, Apopka, 500 inhabitants, Orlando, 10,000 inhabitants, Sanford, 5,000 inhabitants, Umatilla, 3,000 inhabitants, Winter Park, 600 inhabitants, and Zellwood, 300 inhabitants; in Alachua county, Campville, 400 inhabitants, Archer, 150 inhabitants, Grove Park, 110 inhabitants, Gainesville, 5,000 inhabitants, Hawthorne, 300 inhabitants, High Springs, 500 inhabitants, and Island Grove, 200 inhabitants; in Duval county, Jacksonville, with a population of over 15,000, Baldwin, 125 inhabitants."

Mr. John E. Hartridge, for plaintiff in error:

The word "commerce" has been so extended as to scarcely have any boundary. "Commerce is a term of comprehensive import. It includes intercourse for the purposes of trade in any and all forms. The effort to regulate, says the Supreme Court of the United States, embraces all the instruments by which such commerce may be conducted."

Mr. William B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the State.

Raney, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the case of Osborne v. Mobile, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 479, 21 L. ed. 470, decided in 1872, the ordinance then in question provided that every express or railroad company doing a business in the city of Mobile, Alabama, and having a business extending beyond the limits of that state, should pay an annual license of a stated amount, and every such company doing a business within the limits of the state, and every such company doing business within the city, should take out a license, paying therefor other amounts. Osborne was there, as here, the agent of the Southern Express Company, a Georgia corporation, which transacted a general express business within and extending beyond the state of Alabama. The company fell under the first clause of the ordinance, and notwithstanding its terms that clause was held unobjectionable to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. The decision is founded expressly on the rule laid down in the case of State Freight Tax, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 252, 21 L. ed. 146, where it was said that it is not everything which affects commerce that amount to a regulation of it within the meaning of the constitution, and was also admitted that the ultimate effect of the tax on such receipts might be to increase the cost of transportation, but was held that the right to tax the receipts, though derived in part from interstate transportation, was within the general authority of the state to tax persons, property, business, or occupations within their limits. In Philadelphia & S. Mail S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308, the decision in the case of State Freight Tax, was considered and questioned, it being held by a unanimous court that a state tax upon the gross receipts of a steamship company incorporated under its laws, such receipts being derived from the transportation of persons and property by sea between different states, and to and from foreign countries was a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, and in conflict with the exclusive powers of congress. That the Osborne Case has been overruled by that of Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 811, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 134, decided in 1888, cannot be denied, and it is clear that the first clause of the ordinance did in terms and effect impose a tax on that class of express companies which might be engaged in interstate commerce, as a distinct class from the other classes engaged, one in business not extending beyond the state, and the other in that not extending outside of the corporate limits.

In the Leloup Case, supra, an ordinance, adopted in 1883, imposed an annual license tax of $225 "on telegraph companies. Leloup was the agent of the Western Union Telegraph Company at Mobile, and the license tax not having been paid, a civil action was brought in the circuit court against Leloup to recover a pecuniary penalty which had been adjudged in another tribunal under the ordinance for its violation, the complaint in the circuit court alleging that the company was a New York corporation, having a place of business at Mobile, and had been engaged there in the business of transmitting telegrams from and to points within Alabama, and between private individuals of that state, as well as between citizens thereof and of other states. The plea alleged, in substance, Leloup's agency and that the company's charter authorized it to construct and operate lines of telegraph in and between the various states of the Union, including Alabama; and further, that on June 5, 1867, the company accepted the restrictions and obligations of the Act of Congress of July 24, 1866, and that in accordance with its charter the act of congress and agreements with the railroad companies, it constructed, and was at the time of the alleged breach of the ordinance, maintaining and operating, its lines of telegraph on various specified public railroads leading into Mobile, and through Alabama and several other named states, and into others, and over all the principal railroads, post-roads, and military roads in the United States, said roads being public highways, and the daily mails being regularly carried thereon under authority of law and the direction of the postmaster general; and under and across navigable streams in said states, but without interruption to navigation of the streams, or travel on such military and post-roads. That before and during the year 1883, it had been and still was engaged in the business of sending and receiving telegrams over such lines for the public between its office in Mobile and other places in other states and territories of the United States, and to and from foreign countries, also in sending telegraphic communications between the several departments of the government of the United States and their officers and agents, giving priority to said official telegraphic communications over all other business, such official communications being sent at rates fixed by the postmaster general annually since June 5, 1867. To this plea there was a demurrer which was sustained by the circuit court and judgment was given for the plaintiff, and this judgment affirmed by the supreme court of Alabama. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment, and decided: (1) That the license tax imposed by the ordinance was purely a tax on the privilege of doing the business in which the telegraph company was engaged, the company being also required to pay taxes on its property as other corporations and individuals, and also a tax on its gross receipts within the state; (2) Stating that the question was squarely presented, whether a state, as a condition of doing business within its jurisdiction, may exact a license tax from a telegraph company, a large part of whose business is the transmission of messages from one state to another, and between the United States and foreign countries, and which is invested with the powers and privileges conferred by the Act of Congress of July 24, 1866, and other acts incorporated in title LXV. of the Revised Statutes. Proceeding to answer this question, it held that a state cannot tax a business occupation when it cannot tax the business itself; and that a tax on the occupation of doing a business is a tax on the business. That communication by telegraph is commerce, as well as in the nature of postal service, and if carried on between different states it is commerce among the several states and directly within the power of regulation conferred upon congress, and free from the control of state regulations except such as are strictly of a police character. In reply to the argument that a portion of the company's business was internal to the state and therefore taxable by the state, it is said that such fact does not remove the difficulty; that the tax affects the whole business without discrimination, and that there are sufficient modes in which the internal business, if not already taxed in some other way, may be subjected to taxation without the imposition of a tax which covers the entire operation of the company. The cases of Pensacola Tele. Co. v. Western U. Tele. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708, and Western U. Tele. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 26 L. ed. 1067, are also referred to approvingly, and the conclusion reached in Leloup's Case is declared to be plainly within the principles of the decisions in Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 695, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, and Philadelphia & S. Mail S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308, and the case is held to be parallel with that of Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678, and the court declares that the fairest and most just construction of the constitution in all its parts "leads to the conclusion that no state has the right to lay a tax on interstate commerce in any form, whether by way of duties laid on the transportation of the subjects of that commerce, or on the receipts derived from that transportation, or on the occupation or business of carrying it on, and the reason is that such taxation is a burden on that commerce and amounts to a regulation of it, which belongs solely to congress."

It will be well to notice here the cases of Pensacola Tele. Co. v. Western U. Tele. Co., and of the same company v. Texas, referred to supra. The former case is one in which it was held that the above act of congress in so far as it declares that the erection of telegraph lines shall, as against state interference, be free to all who accept its terms and conditions, and that a telegraph company shall not after accepting them, be excluded by another state from prosecuting its business within her jurisdiction, is a legitimate regulation of commercial intercourse among the states, and appropriate legislation to execute the powers of congress over the postal service; and is not limited in its operation to such military and post-roads as are upon the public domain. This act, it will be found, gives to all telegraph companies organized under the laws of any of the states the right to construct telegraph lines through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, and over and along any of the military and post-roads of the United States, and over and across the navigable streams and waters of the United States, with certain conditions as to construction; and grants the right to occupy land and use materials; and enacts that telegraphic communications between the several departments of the general government and their officers and agents shall in their transmission over the lines of such companies have priority over all other business, and be sent at rates to be annually fixed by the postmaster general; and also enacting that before any company shall exercise the powers and privileges conferred thereby it shall file its written acceptance with the postmaster general of the restrictions and obligations required by this act. And in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, where a Texas statute required every chartered telegraph company doing business in that state to pay a tax of one cent on every full-rate message, and one half cent for every message less than full rate, the state sued to recover the tax for messages of which a large number were sent to places outside of the state and by officers of the general government on public business. There was judgment for the state, no deductions being allowed by the state courts for messages sent out of the state or by government officers on government business. The Supreme Court of the United States, in reversing the judgment, says: "The . . . company having accepted the restrictions and obligations of this provision by congress, occupies in Texas the position of an instrument of foreign and interstate commerce and of a government agent for the transmission of messages on public business. Its property in the state is subject to taxation the same as other property, and it may undoubtedly be taxed in a proper way on account of its occupation and its business. The precise question now presented is whether the power to tax its occupation can be exercised by placing a specific tax on each message sent out of the state, or sent by public officers on the business of the United States. . . . As such, so far as it operates on private messages sent out of the state, it is a regulation of foreign and interstate commerce and beyond the power of the state. That is fully established by the cases already cited. As to the government messages, it is a tax by the state on the means employed by the government of the United States to execute its constitutional powers, and therefore void." The conclusion was that the judgment in so far as it included taxes for government messages or those sent out of the state, was erroneous, it being observed that any tax which the state might put on messages sent by private parties, and not by the agents of the general government, from one place to another exclusively within the jurisdiction of the state, will not be repugnant to the Federal Constitution, and that whether the state law of Texas, in its present form, could be used to enforce the collection of such a tax, was a question entirely within the jurisdiction of the courts of the state, and as to which the supreme court had no power to review. Still another case involving the effect of the act of congress referred to above and tending also to elucidate the question before us independent of such legislation, is Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty-Gen. of Massachusetts, 125 U. S. 590, 31 L. ed. 790. The valuation of the entire capital stock of the company was obtained from the company, and from this there were made certain deductions allowable in determining the assessable value of such entire stock, and the value of the property of the company in the state was ascertained upon the basis of the proportion of the length of the lines within the state to the length of its lines throughout the country, and this value was assessed at the uniform rate of $14.14 on each $1,000 of valuation. The company contended that, in view of the act of congress, which it had accepted, no tax could be claimed for that part of its line,—2834.55 out of 2883.05 miles—that was over, under, or across post roads. The Massachusetts law had a provision to the effect that upon a failure to pay the taxes required to be paid to the treasurer, he might commence an action for the recovery of the same, and further, that all penalties denominated by the act might be collected by informations, and that upon such information the court might issue an injunction restraining the further prosecution of business by the corporation, company, copartnership, or association until all such taxes due, or penalties incurred, should be paid, with interest and costs. The tax was held by the supreme court to be essentially an excise on the capital of the corporation, imposed in an attempt by the commonwealth to ascertain the just amount which any corporation engaged in business within its limits should pay as a contribution to the support of its government on the amount and value of the capital employed by the company therein; or as elsewhere said the tax though nominally upon the shares of the capital stock is in effect a tax upon that organization on account of property owned and used by it in the state, and the proportion of the length of its lines in the state to their entire length throughout the whole country, is made the basis for ascertaining the value of that property. While, says the opinion, the state could not interfere by any specific statute to prevent a corporation from placing its lines along these post-roads, or stop the use of them after they were placed there, nevertheless the company receiving the benefit of the laws of the state for the protection of its property and its rights, is liable to be taxed upon its real and personal property as any other person would be; and that it never could have been intended by congress in conferring upon a corporation of one state the authority to enter the territory of another and erect its poles and lines therein to establish the proposition that such a company owed no obedience to the laws of the state into which it thus entered, and was under no obligation to pay its fair proportion of the taxes necessary to its support. The tax was held to be valid, but that part of the state legislation which authorized an injunction was decided to be void, the court observing that the effect of the injunction was to utterly suspend the business of the company and defeat its operations within the state; that if congress had authority to say that the company might construct and operate its telegraph over these lines, the state can have no authority to say it cannot be done; but that in holding this portion of the act to be void, it was not meant to deprive the state of the power to assess and collect the tax.

In Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649, a statute of Kentucky made it unlawful for any agent of any express company, not incorporated by the laws of that state, to carry on the business of transportation in that state without first obtaining a license therefor from the auditor, and before the auditor could issue such license to any agent of any company incorporated by any state of the United States, there had to be filed with such officer a copy of the company's charter and a sworn statement showing the assets and liabilities of the company, amount of capital stock, how paid, and of what the assets of the company consist, and, in short, the financial condition of the company, and that it was possessed of $150,000 either in cash or safe investments inclusive of stock notes; such statement to be renewed annually. A fee of $5 to be paid by the company or agent was allowed to the auditor for issuing the license, and a like fee for filing copy of charter, and of ten dollars for filing original and annual statements. Crutcher was indicted for doing business as the agent of the United States Express Company, an express company not incorporated by the laws of Kentucky, but trading and doing business as a common carrier by express of goods and other things of value in and through the county of Franklin and state of Kentucky without having any license so to do, either for himself or for such company, and on a plea of not guilty, was found guilty and sentenced to pay a fine. There was an agreed statement of facts, including in its admissions the agency, the incorporation and absence of license, and the doing of business ordinarily done by express companies in this country, of carrying goods and freight for hire not only between points in the state, but also from points in the state to points out of it, and vice versa. The statement also showed the total amount of business done at the Frankfort office in November, 1888, and that not quite one fourth of it was local to the state, and the balance was between places in the state and places outside of it. The court of appeals of Kentucky affirmed the judgment of conviction; but the Supreme Court of the United States reversed it, and in doing so said of the statute that it required from the agent of every express company a license before he can carry on any business for the company in the state, and that this of course embraced interstate business as well as business confined wholly within the state, and was a prohibition against the carrying on of interstate business without a compliance with the state law. The requirement of the statement as to $150,000 investment is also held to be a regulation of such commerce in its application to corporations or associations engaged in that business and a subject belonging to the jurisdiction of the national, and not the state legislature. "If," says the opinion, "a partnership firm of individuals should undertake to carry on the business of interstate commerce between Kentucky and other states, it would not be within the province of the state legislature to exact conditions on which they should carry on their business, nor to require them to take out a license therefor. To carry on interstate commerce is not a franchise, or a privilege granted by the state; it is a right which every citizen of the United States is entitled to exercise under the constitution and laws of the United States; and the accession of mere corporate facilities, as a matter of convenience in carrying on their business cannot have the effect of depriving them of such right unless congress should see fit to interpose some contrary regulation on the subject." In citing Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co., 117 U. S. 84, 29 L. ed. 785, and other cases, observes the opinion, the court has frequently decided that a state law is unconstitutional and void which requires a party to take out a license for carrying on interstate commerce, no matter how specious the pretext may be for imposing it. Again, the court, addressing itself to the fact that the statement shows some business of a purely domestic character to have been done, says: "This is probably quite as much for the accommodation of the people of that state as for the advantage of the company. But whether or not, it does not obviate the objection that the regulations as to license and capital stock are imposed as conditions on the company's carrying on the business of interstate commerce which was manifestly the principal object of its organization. These regulations are clearly a burden and restriction on that commerce. Whether intended as such or not they operate as such. But taxes or license fees in good faith imposed exclusively on express business carried on wholly within the state would be open to no such objection." The opinion also distinguishes the case from those of foreign corporations seeking to do a business which does not belong to the regulating power of congress, as insurance business, and manufacturing, and all other corporations whose business is of a local and domestic nature, as to all of which the state has full power to prescribe the conditions of their doing such business in its limits. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274; Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357; Liverpool & L. L. & F. Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 566, 19 L. ed. 1029; Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 118 U. S. 727, 28 L. ed. 1187; Philadelphia Fire Assn. v. New York, 119 U. S. 110, 30 L. ed. 342. The act was held null and void as applied to the case of Crutcher.

The case of Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, cited by the attorney-general, holds, as the same is summarized in the syllabus, that a statute which requires every corporation, person or association, operating a railroad within the state, to pay an annual tax for the privilege of exercising its franchises therein, to be determined by the amount of its gross transportation receipts, and further provides that when applied to a railroad lying partly within and partly without the state, or to one operated as a part of a line or system extending beyond the state, the tax shall be equal to the proportion of the gross receipts in the state, to be ascertained in the manner provided by the statute, does not conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and the tax thereby imposed upon a foreign corporation operating a line of railway partly within and partly without the state is one within the power of the state to levy. By the terms of the statute passed in 1881 it was provided that "every corporation, person, or association, operating any railroad in this state, shall pay to the state treasurer for the use of the state an annual excise tax for the privilege of exercising its franchise in this state."

The named railway company was a Canadian corporation having its place of business at Montreal. Its railroad in Maine had been constructed by a Maine corporation, whose charter authorized it to construct and operate a railroad from Portland to the boundary of the state; and with the permission of New Hampshire and Vermont it constructed a railroad from that city to a point in Vermont. In 1858 the Maine company leased its rights and privileges to the Canadian company which, since then, had operated the road and used its franchises. The manner of ascertaining the amount of the tax was as follows: The amount of gross transportation receipts for the year ending September 30 preceding the levying of the tax was to be divided by the number of miles of railroad operated, to ascertain the gross receipts per mile, and the tax was to be fixed on a scale of percentage varying according to the average receipts per mile, not to exceed in any event a stated per centum; and when a road lay partly within and partly without the state, or is operated as a part of a system extending beyond the state, the gross transportation receipts of the railroad line or system over its whole extent within and without the state were to be divided by the total number of miles operated to obtain the gross receipts per mile, and the gross receipts in the state were to be taken to be the average gross receipts per mile multiplied by the number of miles operated within the state. The supreme court held the tax to be an excise tax upon the corporation for the privilege of exercising its franchise within the state of Maine, and it is said in the opinion that the privilege of exercising the franchise of a corporation within a state is generally one of value, and often of great value and the subject of earnest contention, and that as the granting of the privilege rests entirely in the discretion of the state, whether the corporation be of domestic or foreign origin, it may be conferred upon such conditions, pecuniary or otherwise, as the state in its judgment may deem most conducive to its interest and policy; and it may require the payment into its treasury each year of a specific sum, or may apportion the amount exacted according to the value of the business permitted as disclosed by its gains or receipts of present or of past years. And further, that the erroneous ruling of the lower court to the effect that the tax in question was a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, was founded upon the assumption that a reference by the statute to the transportation receipts and adopting a certain percentage of the same for determining the amount of the excise tax, was in effect the imposition of the tax upon such receipts, and therefore an interference with interstate and foreign commerce; whereas the resort to the stated methods was not an interference with transportation, domestic or foreign, over the road of the railroad company or any regulation of commerce consisting in such transportation; and there being no levy by the statute on the receipts themselves, either in form or fact, they constituting merely the means of ascertaining the value of the privilege conferred. The case is assimilated by the court to that of Home Ins. Co. of New York v. New York, 134 U. S. 594, 33 L. ed. 1025, where a portion of the capital stock of the company was invested in bonds of the United States, and by an act of the legislature of New York it was declared that certain classes of companies with certain exceptions, incorporated under the laws of that state or of any other state or country and doing business in New York, should be subject to a tax on its corporate franchise or business to be computed at a varying percentage on its capital stock according as its dividends thereon should be more or less, or there should be no dividend, as stated in the act. The company resisted the payment of the tax, asserting that it was one upon the capital stock of the company, and that consequently there should be deducted from the amount of the tax a sum bearing the same ratio thereto that the amount invested in government bonds, which were exempt from taxation, bore to its capital stock, and that the law requiring a tax, without such reduction, was unconstitutional and void. It was held, however, that the tax was not on the capital stock nor upon any bonds of the United States composing a part thereof, but upon the corporate franchise or business of the company, and that reference was only made to the stock and dividends for the purpose of determining the amount of the tax to be enacted each year.

In 1879 the legislature of Pennsylvania enacted a statute to the effect, as far as it need be stated, that no foreign corporation, except insurance companies, that did not invest and use its capital in that commonwealth, should have an office or offices therein for the use of its officers, stockholders, agents, or employes, unless it should have first obtained from the auditor-general an annual license so to do, and for such license pay into the state treasury annually one fourth of a mill on each dollar of capital stock that it was authorized to have, such payment to be made before the license could issue. This statute has been before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Pembina Consol. & Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 31 L. ed. 650, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24, and in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 34 L. ed. 394, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 178. In the former case it appeared merely that the appellant company, a corporation organized under the laws of Colorado, for the purpose of carrying on a general mining and milling business in that state, with its principal office there, had an office in the city of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for the use of its officers, stockholders, agents and employes, and not having complied with the law, an action was brought to recover of it the tax and penalty authorized by the statute. The tax was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States as not in conflict with the commerce clause of the constitution; and Judge Field speaking for the court said of the statute that it imposed no prohibition upon the transportation into Pennsylvania of the products of the corporation or upon their sale in the commonwealth, but exacted only a license tax from the corporation when it has an office in the commonwealth for the use of its officers, stockholders, agents or employes; and it is also observed by him, that the only limitation upon the power of a state to exclude a foreign corporation from doing business within its limits, or hiring officers for that purpose or to exact conditions for allowing it to do business or have offices there, arises where the corporation is in the employ of the federal government, or where its business is strictly commerce interstate or foreign; that the control of such commerce being in the federal government, is not to be restricted by state authority. In the second case there was a different state of facts. The road of the railroad company, a corporation existing under the laws of Virginia and West Virginia, though entirely within the two states named, was a link in a through line of railroad by which passengers and freight were carried into Pennsylvania from other states, and from that state to other states; and it kept its office in Philadelphia for its stockholders, officers, agents, and employes for the "furtherance of its business interests in the matter of its commercial relations," and did not "exercise or seek to exercise any privilege or franchise not immediately connected with interstate commerce, and required for the purpose thereof." The Pennsylvania courts held that the company was subject to the tax imposed by the statute, but the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the office was maintained because of the necessities of the interstate business of the company, and for no other purpose, and that a tax upon the company was therefore a tax upon one of the means or instrumentalities of the company's interstate commerce, and as such was in violation of the commerce clause of the constitution.

In McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 34 L. ed. 892, the appellant was an agent in the city and county of San Francisco for the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, a railroad corporation having its principal place of business in Chicago, and operating a continuous line of road between Chicago and New York; and as such agent his duties consisted in soliciting passenger traffic in that city and county over such road. He did not sell tickets to passengers over that or any other road, but took the passengers to the Central Pacific Railroad Company where tickets were sold them. The only duty he was required to perform for such company was to induce people who contemplated taking a trip east to be booked over the line he represented, he neither receiving nor paying out any money or other valuable consideration on account thereof. An ordinance of 25 L. R. A.

San Francisco prescribed certain rates of license, and, among others, "for every railroad agency, twenty-five dollars per quarter," and made any violation of the ordinance a misdemeanor. McCall was convicted by the state court upon the above state of facts and the further circumstance that he had not complied with the ordinance. The tax was exacted of him as a condition precedent to carrying on the business. "It is admitted," says the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, reversing the state court, that "the travel which it was his business to solicit was not from one place to another within the state of California. His business therefore as a railroad agent had no connection direct or indirect with any domestic commerce between two or more places within the state. His employment was limited exclusively to inducing persons in the state of California to travel from that state into and through other states to the city of New York." The conclusion was, the business of the agent was interstate commerce, and that the tax was forbidden by the federal organic law.

In Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, the decision was that a state statute imposing a tax on the capital stock of all corporations engaged in the transportation of freight or passengers within the state, under which a corporation of another state engaged in running railroad cars into, through, and out of the state, and having at all times a large number of such cars within the state, is taxed by taking as the basis of assessment such proportion of its capital stock as the number of miles of railroad over which its cars are run within the state bears to the whole number of miles in that and other states over which its cars are run, does not, as applied to such a corporation, violate the interstate commerce provision of the Federal Constitution. In the opinion of the court, by Judge Gray, it is said, citing Moran v. New Orleans, 112 U. S. 69, 28 L. ed. 653; Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34, 29 L. ed. 785; Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. and Leloup v. Port of Mobile, supra, that much reliance was placed by the plaintiff in error upon the cases in which it has been decided that citizens or corporations of one state cannot be taxed by another state for a license or privilege to carry on interstate or foreign commerce within its limits, and is then observed that in each of those cases the tax was not on the property employed in the business, but upon the right to carry on the business at all, and was therefore held to impose a direct burden on the commerce itself.

In Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, a Tennessee statute enacted that "all drummers and all persons not having a regular licensed house of business in the taxing district offering for sale or selling goods, wares, or merchandise therein, by sample, shall be required to pay to the county trustee the sum of $10 per week or $25 per month for such privilege, and no license shall be issued for a longer period than three months." Robbins, according to the agreed statement of facts, was a citizen and resident of Cincinnati, Ohio, and was engaged in the taxing district of Shelby county, Tennessee, in the business of drumming—soliciting trade by the use of samples—for the firm of Rose, Robbins & Co., doing business at Cincinnati, all the members thereof being citizens and residents of Cincinnati, for which firm he worked as a drummer, the firm being engaged in the selling of paper and other articles used in the book stores of the stated taxing district. Robbins was arrested for drumming in the district without a license. There was judgment against Robbins, and on appeal it was affirmed by the supreme court of Tennessee, from which court the case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the judgment was reversed on the ground that the legislation, in so far as it applied to cases like that then under consideration, was a regulation of commerce among the states, and unconstitutional. In Ficklen v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 145 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 601, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 79, Ficklen and Cooper & Co. were respectively commercial agents or brokers having an office in the district, and in 1887 took out licenses for their said business under a statute of Tennessee which provided that "every person or firm dealing in cotton or any other article whatever, whether as factor, broker, buyer or seller, on commission or otherwise, $50 per annum, and in addition every such person or firm shall be taxed ad valorem ten cents on every hundred dollars of amount of capital invested or used in such business And provided further that if the person or persons taxed in this subsection have no capital invested they shall pay two and one half per cent on their gross year commissions, charges, or compensation for said business, and at the time of taking out said license they shall give bond to return said gross commissions, charges, or compensation to the trustee at the end of the year, and at the end of the year they shall make return to said trustee accordingly and pay him the said two and one half per cent." During the year for which they took out license all the sales negotiated by Ficklen were made on behalf of principals residing in other states, and the goods so sold were at the time of the sale in other states to be shipped to Tennessee as sales should be effected. During the same time at least nine tenths of the commissions of Cooper & Co. were derived from similar sales. They had no capital invested in their business. At the expiration of the stated year they applied for a renewal of their license for 1888, tendering each the tax and fee therefor, but as they had made no return of their commissions and no payment of the percentage on their commissions, the application was denied. Thereupon they filed a bill to restrain the collection of the percentage tax for the past year, and also to restrain any interference with their current business, claiming that the tax was a tax on interstate commerce. The Supreme Court of the United States held that if the tax could be said to affect interstate commerce in any way, it did so incidentally and so remotely as not to amount to a regulation of it; and that under the circumstances the complainants could not resort to the court simply on the ground that the authorities had refused to issue a new license without the payment of the stipulated tax. Speaking here for all the court, except Harlan, J., who dissented, there being, however, one vacancy, Chief Justice Fuller said of the Robbins Case, supra, that the question involved there was, in the language of Judge Bradley, who wrote the opinion of the court: "Whether it is competent for a state to levy a tax or impose any other restrictions upon the citizens or inhabitants of any other state for selling or seeking to sell their goods in said state before they are introduced therein," and that it was decided that it was not; yet that it was conceded that commerce among the states might be legitimately incidentally affected by state laws when they, among other things, provided "for the imposition of taxes upon persons residing within the state or belonging to its population and upon avocations and employments pursued therein, not directly connected with foreign or interstate commerce, or with some other employment or business exercised under authority of the constitution and laws of the United States." That in Robbins' Case the tax was held in effect not to be a tax on him, but on his principals, while in the Ficklen Case it was clearly levied upon the parties in respect of the general commission business they conducted, and their property engaged therein or their profits realized therefrom. "No doubt," he further says, "can be entertained of a right of a state legislature to tax trades, professions, and occupations in the absence of inhibition in the state constitution, and where a resident citizen engages in general business subject to a particular tax, the fact that the business done chances to consist for the time being wholly or partially in negotiating sales between resident and nonresident merchants of goods situated in another state, does not necessarily involve the taxation of interstate commerce, forbidden by the constitution." Referring to what was said in Lyng v. Michigan, 135 U. S. 161, 166, 34 L. ed. 150, 153, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 143, he observes, but here the tax is not laid on the occupation or business of carrying on interstate commerce, or exacted as a condition of doing any particular commission business, and that the complainants voluntarily subjected themselves thereto in order to do a general business. And as to Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 385, 27 L. ed. 419, where an annual license fee was imposed on a ferry company by the city of East St. Louis, Illinois, the company having been chartered by that state and being domiciled in the city, but its boats plying between there and St. Louis, Missouri, he quotes from the opinion therein as follows: "The exaction of a license fee is an ordinary exercise of the police power by municipal corporations. When, therefore, a state expressly grants to an incorporated city as in this case the power to 'license, tax and regulate ferries,' the latter may impose a license tax on the keepers of ferries, although their boats ply between lands lying in two different states, and the act by which this section is authorized will not be held to be a regulation of commerce;" and of McCall v. California, supra, he says that the decision was because the business of the agency was carried on with the purpose to assist in increasing the amount of passenger traffic over the road, and was therefore a part of the commerce of the road, and hence of interstate commerce; and of Philadelphia & S. Mail SS. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 123 U. S. 826, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Intern. Com. Rep. 808, he remarks that the specific gross receipts were taxed as such, taxed "not only because they are money or its value, but because they were received for transportation." Referring to Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co., supra, he says, since a railroad company engaged in interstate commerce is liable to pay an excise tax according to the value of the business done in the state, ascertained as it was there, it is difficult to see why a citizen doing a general business at the place of his domicile should escape payment of his share of the burdens of municipal government because the amount of his tax is arrived at by reference to his profits. "This tax is not on the goods, or on nonresident merchants, and if it can be said to affect in any way it is incidentally and so remotely as not to amount to a regulation of such commerce. . . . What position they would have occupied if they had not undertaken to do a general commission business, and had taken out no license therefor, but has simply transacted business for nonresident principals, is an entirely different question which does not arise on this record."

The present case is also clearly distinguishable from Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car. Co., 117 U. S. 84, 29 L. ed. 785, where a Tennessee statute imposing a privilege tax of $30 per annum on every sleeping car or coach used or run over a railroad in that state, and not owned by the railroad on which it should be run or used, was held void in so far as it applied to interstate transportation of passengers carried over railroads in Tennessee into or out of or across that state in sleeping cars owned by a corporation of another state and leased by it for transportation purposes to Tennessee railroad corporations, the latter receiving the transit fare and the former the compensation for the sleeping accommodations. In the opinion it is said: "The car was equally a vehicle of transit as if it had been a car owned by the railroad company and the special conveniences or comforts furnished to the passenger had been furnished by the railroad company itself. As such vehicle of transit, the car, so far as it was engaged in interstate commerce, was not taxable by the state of Tennessee; because the plaintiff had no domicile in Tennessee, and was not subject to its jurisdiction for purposes of taxation; and the cars had no situs within the state for purposes of taxation; and the plaintiff carried on no business within the state, in the sense in which the carrying on of business in a state is taxable by way of license or privilege." Here the express company has, as is well known, its local offices and local agents throughout the state, and is doing business as personally here, and enjoying the protection of our government and laws over that business as much as any person in the state.

The statute now before us is clearly distinguishable from those involved in many of the preceding decisions. It does not impose any tax upon the value of the property of the company within the state, assessed either upon the principle adopted by the legislatures of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, in the cases of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty. Gen. of Massachusetts, and Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, or otherwise; nor does it impose a tax on the mere right to exercise within the state a corporate franchise, estimating the value of such use as in Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co.; again, it is not a tax on a corporation for merely having an office in the state for the use of its officers, stockholders, agents, or employés, as in Pembina Consol. Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, in all of which cases the statutes were sustained; nor one where the state has given exclusive right to a domestic corporation, and the question of the validity of that grant to the exclusion of another company which the act of congress gave the right to enter the same territory, and constituted a federal agency, as in Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co., where the efficiency of the state grant to exclude the latter company was denied. Our statute is clearly one in which the tax is imposed on the person and for doing the business of an express company. It is an occupational tax, and is not imposed on any corporation because it is a corporation or for exercising its corporate franchise within the state, but it is imposed as are most of the occupational taxes to be found in the act, on any and every person, whether natural or artificial who may do the express business, and simply because of doing such business. It is moreover entirely clear that the statute does not anywhere show any intent to tax interstate or foreign commerce as such, or to tax any one because of doing business that constitutes interstate or foreign commerce, as contradistinguished from local business. That a state cannot tax interstate commerce either directly or otherwise, or that it cannot make the payment of a tax or the taking out of a license a condition precedent to carrying on interstate commerce, we do not deny; nor do we wish to be understood as meaning that a state tax which in effect burdens such commerce wherever it may be carried on, although not laid directly or expressly on interstate commerce, is not offensive to the commerce clause of the constitution, still we do believe that a state tax imposed on any avocation generally, such as those usually imposed on merchants, druggists, dealers in tobacco and others, for doing business in the state, is not itself, nor is the statute imposing it, unconstitutional. That the commerce clause of the constitution exempts from the burden of state taxation those who confine themselves to interstate commerce is a truth of which, at this day, knowledge must be imputed to the law-making power of the states, and in the absence of language that clearly connects such an intent with that power, it should not be held that there was a purpose to ignore such truth or violate its principles; but that the doing of express or other business which constitutes interstate commerce along with and as a part of a general business which is also made up in part of business of the same nature that is local to the state, exempts those engaged in such general business from the tax which the law imposes upon it, we do not admit. Of course where such statutes make the payment of the tax, or the taking out of a license, a condition precedent to such general business they are never a bar to any one at any time entering upon or doing interstate commerce business, and as long as any one does only such business he is exempted by the commerce clause from the effect of the statute, and is in our judgment placed beyond the intent of the more general language usually adopted in imposing occupational taxes, but when he does not confine himself to such business, but engages indiscriminately in local and interstate business, he cannot by making the former a feature of that business relieve himself from the taxes, conditions, or regulations to which the latter subjects him. Engaging in the former business does not necessitate his engaging in the latter, and if he does not engage in the latter the former is in no wise burdened or even affected by the tax or the statute, but, on the contrary, he is as free to carry on interstate commerce unaffected by the provisions of this act, as if it was not on the statute book. He may, if he chooses, keep his local and interstate business entirely distinct, or carry them on each as a separate business, and if he does so the former will be subject to state taxation and regulation but the latter will be exempt from any legislation regulating or burdening the former. In our judgment it was never the purpose of the commerce clause to interfere with state taxation or state regulation of taxation so long as any regulation of interstate or foreign commerce, or commerce with the Indian tribes, is not interfered with.

It is obvious from several of the decisions cited above that there is a clear distinction between the unconstitutionality of a statute as such or of a specific provision thereof, tested by the commerce clause, and the application of a general provision, like that before us, of a statute to interstate commerce business which, but for the commerce clause, would be within the operation of such general provision. This is illustrated by the case of the Pembina Consolidated Silver Mining and Milling Company, and that of the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, involving the Pennsylvania statute as to foreign corporations having offices in the state for the use of officers and others. In the former of these cases, where the imposition of the tax was sustained, it was said, and is evident, that the statute proposed no prohibition upon the transportation of the products of the corporation or upon their sale in the state, nor is there in the statute anything that shows an intent to affect interstate commerce in any way, but when it was attempted to subject to that statute a company which was using its offices solely for interstate commerce purposes, and the state court had decided both that the statute applied to offices so used, and that the tax as thus applied was not contrary to the commerce clause, the supreme court reversed the decision, and held that as so applied the tax was unconstitutional. Again in the McCall Case where it is made prominent that the business of the agent was exclusively interstate in its character, it is entirely plain that it was not the meaning of the court that the statute or ordinance involved in these cases did not stand in full force and effect as to everything except interstate or other commerce falling within the terms of the commercial clause. And in the case of Western U. Telog. Co. v. Texas, where telegrams sent between persons in Texas and those in other states and those sent to government officers were held to be exempted from the general provision of the act, taxing all messages, the former because they were interstate commerce, and the latter because of the character of the company as a governmental agency, it is apparent that telegrams themselves were the subject of taxation by the terms of the act, and those which were held to be exempt were purely interstate or governmental in their character. Again it is shown in the Shelby County Taxing District Cases. In one of them (Robbins' Case) the facts showed nothing but interstate commerce business, pure and simple; there being not a fact in it that makes the decision authority beyond the inability to tax such commerce as such. Of course no one would pretend to say that it committed the court to the view that in the doing of a general business of a particular character composed of both interstate and local commerce, the former component would relieve the entire business from a state tax or regulation to which it would be subject if there was no such component, or that the act was not entirely effectual except as to business covered by the commerce clause. In the Ficklen Case, however, the tax was, as it was imposed by the statute, as general as it was in the Robbins' Case, and yet because the parties had submitted themselves to the statute as persons intending to do a general business, or, in other words, one indiscriminate as to local or interstate commerce, it was held that they could not either because in the one case only interstate business was done, and in the other mostly such business, and only one tenth of local business, evade the provisions of the statute. We do not understand any case to hold that the protection of the commerce clause is confined to citizens of other states than that whose legislation is complained of. It is as much a shield to the Floridian who in Florida is doing such business with those in other states as it is the Georgian residing in Georgia who may be engaging in business with residents of Florida; the protection is to all interstate commerce.

We are not unmindful of the seeming conflict to those views to be found in the expressions embodied in the Leloup, and the Crutcher cases, but our judgment is that these expressions are to be viewed with reference to the circumstances under which the Supreme Court of the United States was then speaking. The state courts which it was reviewing had each declared in effect that these statutes were binding upon and effectual as to companies as doers of interstate business, or, in other words, were a bar to their doing interstate business without having complied with their requirements. Port of Mobile v. Letoup, 76 Ala. 401; Orutcher v. Com. 89 Ky. 7. This construction has become, in so far as the federal tribunals were concerned, binding upon the federal court as to the effect of each statute within the state enacting it, as much as if it had been expressly stated in the act. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 21, 85 L. ed. 613, 614, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595. This being so, the doing of local business could not affect the question. It gave to the statute the same effect on interstate commerce as if it had had a special clause as to such commerce, like the first clause of the Alabama statute in the case of Osborne v. Mobile, supra, which decision we regard, in view of that clause, as entirely overthrown by the subsequent decisions of the same tribunal. It cannot be where the state statute does not interfere with interstate commerce, but it can be carried on protected by the state courts against regulation or interference by state authority, that the mere fact that state commerce, if carried on, is regulated or burdened, operates as a regulation of or burden on interstate commerce.

It is not to be doubted that, under our statute, any citizen of the state, or of any other state, or any body corporate of either, that should enter upon the express business in this state proposing to confine itself to local or state business, or actually doing so, would be subject to all the provisions of this statute; and we cannot see how it can be that an engagement by any such person, natural or artificial, in local business, can be relieved from the provisions of the statute by an engagement at the same time in interstate commerce business, or how his engagement in the latter business can make the statute inapplicable to the other. Is it true that the merchant who may be doing a large local business can exempt himself from the statute by the fact that he may also do a regular business with customers in other states to whom he sells and ships goods? We do not think that anything but interstate and foreign business, or business with the Indian tribes, is protected by the clause in question, or that that clause is the basis either for interfering with a state's dominion over its own commerce, or for prescribing the mere form of its legislation as to its affairs.

Our state statute can have no effect as to any interstate or foreign commerce business which may be carried on by the Southern Express Company, the principal of the plaintiff in error, or by him as its agent, or in fact by any one. So long as he and the company confine their operations to express business constituting interstate or foreign commerce, they are exempt from any interference with them under state legislation. Such commerce is the subject of federal regulation, and is beyond the jurisdiction of state authority. That the Southern Express Company is engaged in such commerce, is admitted; and 85 L. R. A.

that it is engaged in domestic or state commerce, is also admitted, and nothing is clearer than that the right to engage in interstate or foreign commerce freed from any regulation or burden of the same by the states, gives no immunity from state regulation or state taxation of state commerce. The exclusion of state interference in the one case is no more perfect, nor any more essential, than the exclusion of federal interference in the other. In our judgment the Florida statute now under consideration is, in so far as its terms can be construed to apply to interstate or foreign commerce, of no effect, and besides this there is in the act, in so far as it applies to express companies, nothing that necessarily regulates, or that burdens or interferes with anything that is strictly interstate or foreign commerce, or that, in view of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, should or can properly be construed to apply to interstate or foreign commerce. Any person or persons, or body corporate, wishing to engage in the express business, and confine that business to interstate or foreign commerce, can do so, and any effort to apply to or enforce against him the provisions of the statute as to license, license tax, or license fee, must prove futile. The commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States protects him against any such interference. But because such person, or persons, or body corporate, may have this right, he or they have not as an incident to it the right to engage in state commerce, and the statute as a regulation of state commerce is entirely valid. It is a legal regulation of state commerce, and there is nothing in the Federal Constitution that exempts any person or persons, natural or artificial, from its provisions.

If the person engaging, or proposing to engage, in interstate commerce express business, finds that to engage in express business which is state commerce will or may take some of his interstate commerce express earnings to pay the license taxes and fees of the state commerce business, he has only to refrain from the latter business to avoid incurring such exaction from such earnings. It is undeniable that taxes on property employed in interstate commerce business do not constitute a regulation of such commerce (Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co., and Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty-Gen. of Massachusetts, supra, and Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 85 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595); and this must be true notwithstanding that the payment of such taxes cannot be met from the earnings of state or local commerce. It is not sufficient to constitute a regulation of such commerce that the thing complained of affects it indirectly, incidentally and remotely. Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 102, 23 L. ed. 819, 820; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Peniston, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 5, 80, 81, 31 L. ed. 797, 791.

II. We fail to discover any uncertainty or obscurity in the statute as to the sums required by it to be paid by express companies as a state license tax, or, we may add, as a county or a city or town license tax. The obvious meaning of the act, in so far as its provisions relate to these companies, is that each company shall pay a state license tax and take out a state license, when it proposes to do business in any city or town or village having more than fifty inhabitants; the amount of such state license tax being $200 for cities of fifteen thousand, or more, inhabitants, and $100 for cities of from ten to fifteen thousand inhabitants, $75 for cities of from five to ten thousand, $50 for those of from three to five thousand, $25 for those of from one to three thousand, and $10 for towns and villages of more than fifty inhabitants. Where there are in one county several cities, or towns or villages belonging to one or more of these classes, the company must take out a separate state license for each one of them that it may intend to do business in, and pay the tax and fee for the same as stated. It of course takes out no license for any city, town or village that it does not do business in. Any county may impose on a company doing business within its limits a license tax of not more than fifty per cent of the state tax, and thus require the company to pay it not more than fifty per cent of the amount such company has to pay to the state as a license tax for doing business at any city, town or village, within the provisions of the act. If one company is doing business in, say, three places, one of which belongs to one class, another to another class, and the third to still another, the county may impose a tax on the company for each of the three places not exceeding fifty per cent of the amount of the state tax for that place. Likewise any incorporated city or town may impose on any such company doing business within its limits a municipal license tax not exceeding fifty per cent of the state license tax imposed upon it for that place by the statute. Whether or not this construction of the statute will result in rendering it impossible for express companies to carry on within our borders business that is local to the state, is a consideration for the lawmaking power, but it cannot be invoked properly to influence a construction that is contrary to the plain meaning of the statute, made more palpable still by a comparison of it with former legislation as to the same matter. Acts 1872, p. 37; 1881, p. 26; 1891, p. 8. By the legislation cited, the tax was imposed first on the agents, and afterwards changed to the companies, the tax on the companies being confined to simply a state tax payable to the state treasurer, without any license from collectors of revenue, or any county or municipal taxation under the general provisions of the license tax section of the statutes; while now the state tax is payable to the collectors of revenue, and the license is signed and delivered according to the general provisions of the ninth section of the Revenue

Law of 1893, just as in the cases of many other if not all the occupations made subject to license by that section; its county and municipal taxation features being likewise applicable to these companies just as they are to merchants, keepers of hotels, liquor dealers and banks, and others too numerous to designate. Upon most deliberate consideration we are satisfied beyond doubt that any other construction of the act on this point would be strained and inconsistent and contrary to its meaning and the manifest purpose exhibited by the statute. The amount of the tax, if not a matter solely of legislative discretion, is still not shown by this record to be prohibitory or destructive of business; and if there be one or more counties in the state in which there is not even a village of fifty inhabitants, the fact does not bring the act in conflict with any provision of our constitution, nor does it impair the uniform operation of the act throughout the state as to all persons standing in the situation which the act makes the test of taxation. The question of the population of any city, town, or village has, as the petition shows, presented no insuperable difficulty to petitioner or his counsel, nor, as is shown by the stipulation between counsel, any to the state authorities; and, when it shall be made an issue it will be one of fact, and not beyond the power of the courts to deal with successfully; and it is entirely clear, from the case before us, that the law affords a hearing as to the enforcement of the criminal features of the statute, and it would be improper to intimate any opinion as to its provisions that give resort to levy and sale of property, when no such levy has been made.

It cannot be said that the detention of the plaintiff in error is without jurisdiction, and therefore he could or should have been discharged on habeas corpus from the custody in which he was when the writ issued. Ex parte Prince, 27 Fla. 196. The plaintiff in error was properly remanded by the circuit judge for a hearing before the criminal court of records of Duval county, upon the charge. That hearing must be conducted on principles consistent with the conclusions we have reached, and particularly with an eye to the fact that our legislation has and can have no effect upon interstate commerce, but is applicable alone to state or local business. The Southern Express Company may carry on any and all business that constitutes interstate or foreign commerce, free from regulation by or under our laws; but business strictly of a state or local character cannot be exempted from our laws or put beyond our authority by its engaging at the same time in interstate or foreign commerce.

The judgment will be affirmed and the cause remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Affirmed, 164 U. S. 650, 41 L. ed. 586.

NEW JERSEY SUPREME COURT.

STATE of New Jersey; LUMBERVILLE DELAWARE BRIDGE CO., Prosecutors.,

v.

STATE BOARD OF ASSESSORS et al.

(55 N. J. L. 529.)

- *1. The Federal Constitution will not invalidate a state tax imposed upon domestic corporations generally because it incidentally affects one that, under state authority, is engaging in interstate commerce.
2. The yearly license fee imposed upon miscellaneous corporations under the Act of April 18, 1884 (Supp. Revision, p. 1016), is levied upon the right of the company to exist in corporate form, without regard to the powers that under such form it may exercise. Such a fee may be exacted by the state from which the right is derived, without reference to the nature of the business the corporation may be authorized to carry on, and is constitutional, even as against a domestic corporation created for the purpose of engaging in commerce with an adjoining state.
3. The right of corporate existence is, in its nature, indivisible, and the fee therefor must necessarily be an entirety, no matter where the property of the company is situated, or how its capital is invested or employed.

(February Term, 1898.)

CERTIORARI to review tax assessments.
Assessments affirmed.

Statement by Garrison, J.:

The following state of facts is agreed upon for the purpose of the argument of the above-stated cause:

"First. It is admitted that by the compact between New Jersey and Pennsylvania, dated May 27, 1788 (Nix. Dig. p. 864), it is declared that the river Delaware, from the northwest corner of New Jersey to the circular boundary of the state of Delaware, in the whole length and breadth thereof, is, and shall continue to be and remain, a common highway, equally free and open for the use, benefit, and advantage of the contracting parties, and that each state shall enjoy and exercise a concurring jurisdiction within and upon the water between the shores of said river.

"Second. It was admitted that the Lumberville Delaware Bridge Company was incorporated by the concurrent legislation of said states, viz.:

"By an act of the legislature of the state of Pennsylvania entitled 'An act to incorporate the Lumberville Delaware Bridge Company,' approved April 7, 1835 (Pa. Pub. Laws 1834-35, p. 114), and by an act of the legislature of the state of New Jersey entitled, 'An act to incorporate the Lumberville Delaware Bridge Company,' passed Feb. 12, 1836, N. J. Pub. Laws 1836, p. 79.

*Headnotes by GARRISON, J.

NOTE.—See, in connection with the above case the one immediately preceding it and the note appended thereto.

"Third. It is admitted that the incorporators duly organized, built, erected, and constructed a bridge across the river Delaware, from shore to shore, between said states, at or near Lumberville, in the county of Bucks, and state of Pennsylvania, and erected its tollgates on the westerly bank of said river, and have always demanded and collected all tolls thereat.

"Fourth. It is admitted that the president and treasurer of said company are residents of the state of Pennsylvania, and the secretary thereof is a resident of New Jersey, and that all meetings of said company are held at the office of said company established at Lumberville, Penn.

"Fifth. It is admitted that the prosecutors pay annually to the authorities of New Jersey taxes on one half of said bridge, including the abutments and piers to the center of the river upon the New Jersey side, as part of the structure, without reference to the extent of travel upon it, or the profits derived therefrom, and that the prosecutors pay annually to the authorities of the state of Pennsylvania one half of the taxes assessed under and by virtue of the acts of the legislature of said state, passed June 7, 1879, and June 1, 1889.

"Sixth. It is admitted that the prosecutors have paid to the state of New Jersey, under protest, all taxes assessed against it under and by virtue of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the imposition of state taxes upon certain corporations, and for the collection thereof,' approved April 18, 1884,' and the several supplements thereto.

"Seventh. It is admitted that the state of Pennsylvania has never concurred in the passage of the last-mentioned act.

"Eighth. It is agreed that either party may refer to all laws, agreements, documents, or papers made or passed by either state in reference thereto.

The following are the reasons relied upon:

"First. Because the said tax or impost is tax upon interstate commerce, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

"Second. Because the said Lumberville Delaware Bridge Company is not incorporated under the laws of the state of New Jersey, within the meaning of the terms of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the imposition of state taxes upon certain corporations, and for the collection thereof,' approved April 18, 1884, and the several supplements thereto, passed by the legislature of the state of New Jersey.

"Third. Because, upon the principles of public law, it is clear that the power of erecting a bridge, and taking tolls thereon, over a navigable river which forms the coterminous boundary between two states, can only be conferred by the concurrent legislation of both states; and such charters are subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal by like concurrent legislation only.

"Fourth. Because the legislature of the state of New Jersey cannot impose a tax by way of a license fee upon a foreign corporation, or its franchises, carrying on its business, or any part thereof, without the jurisdiction of the state of New Jersey.

"Fifth. Because the assessment was made upon an erroneous principle; that is to say, it was measured by the amount of its capital stock issued by the laws of the state of Pennsylvania, as well as the amount thereof issued by virtue of the laws of the state of New Jersey, whereas it should have been measured by one half of the total amount of its capital stock issued and outstanding.

"Sixth. Because the Act of April 18, 1884, and the supplements, do not authorize the imposition of any tax, by way of license fee or otherwise, upon foreign corporations. It only applies to domestic corporations.

"Seventh. Because the said corporation is a foreign corporation, and demands and receives all tolls at its gates erected and maintained within the jurisdiction of the state of Pennsylvania.

"Eighth. Because the title of the Act of April 18, 1884, and supplements, does not embrace foreign corporations, and if it did the same would be void for duplicity.

"Ninth. Because the said assessments are, in divers and other respects, uncertain, erroneous, and illegal, and ought to be set aside and reversed."

Argued before Van Syckel and Garrison, JJ.

Mr. W. S. Gummere for prosecutors.

Mr. William Y. Johnson, for defendants:

The act passed by the state of New York is entitled: "An act to provide for raising taxes for the use of the state upon certain corporations, joint-stock companies and associations."

Pub. Laws 1880, 768; Pub. Laws 1881, 482.

This act so far as it relates to foreign corporations simply imposes a tax upon the business of such corporations done within that state. So far as the act imposes a tax upon the corporate franchises, its operation is confined to domestic corporations.

People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 828.

Such a tax upon foreign corporations the legislature has authority to impose and the mode prescribed is constitutional.

People v. Equitable Trust Co. of New London, 96 N. Y. 887.

The Lumberville Bridge Company is a corporation incorporated under the laws of the state of New Jersey within the meaning of the taxing act, and liable to the tax imposed.

State v. Metz, 82 N. J. L. 199, 200; Phillipsburgh Bank v. Lackawanna R. Co. 27 N. J. L. 207; McGregor v. Erie R. Co. 85 N. J. L. 118; Sprague v. Hartford, P. & F. R. Co. 5 R. Co.* 27 N. J. Eq. 649.

The compact between New Jersey and Pennsylvania has never been construed as a limitation upon the right of each state to tax the property of all bridge companies.

Every state has within its own limits exclusive sovereignty over all matters touching the title to real and personal property, the mode of its transfer, the rights of persons and artificial bodies, in short everything pertaining to the functions of government, subject only to its obligation to the general government.

Black v. Delaware & R. Canal Co. 24 N. J. Eq. 466; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 88 U. S. 18 Pet. 519-588, 10 L. ed. 274, 307; Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. Com. Rep. 411.

The agreement of 1783 provides that each state shall enjoy and exercise a concurrent jurisdiction within and upon the water, and not upon the dry land, between the shore of said river.

State v. Davis, 25 N. J. L. 887.

In Re Devoe Mfg. Co., 106 U. S. 418, 27 L. ed. 767, Justice Blatchford said: "Whether it affects the boundary line itself, or only amounts to a concession of extraterritorial jurisdiction to the one state and the other, beyond the territorial boundary, is not necessary to be decided in the present case."

Generally a corporation may, through its agents, extend its operation into other states, and thus, metaphorically speaking, go there, but it never travels and its franchises exist only at the place of its domicile and residence.

Plempson v. Bigelow, 98 N. Y. 593.

But the corporation, so far as it exists under our laws could draw to itself such part of its peculiar corporate entity as would accomplish the object of the charter here, and it would be liable to pay one half the tax imposed.

Com.* 66 Pa. 73, 5 Am. Rep. 844.

The tax imposed by the act is a franchise tax exacted from the company as the price of the right and privilege which is received from the state of being a corporation, and is not levied upon the corporate property or business.

Either state may pass acts imposing taxes upon such corporations without obtaining the assent of the other notwithstanding the agreement of 1783.

Each state must have the right to tax the entity of bifold corporations existing within its own territory, notwithstanding such corporations act as one corporation by reason of their dual organization.

The Lumberville Delaware Bridge Company was created for the purpose of carrying on commerce between said states; but the tax imposed is a franchise tax on the corporate entity conferred by the act of New Jersey, and is not a tax upon the right to carry on business at all.

Garrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Lumberville Delaware Bridge Company, a corporation created in 1836 by the legislature of this state, resists the payment of the license fee imposed under the fourth section of "An act to provide for the imposition of state taxes upon certain corporations, and for the collection thereof." Pub. Laws 1884, p. 233.

The pertinent provision of this section is in these words: "All other corporations incorporated under the laws of this state, and not hereinbefore provided for, shall pay a yearly license fee or tax of one tenth of one per cent on the amount of the capital stock of such corporations."

The first ground of opposition is that the imposition of this tax upon the prosecutor is a burden upon, and hence a regulation of, commerce between the states, in violation of the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal congress.

It is not questioned that the power to regulate commerce between the states has been, by the constitution of the United States, committed exclusively to congress; and it is furthermore established that the omission of congress to legislate with reference to the matter thus committed to it implies, not that the states may legislate with respect thereto, but that commerce shall be free from all statutory regulations until congress see fit to impose them. Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, and cases there cited.

It is also established law that no state has the right to lay any impost upon interstate commerce, in any form, whether by way of duties upon the subject of transportation, or by way of license fee imposed upon the occupation or business of carrying it on.

These doctrines, while they secure to congress the exclusive right to make laws having for their object the control of commerce among the states, and the regulation of any and all of the incidents of that commerce, do not invalidate state laws, otherwise legitimate, merely because they casually affect interstate commerce. In Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. supra, Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking of the exclusive right of congress to make express regulations for interstate commerce, says: "It is also an established principle, as already indicated, that the only way in which commerce between the states can be legitimately affected by state laws is when, by virtue of its police power, and its jurisdiction over persons and property within its limits, a state provides for the security of the lives, limbs, health, and comfort of persons and the protection of property; or when it does those things which may otherwise incidentally affect commerce, such as the establishment and regulation of highways, canals, railroads, wharves, ferries and other commercial facilities . . . the imposition of taxes upon persons residing within the state or belonging to its population. . . . But in making such internal regulations . . . no discrimination can be made, . . . adversely to the persons or property of other states; and no regulation can be made directly affecting interstate commerce."

And in Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 648, 32 L. ed. 814, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 184, the same judge again says: "We may here repeat, what we have so often said before, that this exemption of interstate and foreign commerce from state regulation does not prevent the state from taxing the property of those engaged in such commerce located within the state as the property of other citizens is taxed, nor from regulating matters of local concern which may incidentally affect commerce, such as wharfage, pilotage, and the like."

Numerous decisions illustrate the application of these principles by the highest federal court, and serve to elucidate their meaning. The cases in which state legislation has been set aside as an unwarrantable regulation of commerce fall naturally into the following groups:

(1) Those in which the state law has made discriminations adversely to other states. Guy v. Baltimore, 100 U. S. 434, 25 L. ed. 743; Webster v. Virginia, 108 U. S. 344, 26 L. ed. 565; Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 448, 29 L. ed. 691; Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 129, 32 L. ed. 868, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 241; Stoutenburgh v. Hennick, 129 U. S. 141, 32 L. ed. 637.

(2) Those in which the impost was upon the subject of transportation. State Freight Tax Cases, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232, 21 L. ed. 146; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527; Cook v. Pennsylvania, 97 U. S. 566, 24 L. ed. 1015; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257; Lyng v. Michigan, 135 U. S. 161, 34 L. ed. 150, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 143.

(3) Those in which the state tax was, in effect, a tax upon the business engaged in interstate commerce, because imposed upon its agencies (Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist., 120 U. S. 439, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45; McCall v. California, 186 U. S. 104, 34 L. ed. 892; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 34 L. ed. 894, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 178; Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649), its earnings (Fargo v. Stevens, 121 U. S. 230, 30 L. ed. 888, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 51; Philadelphia & S. Mail SS. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 826, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308), its methods (Moran v. New Orleans, 112 U. S. 69, 28 L. ed. 653; Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co., 117 U. S. 34, 29 L. ed. 785), or directly upon its business. Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co., 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 26 L. ed. 1067; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557, 30 L. ed. 244, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 81; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 347, 30 L. ed. 1187, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 306; Ratterman v. Western U. Teleg. Co., 127 U. S. 411, 32 L. ed. 229, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 59; Loup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 811, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 134.

Upon the other hand, state legislation has been upheld, notwithstanding commerce was incidentally affected thereby, in respect to the licensing of ferries (Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 865, 27 L. ed. 419; Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada, 143 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807), the imposition of fees for wharfage (Keokuk N. L. Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80, 24 L. ed. 877; Northwestern U. Packet Co. v. St. Louis, 100 U. S. 423, 25 L. ed. 690; Cincinnati, P. R. & P. Packet Co. v. Catelettsburg Trustees, 105 U. S. 563, 26 L. ed. 1171; Parkersburg & O. R. Transp. Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 698, 27 L. ed. 587; Ouachita & M. R. Packet Co. v.

Aiken, 121 U. S. 444, 30 L. ed. 977, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 879), the taxation of property, including capital stock (Cos v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty. Gen. of Massachusetts, 125 U. S. 530, 31 L. ed. 792; Pullman's Police Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595), the taxing of franchises or corporate privileges derived from the state; (Delaware Railroad Tax Case, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 206, 21 L. ed. 888; Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada, 143 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807; Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57), and in a recent case a state tax upon a general occupation was sustained notwithstanding the special business taxed consisted in negotiating sales with non-resident merchants. Ficklen v. Shelby County Taxing Dist., 145 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 601, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 72.

In the case of Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York this language is used: "The right and privilege, or the franchise, as it may be termed, of being a corporation, is of great value to its members, and is considered as property separate and distinct from the property which the corporation itself may acquire. According to the law of most states this franchise or privilege of being a corporation is deemed personal property and is subject to separate taxation."

The extent of the tax is a matter purely of state regulation, and any interference with it is beyond the jurisdiction of this court. The objection that it operates as a direct interference with interstate commerce we do not think tenable. The tax is not levied upon articles imported, nor is there any impediment to their importation." The franchise here referred to as property subject to the taxing power is likewise the subject of remark in the case of Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co., 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 206, 21 L. ed. 888 (the Delaware Railroad Tax Case): "The exercise of the authority which every state possesses, to tax its corporations, and all their property, real and personal, and their franchises, and to graduate the tax upon the corporations according to their business, or income, or by the value of their property, when this is not done by discriminating against rights held in other states, and the tax is not on imports, exports, or tonnage, or transportation to other states, cannot be regarded as conflicting with any constitutional power of congress." The tax imposed by the act in question affects commerce among the states, and impedes the transit of persons and property from one state to another, just in the same way, and in no other, that taxation of any kind necessarily increases the expenses attendant upon the use or possession of the thing taxed. That taxation produces this result, of itself, constitutes no objection to its constitutionality. As was very justly observed in this court in a recent case (State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 284, 21 L. ed. 164), "every tax upon personal property, or upon occupations, business, or franchises, affects, more or less, the subjects and the operations of commerce. Yet it is not everything that affects commerce that amounts to a regulation of it, within the meaning of the constitution." This language is quoted, not because the word "franchise" is used in the precise sense to be presently ascribed to it, but for the purpose of showing that a payment for a state privilege may incidentally affect commerce without being, in a constitutional sense, a regulation of it.

The franchise that is taxed as property is the privilege enjoyed by a corporation of exercising certain powers derived from the state, whereas the franchise with which we have to do is the right to exist in corporate form, without reference to the powers that, under such form, the company may exercise. This distinction, although formulated by Mr. Justice Field in Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 148 U. S. 805, 86 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 37, was not strictly adhered to in his subsequent expressions, probably because there was nothing in that case to call for a nice use of terms. In this state we tax each of these so-called franchises. The former, as in the case of the right to own and operate a railroad, is taxed as property having a true value, which it is the duty of the state board to ascertain for the purposes of constitutional assessment. On the other hand, the naked right of existing in corporate form is taxed, as in the case before us, not at its true value, as it would have to be if it were property, but at a sum arbitrarily imposed by the legislature as an annual fee, the amount of which is to be computed by reference to the capital of the company as a criterion. It is, in short, a poll tax levied upon domestic corporations for the right to be. Such a tax is not upon property or assets, and does not in any way concern the nature of the business the company may be authorized to carry on. If the business chance to be one of commercial intercourse with other states, the burden incidental to corporate existence does not, under the federal decisions just cited, constitute a regulation of that commerce.

Standard Underground Cable Co. v. Atty-Gen., 46 N. J. Eq. 270, is not in point. It held merely that the manufacture of an instrument of commerce was not itself commerce.

In Honduras Commercial Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 54 N. J. L. 278, the license fee under the Act of 1884 was held to be constitutionally imposed upon a corporation created by certificate in 1887 for the purpose of engaging in foreign commerce. That decision is an authority for this. The case of a corporation created by special act prior to 1884 for the express purpose of engaging in interstate commerce does not come under any different rule. The taxing act is general, and the yearly fee provided by it falls as an incidental burden upon miscellaneous corporations, without regard to the businesses in which they may be severally engaged. Such a tax is not, in my opinion, open to any constitutional objection.

This determination, and the ground upon which it rests, are a sufficient answer to the 2d, 3d, 4th, 6th, 7th, and 8th reasons filed by the prosecutor, all of which proceed upon the notion that the tax is imposed upon something besides the right of the domestic corporation to exist as such.

There remains for consideration the fifth reason, viz., that, if the imposition of the tax be legal, yet it is computed upon erroneous principles. The contention in this respect is that inasmuch as the erection of the bridge was a joint enterprise, requiring the concurrent legislation of two states, the capital to be taken as the criterion of the license fee should be one half of the capital the domestic corporation was authorized to have. This argument was, in all probability, suggested by the decision of this court in State v. Mets, 82 N. J. L. 199. That case has, however, no application. The tax there considered was imposed directly upon the capital and surplus which, so the court held, was intended by the legislature to embrace one-half of an enterprise resting in dual legislation. Since the last amendments of the constitution, such a tax is a legal impossibility, and the construction placed by the court upon the legislative intent with respect to the amount of property to be embraced in the tax is of no aid in the present case, where the tax is not upon capital or property put to the common use of a domestic and a foreign organization, but is the price the domestic company must pay for the right of corporate life. Such a right is, in its nature, indivisible, and the fee therefor must necessarily be an entirety. In computing such a fee the board of assessors has no discretion. The legislative mandate is plain, and cannot be departed from by the assessors, nor modified by the courts. In State v. State Board of Assessors, 47 N. J. L. 36, the business in which the capital of the corporation was invested was considered by this court for the purpose of determining whether it was a "manufacturing company," within the meaning of the statute. And in Press Printing Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 51 N. J. L. 75, the court, finding that the corporation was in one sense, and as to a distinct part of its capital, a manufacturing company, adopted as the criterion for the ascertainment of the amount of the tax which, under the Act of 1881 (Supp. Revision, p. 602), the court was required to impose, the capital of the corporation not within the exemption. In the present case no such questions arise. The tax, therefore, was rightfully computed at one tenth of 1 per cent of the whole capital stock of the prosecutor, and is, in that shape, affirmed.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT,

D. H. CHAMBERLAIN, Receiver of the New York & Charleston Warehouse &
Steam Navigation Co. et al., Appts.,

1. Land is taken by purchase and not by condemnation when, in pursuance of an agreement with the owner, a decree is obtained for payment to him and denying the alleged rights of other persons who have given notice not to pay him.

2. A deed by a railroad company of land purchased by it in fee simple for a right of way is not void until so declared in proceedings by the state, although the company had abandoned its purpose of using the land for a railroad.

NOTE.—Validity of sale of real estate by railroad corporation.

It seems that the validity of sales of real estate by a railroad company cannot be questioned by any one except the state, where the railroad company has obtained a conveyance of the land from the former owner; but there are not many decisions directly on the question. These sustain the doctrine in CHAMBERLAIN V. NORTH EASTERN R. CO.

So under the charter of the Mohawk & Hudson Railroad Company authorizing the purchase of real estate necessary for the construction and operation of its railroad, land purchased will be presumed to have been acquired for this purpose, and under a conveyance in fee, where such lands are no longer necessary for the purposes of the corporation, it had the right to sell the same. Yates v. Van De Bogert, 66 N. Y. 527.

And under Ohio Stat. (Starr & C. 373), providing that a railroad company may acquire by purchase or gift any land in the vicinity of said road so far as may be deemed convenient or necessary by said company to secure the right of way, and the same to hold or convey, if the company abused its power but paid for the land and sold and conveyed the same away, the title became indefeasible, and the vendor is estopped by his deed, and there is no provision of law for the land escheating. Walsh v. Barton, 24 Ohio St. 28.

And in Land v. Coffman, 50 Mo. 243, under a statute providing that "a railroad company may hold, use, possess, and enjoy the fee simple or other title in and to any real estate, and may sell and dispose of the same," it was held that no one but the state could question a conveyance made by a trustee of the road.

But a sale and conveyance of lands by a railroad corporation to pay an ordinary debt is void, where the grantee knew that under the statute authorizing a sale of the lands the proceeds could only be applied in payment of mortgage bonds. Standifer v. Swann, 73 Ala. 85.

A railroad company obtaining a right of way by condemnation cannot convey to another road the right also to use such right of way. Blakeley v. Chicago, K. & N. R. Co. 34 Neb. 284; Platt v. Pennsylvania Co. 43 Ohio St. 228; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Allen, 71 Tex. 373.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Charleston County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate, which action failed because of the alleged defect in plaintiff's title. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Smythe & Lee and Mitchell & Smith for appellants.

Messrs. Fitzsimons & Moffett, for respondent:

There is no evidence of title in the South Carolina Railroad Company, and even if the land was condemned the condemnation proceedings did not vest a fee simple or transmissible title in the railroad.

The very act defining the quality of the estate declares the railroad company a trustee and defines the trust, i. e., the land could only be taken and used for "the purpose of constructing and operating a railroad between Cincinnati and Charleston," and the cetus quo trust are of the people of the state, for whose

And a railroad company cannot convey to a city for a street land where it has condemned an easement only for railroad use. Heard v. Brooklyn, 60 N. Y. 242; Strong v. Brooklyn, 68 N. Y. 1.

But it was held in People v. Eel River & R. R. Co. 98 Cal. 666, that it is not ultra vires for a railroad corporation to dedicate a portion of its land as a highway for public use, and this may be done without a formal resolution being entered on its records. The question in this case was whether a road had been dedicated where the land had been bought by the company for that purpose.

And in East Alabama R. Co. v. Doe, 114 U. S. 240, 29 L. ed. 135, and Coe v. Columbus, P. & L. R. Co. 19 Ohio St. 372, 75 Am. Dec. 513, it was stated that a railroad corporation could not make a voluntary conveyance of the right of way severed from its franchise, but this was not the question involved.

This case is quite similar to cases of transfer on foreclosure and reorganization of railroad companies. It is evident that as no diversion of the property from railroad uses is made by such transfers they are not within the reason of the rule that would deny the right of a railroad company to convey the land.

But in Harrison v. Lexington & F. R. Co., 9 B. Mon. 470, it was held that a transfer by a railroad company under legislative authority of its chartered privileges passes all rights appertaining to the company and a grant of right of way to the former providing that "if said road should hereinafter be abandoned said ground to be reverted to me or my heirs again" does not work a forfeiture.

And in Crolley v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 30 Minn. 541, it was stated that in respect to conveyances to or by a corporation that no one whose interests are not affected can call in question the capacity of the corporation either to convey or receive and hold the property, but in that case a statute authorized the company which built the road to acquire by purchase the right of way condemned by another company.

In this note cases of sales under mortgage foreclosures, land grants, and execution have not been included.

The judicial sale of property necessary to the exercise of a franchise as well as the sale of the franchise is touched upon in a note to Brady v. Johnson (Md.) 20 L. R. A. 737.

benefit alone the private property of a citizen could constitutionally be taken and his title vested, against his will, in a private corporation. For the right of condemnation is conceded to rest solely upon the theory of eminent domain.

Whatever estate may in terms be conferred upon the trustee, it will be cut down or enlarged to suit the purposes of the trust.

Blount v. Walker, 81 S. C. 13; Bratton v. Massey, 15 S. C. 277; Fuller v. Misroon, 35 S. C. 814.

When the purposes of the trust are accomplished, and the land no longer needed or used for railroad purposes, then the estate ceases, or in the language of the decisions, "is cut down to make it commensurate with the trust imposed."

In this case the donor of the trust (the legislature), could not constitutionally confer any greater or higher interest than was commensurate with the trust imposed. That is it could only condemn such an estate in the land as was necessary for the public purpose of a railroad. If the fee simple in the act meant more than this the act would of course be unconstitutional.

Malin* the fee-simple title would still be in Toomer, and would pass by his conveyance subject only to the "easement" of the South Carolina Railroad Company.

But the evidence of abandonment is complete and appellants so far from acquiring the fee-simple title by their conveyance from the railroad company as alleged in their complaint did not and could not even acquire the easement.

McGowan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for the recovery of possession of one and one fourth acres of real estate, being part of a strip of marsh land upon the bank of a navigable stream, with its eastern boundary on Cooper river, called, at that point, "Town Creek," and constituting part of the wharf front of the city of Charleston. The complainant, among other things, stated "that on and before April 8, 1891, the New York & Charleston Warehouse & Steam Navigation Company was lawfully seised, as owner in fee simple, of all that parcel of marsh land situate within the corporation limits of the city of Charleston, on the west side of Cooper river or Town creek, containing forty-three acres, more or less, bounded," etc., "said piece or parcel of land being commonly known as the 'Cleland Grant,' and that the said D. H. Chamberlain was in possession of the said parcel of land, holding the same for and on account of, and as the property of, the said New York & Charleston Warehouse & Steam Navigation Company, as receiver," etc., "that, the plaintiffs being so seised and possessed, the defendant, on the said April 8, 1891, unlawfully entered upon part of the said premises, to wit, upon all that portion containing about one and one quarter (1 $\frac{1}{4}$ ) acres, being of irregular shape, bounded," etc., "and on the west and south by Vardell's creek; and that it is still unlawfully in possession, withholding the possession from the plaintiffs, to their damage one hundred dollars." And they pray judgment for the possession. The defendant corporation answered, alleging "that it is in the possession of the tract of land therein described, and is lawfully seised and possessed of the same, as owner in fee simple thereof; and defendant denies that plaintiffs, or either of them, are now, or were at the commencement of this action, owners or owner, as alleged, of the said premises, or any part thereof, and denies that the plaintiffs, or either of them, are now, or were at the commencement of this action, entitled to the possession of the said premises, or any part thereof. On the contrary, the defendant avers that, long before the commencement of this action, this defendant became and was lawfully seised in fee of the said tract of land, with the appurtenances, and entitled unto and possessed of the same, in its sole and absolute right, and from them, at all times, down to the commencement of this action, has continued to be, and still continues to be, so seised in fee of every part and parcel thereof, and entitled unto and possessed of the same in its sole, absolute right," etc. And for a further defense the defendant interposes the statute of limitations, etc.

The cause came on to be tried before his honor, Judge Fraser, and a jury. To support the allegations of the complaint the plaintiffs offered their testimony, which consisted largely of parts of records and copies of deeds of conveyance, and, of course, cannot be set out at length here. But, as we suppose that a condensed outline of the most important parts proved may serve at least to make intelligible the points to be made and decided, we make the following statement: First. In June, 1785, a grant covering the forty-three acres of marsh in contention here was made to William Cleland, and is, throughout the case, called the "Cleland Grant." Second. Cleland conveyed the said forty-three acres of marsh to other persons, and the title passed down regularly until it rested in one Dr. Antony V. Toomer.

Third. Some time prior to 1856, it seems that the South Carolina Railroad Company desired to extend their road down to deep water, and, believing that the aforesaid forty-three acres of marsh was necessary for that purpose, they entered into an agreement with Dr. Toomer to purchase the same for $10,000 in cash; that being the price asked for the whole of the marsh, and the fee simple title thereto. But certain other persons, who need not be named, claimed to have an interest in the marsh covered by the Cleland grant; and the railroad company had to file a bill of interpleader, calling in those persons to come in and ascertain the rights of the different parties, and also to enable the company to effect their purpose of purchase. Litigation followed, but it was finally decided that Toomer was the owner of the land; and the court, in that case, "ordered that the master do deliver to the said A. V. Toomer his bond taken by the said master, for the fund paid into court in this case," etc. Fourth. It was further shown that afterwards large judgments and executions were issued from the United States court against the South Carolina Railroad Company, and that, under and by authority of these judgments and executions, Absalom Blythe, Esq., United States marshal at the time, levied and sold the said marsh lands covered by the Cleland grant, as the property of the South Carolina Railroad Company, and on July 5, 1882, conveyed the same to John H. Barnes and others named, who, in time, conveyed the same to the South Carolina Railroad Company. Fifth. On December 21, 1885, the new South Carolina Railroad Company conveyed the said marsh lands to the New York & Charleston Warehouse & Steam Navigation Company, the plaintiffs, who brought this action.

At the conclusion of the plaintiffs' testimony, the defendants moved for a nonsuit, which was granted by the presiding judge, upon the following grounds: "(1) I think that there is certainly evidence of an execution and levy on the land sued for, and under which the United States marshal sold, to go to the jury, and it is not necessary for me to say whether I think it sufficient. (2) Under the construction given by the supreme court to the Act of 1874, in reference to the granting of lands on navigable streams, I am not able to hold that the grant under which plaintiffs claim title can in this case be held to be void, under the testimony before me. (3) The most serious question in this case, and it is one of great importance, is, whether the South Carolina Railroad Company, under which the defendants [plaintiffs] claim, ever had any title for other than railroad purposes, and which it could convey, or which could be conveyed either by the receiver of the company acting as special master or by the marshal, under an execution against the company to another person, for any other than the railroad purposes of the South Carolina Railroad Company. While I am inclined to hold that the company could make no higher title under a voluntary deed, even where a full price is paid, than it could take under proceedings for condemnation of the land for its purpose as easement only, I think that in this case the company, and those who hold under it, should be held to the proceedings in the court under which this land was obtained, construed as proceedings for condemnation. The constitution did not permit the legislature, in the exercise of eminent domain, to take more land than was necessary for the purposes of the railroad, and when these purposes are accomplished the land should revert to the original owners. This I take to be the true meaning of the act under which the company derived its title. In the deed of conveyance to the New York, etc., Steam Navigation Company, it is recited that the land is no longer needed for the purposes of the railroad. I hold that there was nothing which the railroad company could convey to a grantee who does not appear to have any connection with the railroad company. I also hold that no formal, technical proceedings to declare a forfeiture are necessary, and the conveyance to the navigation company is simply void, and may be treated as such," etc.

We agree with the circuit judge that it will not be necessary to consider any of the points made, except the one stated above, upon which the nonsuit was granted. In Waterman on the Law of Corporations (vol. 1, p. 627, § 164), the rule of law as to the right of corporations to purchase property is stated as follows, viz.: "Among the powers or capacities incident to the corporations at common law, without any special mention of such power in the charter, is that of taking, holding, and transmitting in succession, and alienating property, real and personal, and contracting obligations, in the same manner as an individual. The only legal checks to the acquisition of lands by corporations consist in those special restrictions contained in the acts by which they are incorporated, and which usually confine the capacity to purchase real estate to specified and necessary objects, and in the force to be given to the exception of corporations out of the statute of wills." The same doctrine is stated in Angell & Ames on Corporations (sec. 187), and other elementary writers, as follows: "Corporations aggregate have at common law an incidental right to alien or dispose of their lands and chattels, unless specially restrained by their charter or by statute. Independent of positive law, all corporations have the absolute jus disponendi, neither limited as to objects, nor circumscribed as to quantity." The rule in this state is stated in Ex parte Greenville Academies Trustees, 7 Rich. Eq. 482, as follows: "All corporations, if not disabled by statute, have, by law, a general right of alienating their property; and their consequent power of appointing trustees, or any disposition made by them, is coextensive with this right," etc. As we understand it, at the time the railroad company acquired the land in question for the purpose indicated, neither the constitution nor any law of the state prohibited the company from acquiring the fee simple title to land, either by condemnation or simple purchase, paying, of course, its full value. Indeed, the right to condemn seems only to have been given "in the absence of any contract or contracts in relation to lands," etc. See the charter of the company, and Act 1835, §§ 82 and 86, 8 Stat. at L. 415. From the numerous records and copies of deeds introduced in evidence, it is difficult to determine the mixed question of law and fact,—whether the railroad company acquired the land covered by the Cleland grant by enforced condemnation, under the bill filed by them, or by simple purchase from Toomer for the use of the road. But we incline to think that the company acquired whatever interest they had by purchase from Toomer, and that the interpleader proceedings, as to the other defendants, were resorted to merely as the means of settling a disputed title, and not, in fact, to condemn the land from an unwilling party. In the decree of the court, no reference was made to the condemnation proceedings. The bill sets forth that the company had purchased the land from Toomer for the full price of $10,000; that the company was ready to pay the money to Toomer, and he was ready to receive it, but the other defendants had given notice not to pay. And the bill of the company prays that they may have leave to pay the money into court. The decree then goes on to discuss the title as between the parties, which it adjudges to be in Toomer,—the party with whom the company had contracted,—and to order the money previously paid into court to be paid to him, which was done. It seems to us that this was clearly a purchase of the land, and payment of the purchase money.

But assuming that the railroad company originally acquired the fee simple title by the payment of the purchase money, under the decree of the court, it is still earnestly urged by the defendant corporation that, as soon as the railroad company abandoned the purpose of extending their road down to the deep water, the title of the land so purchased, and for which they had paid $10,000, was instantly rendered void; that the land reverted to the original owner; that there was nothing which the company could convey to a grantee who does not appear to have any connection with the railroad company; and that really no formal, technical proceeding to declare a forfeiture was necessary, and therefore, the plaintiffs having no title, it was proper to grant the nonsuit. Was this error? It must be admitted that the authorities upon the subject are in some confusion; but keeping in mind that the railroad company originally acquired, not merely an easement, but the fee simple title, by purchasing the whole land for full value, we cannot clearly see upon what principle we may declare the company divested of their title, which is "simply void," and that the land had reverted to its former owner. Reverted to whom? Certainly not to the representatives of Toomer, who sold the fee simple title for full value, leaving no interest of any kind whatever remaining. There could be no reverter to the original owner, for there was no reversionary interest, and none is claimed. In that case, where would be the title, which must vest in some one? It is stated in Waterman on Corporations (vol. 1, p. 632) as follows: "So where a purchase of real estate has been lawfully made by a corporation, the purchase does not cease to be legal, or the corporation cease to have a right to hold or convey the property thus acquired, merely because the object which induced the purchase has been accomplished, or no longer affords an inducement to retain it. Corporations, although limited in their own duration of life, may purchase and hold and convey, and they may sell such real estate whenever they find it no longer necessary." See the notes referred to, and especially the case of Old Colony R. Corp. v. Evans, 6 Gray, 25, 68 Am. Dec. 294. Restrictions imposed by the charter of a corporation upon the amount of the property it may hold cannot be taken advantage of collaterally by private persons, but only in a direct proceeding by the state which created it. Jones v. Habersham, 107 U. S. 188, 27 L. ed. 406. In the American & English Encyclopedia of Law (vol. 4, p. 233), the rule is thus laid down: "In many of the states, statutes prohibit or limit foreign corporations from acquiring real estate. Under these or similar statutes, where a corporation is incompetent to take title to real estate, a conveyance to it is not void, but only voidable. The sovereign alone can object. It is valid until assailed in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose."

The judgment of this court is that the nonsuit granted below be set aside, and the case remanded to the Circuit Court for a new trial. McIver, Ch. J., and Pope, J., concur in the result.

Per Curiam:

The first of these cases was a bill in chancery, exhibited by James P. Fletcher in the circuit court of Vermillion county, praying that an act of the general assembly entitled "An act to apportion the state of Illinois into senatorial districts, and to repeal certain acts therein named," approved June 15, 1893, be declared unconstitutional and void, and that a writ of injunction issue to Walter C. Tuttle, county clerk of Vermillion county, restraining him from issuing, causing to be posted, notices of election calling an election for members of the house of representatives for the eighteenth senatorial district; that the injunction be made perpetual; and also a general prayer for relief. Tuttle, the county clerk, was the only party named as defendant.

The complainant, by his bill, professed to prosecute his action for himself, as well as for all the people of the state of Illinois. The averments of his bill are, in substance, that he is, and for more than thirty-nine years has been, a citizen of the county of Vermillion, and is a taxpayer and legal voter in that county; that, under the constitution of the state, he is entitled to equal representation in the general assembly of the state with each and every citizen thereof, so far as such equality of representation can be secured by an apportionment of the senatorial districts of the state, for the election of senators and members of the house of representatives in the general assembly among the several counties in the state; that, by reason of the matters thereafter recited, the petitioner's right of equal or proportionate representation in the general assembly of the state, as well as the like rights of every other citizen of the state, as provided by the constitution, have been infringed, violated, and in a large part destroyed, unless, through the intervention of the court, as a court of equity, the wrongs complained of shall be prevented. The bill then alleges that the population of the state, as ascertained by the federal census of 1890, was 3,826,351, and an exhibit is appended to the bill of the census bulletin, showing the population of the state by counties, and of the city of Chicago by wards, according to the census of 1890; that, for the purpose of apportioning the state into senatorial districts, it became and was the duty of the general assembly to divide the population of the state, as ascertained by the federal census, by the number of fifty-one, the quotient thereby produced to be the ratio of representation in the state; that it was then and there the duty of the general assembly to divide the state into fifty-one senatorial districts, such districts to be formed of contiguous and compact territory, bounded by county lines, such districts to contain, as nearly as practicable, an equal number of inhabitants; that, when any county contained a population exceeding two full ratios, it was entitled to be divided into senatorial districts equal in number to the number of full senatorial ratios of inhabitants contained in the county, as shown by the census; that the senatorial ratio thus formed was 75,026; that the population of the County of Cook was 1,191,922; that the general assembly, in and by the above-mentioned act, gave and apportioned the county of Cook fifteen senatorial districts, and to the residue of the state thirty-six. The bill then specifies and points out a large number of the senatorial districts created by the Act, both in the county of Cook and elsewhere in the state, which, as it alleges, are not formed of contiguous and compact territory as required by the constitution, among them being the eighteenth senatorial district, composed of the counties of Vermillion and Ford. It also alleges that the act did not apportion the state into senatorial districts containing, as nearly as practicable, an equal number of inhabitants; but, on the contrary, that many of the districts contain numbers of inhabitants far in excess of the senatorial ratio, and greatly and unnecessarily unequal, when compared with other districts created by the act; and that many of the districts contain numbers of inhabitants greatly below the senatorial ratio, and grossly and unnecessarily unequal, when compared with other districts; and a large number of districts are specified and pointed out, in which it is alleged such gross and unnecessary inequality of population exists. It is therefore alleged that by reason of the unnecessary and gross inequalities of population among the several districts, and also by reason of the failure to form the several districts of the contiguous and compact territory, the Apportionment Act of 1893 is unconstitutional and void. The complainant further alleges that he is a candidate for election as a member of the house of representatives, which representatives are to be chosen at a general election to be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1894; that he has already been chosen for such candidacy by the voters of his party in Vermillion county, at the primaries already held in that county; that, as such candidate, he has a special personal interest in the question at issue in this case, and is entitled to prosecute this suit, to the end that he may be voted for in the district and throughout the district, of which Vermillion county legally forms a part, and that the legal voters of all the district may have an opportunity to vote for him, and if chosen by a plurality of the votes cast at such election, then he may be duly declared elected as a member of the house of representatives for such district; that the entire people of the state are interested in the question, to the end that the next general assembly of the state to be chosen may be chosen from districts legally formed, and that its acts may not be questioned by reason of the invalidity of the act of apportionment, and that the people may enjoy the right of representation, as provided by the constitution. The petitioner further alleges that under the present system of holding elections, as provided for by the laws of this state, the holding of an election throughout the county of Vermillion necessitates a large expenditure of public moneys, to be paid out of the treasury of that county; that, as the apportionment act above referred to is invalid, it will entail upon the people and taxpayers of the county a large and unnecessary burden in holding elections for members of the general assembly themselves; and that the amount of public funds thus unnecessarily paid out of the county treasury will exceed $50; and that the total cost of holding the election will exceed the sum of $1,000. It is further alleged that Walter C. Tuttle is the county clerk of Vermillion county, and it is made his duty by law, at least thirty days prior to any general election, to make out and deliver to the supervisors of his county three notices for each election precinct or district in their respective townships, Vermillion county being under township organization, which notices are required to specify and gave the title of the several offices to be filled at such election, and which notices the supervisors are required to post up in three of the most public places in each election precinct in their respective townships, and such election will be held in pursuance thereof, as provided by law; that, by the law of the state, the county clerk will have charge of printing the ballots for the general election, and it is made his duty to furnish such ballots to the judges of election, and no ballots other than those thus furnished can be used at the election; that, notwithstanding the matters above set forth, said county clerk threatens and declares his intention to issue the notice of election in his county for the election of three members of the house of representatives for the eighteenth senatorial district, and to have the ballots for the election printed accordingly, so far as the same pertains to the representatives in the general assembly, by means whereof, and by reason of the premises, the legal voters of Vermillion county will be induced to and will cast their votes for members of the general assembly for a district of which Vermillion county does not legally form a part, and no vote can be cast at such election for members of the general assembly for the district of which the county does legally form a part, by means whereof the election of members of the general assembly will be invalid and of no effect; that, unless restrained by the order of the court from issuing or causing to be posted notices of election as above set forth, the county clerk will issue such notices, and cause them to be posted, and petitioner will be greatly damaged, and will be deprived of his constitutional right of becoming a candidate for member of the house of representatives in the district of which he is a resident, and of being voted for by the legal voters of that district, and also of the right of voting for candidates for the general assembly for that district; that, by reason of the matters above set forth, the people of this state will be deprived of the right of equal and proportionate representation, as provided and recognized by the constitution of the state. It is further alleged that if the Apportionment Act of 1893 is invalid, as the complainant is advised and believes, the legal voters of Vermillion county are entitled to vote for and elect a member of the state senate in the next general assembly; that the county clerk threatens to and declares it to be his intention to omit from the election notices any call or notice for the election of a member of the state senate, and to omit from the ballots which he will cause to be printed for the election in the county the name of any candidate for the office of senator, so that the legal voters of the county, including the complainant, will be deprived of the constitutional right of voting for a candidate for state senator at the November election. It is also alleged that the general assembly passed another apportionment act, which was approved May 16, 1893, which act was in all respects identical with the act before referred to, except that it omitted from the seventh senatorial district the town of Riverside, and which act the act above referred to, and approved June 15, 1893, purports to have repealed; but it is alleged that the Act of May 16, 1893, is subject to all the objections above set forth in relation to the Act of June 15, 1893, and is for the same reasons unconstitutional and void. The prayer of the bill is that, upon the hearing of the cause, both acts be declared unconstitutional and void, and held to be of no effect; and that a writ of injunction issue to Walter C. Tuttle, county clerk of Vermillion county, restraining him from issuing, or causing to be posted, notices of election calling an election for the house of representatives for the eighteenth senatorial district; and that such injunction be made perpetual; and that the court grant to the petitioner and to the people all such other and further relief as the case demands.

The defendant answered, admitting the allegations of the bill, except that he denied that the complainant's rights were infringed by the matters thus alleged; that the senatorial districts created by the act in question are not compact and contiguous; and that the act is unconstitutional and void; and also excepting that the defendant says that he cannot answer whether the districts are as nearly equal as practicable, and whether the population of some of the districts is unnecessarily greater or less than the given ratio. A replication was filed, and a hearing was had upon the bill, the admissions made by the answer, and the replication; and, at such hearing a decree was entered dismissing the bill, at the complainant's cost, for want of equity.

In the other case, of which the title is given above, W. C. Blair filed his bill in chancery, in the circuit court of Sangamon county, against William H. Hinrichsen, the secretary of state, alleging that the complainant is a resident of the county of Jefferson, and a legal voter in that county, and qualified to hold the office of member of the general assembly, and is a candidate of his party for that office in and for the forty-seventh senatorial district, as formed by the apportionment act approved March 1, 1872, consisting of the counties of Jefferson, Hamilton, and White. The bill attacks the Apportionment Act of 1893 upon substantially the same grounds alleged in the bill of James P. Fletcher, and also attacks the Apportionment Act of May 6, 1893, dividing the state into senatorial districts on similar grounds, and praying to have both the Acts of 1893 and 1893 declared unconstitutional and void. The bill alleges that the secretary of state declares that it is his intention to certify the names of candidates who are nominated in the various ways now provided by law as candidates for the general assembly, from the districts as fixed by the Apportionment Act of 1893, if that act is constitutional, but that, if it is held to be unconstitutional, he will then certify the names of candidates nominated for the senatorial districts as fixed by the Act of 1882, and that he will so act unless restrained by the court from so doing, and the complainant will be deprived of his right to have his name printed upon the tickets and voted for at the next general election of members of the general assembly; that, if the secretary of state is not enjoined from certifying the names of such candidates, a large amount of money will be expended in and about printing the tickets containing the names of the candidates from districts formed by unconstitutional and void laws; that the public money used in printing such tickets will be wholly wasted; and that the complainant is a citizen and taxpayer of the state. The bill prays that both of the Apportionment Laws of 1893 and the Apportionment Act of 1882 be each and all declared unconstitutional and void, and that of 1872 be declared in full force; and that the secretary of state be enjoined from certifying the name of any candidate who may be nominated for election to the next general assembly from districts formed under either of the Acts of 1893, or under the Act of 1882; and that, at the hearing, the injunction be made perpetual; and also a general prayer for relief.

A general demurrer to this bill was sustained by the court; and, the complainant electing to abide by his bill, a decree was entered dismissing the bill, at the complainant's costs, for want of equity, and the complainant has appealed to this court. The two cases have been consolidated in this court for the purposes of argument, and, as they involve substantially the same legal propositions, they will be considered together.

From the foregoing statement of these two bills, it seems to be perfectly plain that the entire scope and object of both is the assertion and protection of political, as contradistinguished from civil, personal or property rights. In both the complainant is a legal voter, and a candidate for a particular elective office; and by his bill he is seeking the protection and enforcement of his right to cast his own ballot in a legal and effective manner, and also his right to be such candidate, to have the election called and held under the provisions of a valid law, and to have his name printed upon the ballots to be used at such election, so that he may be voted for in a legal manner. The rights thus asserted are all purely political; nor, so far as this question is concerned, is the matter aided in the least by the attempt made by the complainant in each bill to litigate on behalf of other voters or of the people of the state generally. The claims thus attempted to be set up are all of the same nature, and are none the less political.

As defined by Anderson, a civil right is "a right accorded to every member of a district community or nation," while a political right is a "right exercisable in the administration of government." Anderson, Law Dict. 905. Says Bouvier: "Political rights consist in the power to participate, directly or indirectly, in the establishment or management of the government. These political rights are fixed by the constitution. Every citizen has the right of voting for public officers, and of being elected. These are the political rights which the humblest citizen possesses. Civil rights are those which have no relation to the establishment, support, or management of the government. They consist in the power of acquiring and enjoying property, or exercising the paternal or marital powers, and the like. It will be observed that every one, unless deprived of them by sentence of civil death, is in the enjoyment of the civil rights, which is not the case with political rights; for an alien, for example, has no political, although in full enjoyment of the civil rights." 2 Bouvier, Law Dict. 597.

The question, then, is whether the assertion and protection of political rights, as judicial power is apportioned in this state between courts of law and courts of chancery, are a proper matter of chancery jurisdiction. We would not be understood as holding that political rights are not a matter of judicial solicitude and protection, and that the appropriate judicial tribunal will not, in proper cases, give them prompt and efficient protection, but we think they do not come within the proper cognizance of courts of equity. In Sheridan v. Colvin, 78 Ill. 287, this court, adopting, in substance, the language of Kerr on Injunctions, said: "It is elementary law that the subject of the jurisdiction of the court of chancery is civil property. The court is conversant only with the questions of property and the maintenance of civil rights. Injury to property, whether actual or prospective, is the foundation on which the jurisdiction rests. The court has no jurisdiction in matters merely criminal or merely immoral, which do not affect any right of property. Nor do matters of a political character come within the jurisdiction of the court of chancery. Nor has the court of chancery jurisdiction to interfere with the public duties of any department of the government, except under special circumstances, and where necessary for the protection of rights or property." In that case the police commissioners of the city of Chicago filed their bill in chancery against the mayor, the members of the common council, and certain officers of the city to restrain the enforcement of the city ordinance reorganizing the police force of the city, and depriving the complainants of their functions as police commissioners, it being claimed that the common council had no power to pass the ordinance, and that it was consequently void. It was held that the rights which were thus sought to be protected and enforced were purely political, and that a court of chancery, therefore, had no jurisdiction to interfere with the passage or enforcement of the ordinance. In Dickey v. Reed, 78 Ill. 261, a bill in chancery was filed by the state's attorney of Cook county, and by taxpayers of the city of Chicago, to restrain the members of the common council of the city and the city clerk from canvassing the returns of the election held in the city April 28, 1875, upon the question whether the city would become incorporated under the general incorporation act. It was claimed that the election, for certain reasons, was void, and also that gross frauds had been perpetrated at the election, by depositing a large number of ballots in the ballot boxes which had not been cast by the voters, and that a large number of the illegal and fraudulent votes in favor of organization had been cast, and that various other irregularities, having the effect of invalidating the election, had intervened. A preliminary injunction having been awarded, it was disregarded by the city officers, who proceeded, notwithstanding, to canvass the vote and declare the result. Various of the city officers and their advisers were attached and fined for contempt, and, on appeal to this court from the judgment for contempt, it was held that the matter presented by the bill was a matter over which a court of chancery had no jurisdiction, and that the injunction was void, so that its violation was not an act which subjected the violators to proceedings for contempt. In Harris v. Schryock, 82 Ill. 119, it was held that the power to hold an election is political, and not judicial, and that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to restrain officers from the exercise of such powers; and it was said that this was in accordance with repeated decisions of this court, and in support of that statement. People v. Galesburg, 48 Ill. 485; Walton v. Develing, 61 Ill. 201; Dorst v. People, 62 Ill. 306; and Dickey v. Reed, supra, are cited. So in Delahanty v. Warner, 75 Ill. 185, 20 Am. Rep. 287, it was held that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to entertain a bill to enjoin the mayor and aldermen of a city from removing a party from office, and appointing a successor, and from preventing the party from discharging his duties after removal by them, as the party's remedy at law is complete by quo warranto against the successor, or by mandamus against the mayor and councilmen. In Georgia v. Stanton, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 50, 18 L. ed. 721, a bill was filed by the state of Georgia against the secretary of war and other officers representing the executive authority of the United States, to restrain them in the execution of the acts of congress known as the "Reconstruction Acts," on the ground that the enforcement of those acts would annul and totally abolish the existing state government of the state, and establish another and different one in its place, and would, in effect, overthrow and destroy the corporate existence of the state, by depriving it of all means and instrumentalities whereby its existence might and otherwise would be maintained; and it was held that the bill called for a judgment upon a political question, and that it would not therefore be entertained by a court of chancery; and it was further held that the character of the bill was not changed by the fact that, in setting forth the political rights sought to be protected, it averred that the state had real and personal property, such, for example, as public buildings, etc., of the enjoyment of which, by the destruction of its corporate existence, the state would be deprived, such averment not being the substantial ground of the relief sought. In Re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 31 L. ed. 102, it was held 25 L. R. A.

that the circuit court of the United States had no jurisdiction to entertain a bill in equity to restrain the mayor and committee of a city in Nebraska from removing a city officer upon charges filed against him for misfeasance in office, and that an injunction issued on such bill, as well as an order committing certain persons for contempt in disregarding the injunction was absolutely void. In that case the court says: "The office and jurisdiction of a court of equity, unless enlarged by express statute, are limited to the protection of rights of property. It has no jurisdiction over the prosecution, the punishment, or the pardon of crimes or misdemeanors, or over the appointment and removal of public officers. To assume such jurisdiction, or to sustain a bill in equity to restrain or relieve against proceedings for the punishment of offenses, or for the removal of public officers, if to invade the domain of the courts of common law, or of the executive and administrative department of the government." In support of its decision, the court cites, among various other cases, the decisions of this court in Delahanty v. Warner, Sheridan v. Colvin, and Dickey v. Reed, above referred to, and quotes with approval the passage in the opinion in Sheridan v. Colvin, above set forth, taken, in substance, from Kerr on Injunctions. Other authorities of similar import might be referred to, but the foregoing are amply sufficient to show that wherever the established distinctions between equitable and common-law jurisdiction are observed, as they are in this state, courts of equity have no authority or jurisdiction to interpose for the protection of rights which are merely political, and where no civil or property right is involved. In all such cases the remedy, if there is one, may be sought in a court of law. The extraordinary jurisdiction of courts of chancery cannot therefore be invoked to protect the right of a citizen to vote or to be voted for at an election, or his right to be a candidate for or to be elected to any office; nor can it be invoked for the purpose of restraining the holding of an election, or of directing or controlling the mode in which, or of determining the rules of law in pursuance of which, an election shall be held. These matters involve in themselves no property rights, but pertain solely to the political administration of government. If a public officer, charged with political administration, has disobeyed or threatens to disobey the mandate of the law, whether in respect to calling or conducting an election or otherwise, the party injured or threatened with injury in his political rights is not without remedy; but his remedy must be sought in a court of law, and not in a court of chancery.

The only decision to which we are referred in which relief of the character of that sought in this case was given in what was in substance an equitable proceeding is State v. Cunningham, 88 Wis. 90, 17 L. R. A. 145. That was an original proceeding brought in the supreme court of Wisconsin, to test the validity of the apportionment law, passed by the legislature of that state, dividing the state into legislative districts. An injunction was prayed to restrain the secretary of state from publishing notices of an election of members of the senate and assembly in the legislative districts at tempted to be created by that act, and from filing and preserving in his office certificates of nomination and nomination papers, and from certifying the same to the several county clerks. The court entertained jurisdiction of the proceeding, and, on final hearing, awarded a perpetual injunction as prayed for. We have carefully considered the case as reported, and, if we understand it correctly, it cannot, in our opinion, be regarded as an authority in favor of equity jurisdiction in the case before us. In this connection it may be borne in mind, as a matter of some importance, that the Wisconsin Code of Procedure attempts to abolish the distinction between actions at law and in equity; but as to precisely how far that statutory provision has been held to have broken down the distinctions between common-law and equitable remedies we do not pretend to be accurately advised. But, whether that distinction is held to remain practically unaffected by the statute or not, it appears from the opinion of the court that its jurisdiction to grant a remedy by injunction in that case was based solely upon that provision of the constitution of Wisconsin which gives to the supreme court jurisdiction "to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari, and other original and remedial rights, and to hear and determine the same. Const. art. 7, § 8. In construing this provision of the constitution, the court holds that these various writs, and injunction among them, are prerogative writs; and that the supreme court is thereby given original jurisdiction in all judicial questions affecting the sovereignty of the state, its franchises and prerogatives, or the liberty of the people; and that an injunction and mandamus are thereby made correlative remedies, so as to authorize resort to injunction to restrain excess of action in the same class of cases where mandamus may be resorted to for the purpose of supplying defects. Thus, the court, in the opinion, quoting the language of a former decision in which this constitutional provision is construed, says: "And it is very safe to assume that the constitution gives injunction to restrain excess in the same class of cases as it gives mandamus to supply defect; the use of the one writ or the other in each case turning solely on the accident of overaction or shortcoming of the defendant; and it may be that, where defect and excess meet in a single case, the court might meet both, in its discretion, by one of the writs, without being driven to send out both, tied together with red tape, for a single purpose." And again: "Inasmuch as the use of the writ of injunction, in the exercise of the original jurisdiction of this court, is correlative with the writ of mandamus, the former issuing to restrain where the latter compels action, it is plain that this case, as against the respondent, is a proper one for an injunction to restrain unauthorized action by him in a matter where his duties are clearly ministerial, and affect the sovereignty rights and franchises of the state, and the liberties of the people." It thus seems plain that in view of the construction of the constitution of Wisconsin adopted by the supreme court of that state, the prerogative writ of injunction of which that court is given original jurisdiction is a writ of a different nature, and having a different scope and purpose, from an ordinary injunction in equity. Where the established distinction between equity and common-law jurisdiction are observed, injunction and mandamus are not correlative remedies, in the sense of being applicable to the same subject-matter, the choice of a writ to be resorted to in a particular case to depend upon whether there is an excess of action to be restrained or a defect to be supplied. The two writs properly pertain to entirely different jurisdictions, and to different classes of proceedings, injunction being the proper writ only in cases of equitable cognizance, and mandamus being a common-law writ, and applicable only in cases coming within the appropriate jurisdiction of courts of common law. Besides, it would seem that, in Wisconsin, the writ of injunction of which the supreme court is given original jurisdiction is not limited, as is the jurisdiction of courts of equity, to cases involving civil or property rights, but may be resorted to in all cases "affecting the sovereignty of the state, its franchises or prerogatives, or the liberties of the people," thus including within its scope the protection of political as well as civil or property rights. It thus seems plain that State v. Cunningham was decided under a judicial system differing essentially from ours, and that it cannot be resorted to as an authority upon the question of the jurisdiction of courts of equity in this state in cases of this character.

The jurisdiction of a court of equity is sought to be sustained in the present cases, however, on the ground that the bills are by taxpayers to restrain the misapplication of public moneys, and the incurring of an unauthorized municipal indebtedness. If it be admitted that a taxpayer may, in a proper case, file a bill in his own name, for such a purpose, — a question which we do not deem it necessary to discuss, — it seems plain that no case for the interposition of equity on that ground is here made out. It may be noticed, in the first place, that, while it is alleged that holding the election will necessitate a certain amount of election expenses, that fact does not seem to be set forth as an independent, substantive ground for relief, nor does either bill pray that the election itself be enjoined, so as to avoid the incurring of an illegal municipal indebtedness. The act sought to be restrained in one case is the issuing of notices of the election of members of the general assembly in and for the districts formed by the Apportionment Act of 1893, and the act sought to be enjoined by the other bill is the certifying by the secretary of state of the name of any candidate nominated for election under the Acts of 1893 or the Act of 1892; but it is not alleged or shown in any way, either directly or by inference, that either of the acts thus sought to be restrained will of themselves involve the expenditure of public money or the incurring of any indebtedness. The expenditures which the complainants, as taxpayers, might seek to avoid, if any such are to be incurred, will result from the holding of the election; and neither bill prays for an injunction to restrain the public officers from incurring the expenses incident to holding the election itself. Indeed, it is so well settled that courts will not enjoin the holding of an election that, in drafting the bills, the pleaders did not venture to pray for that species of relief. Furthermore, as is of course well known, the election to be held in November, 1894, will not be confined to the choice of senators and representatives in the general assembly, but it will be for the election of state treasurer, members of congress, and certain county officers; and it is not pretended that, so far as those officers are concerned, the election will be in any respect illegal or unauthorized. Nor is it shown, at least by any clear or intelligible averment, that voting for senators and representatives in the general assembly in and for the districts created by the apportionment acts in question, will in any material degree increase the expense of holding the election. In no view, then, can it be held that the complainants, as taxpayers, have made out a case for an injunction to restrain the public authorities from doing acts whereby an illegal indebtedness will be incurred.

After giving the cases patient consideration, we are unanimously of the opinion that these bills present no cases entitling the complainants to relief in a court of equity. Having reached that conclusion, it is unnecessary for us to express any opinion upon the other question raised by counsel in their arguments; but, upon the sole ground that the cases made by the bills are not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, the decrees of the courts below dismissing the bills for want of equity will be affirmed.

Decrees affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT. (In Banc.)

C. P. ELLERBE, Appt.,

v.

Anthony E. FAUST, Resp't.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A resolution of the masonic order denying membership to saloon keepers applies to existing members, if they continue thereafter in that business.

2. The termination of membership in a masonic lodge, which is in substance and effect an expulsion, although not so in form, forfeits membership in a masonic mutual benefit association, which not only provides that expulsion from the lodge shall work a forfeiture of membership in the association, but also makes it a requisite for membership that the applicant be a mason in good standing.

3. Payments of assessments in a benefit

NOTE.—Effect of expulsion from a society to destroy right to insurance connected therewith.

The above case seems to be the first in which a distinction has been considered between membership in a society or paternal order and the right to insurance connected therewith with respect to the effect of an expulsion from the order.

In all the cases hereinafter cited it seems to have been assumed that expulsion from the order forfeited all rights of the member to insurance belonging to membership. But these cases are here presented to show that valid expulsion for whatever cause has been uniformly held fatal to such insurance. Cases of forfeiture of insurance for nonpayment of dues have not been included here, as the forfeiture of insurance in such cases obviously results directly therefrom and not as an indirect result of expulsion. It should be noticed also that in the main case there were two distinct associations and membership in the benefit society was dependent on membership in the other and broader organization while in the following cases the expulsion was from the same organization which gave the insurance.

Suits on the benefit certificate.

Where the member has been regularly expelled on proper notice and fair hearing in accord with the constitution and by-laws of the order, no recovery can thereafter be had on the certificate. Anacosta Tribe No. 12, Improved Order of Redmen v. Murbach, 13 Md. 91, 71 Am. Dec. 636; Black & White-Smiths' Soc. v. Vandyke, 2 Whart. 309.

And an action for benefits cannot be maintained, where the claim was disallowed and an appeal taken and reversed, and appeal from this taken, pending which he was expelled for fraud in this claim, and on appeal from this the expulsion was considered by the society first and affirmed and held to be an adjudication of the other appeal. This is approved by the court. Woolsey v. Independent 26 L. R. A.

So where an expelled member brings suit for weekly allowances accruing prior to and since his expulsion, and a judgment is rendered that no recovery can be had for allowances claimed since the expulsion on account of its regularity, this is a bar to any other action for a recovery of the same or for reinstatement. Bachmann v. New Yorker Deutscher Arbeiter Bund, 64 How. Pr. 442.

And where the constitution provides that a member in good standing is entitled to $500 on the death of his wife, and he receives a withdrawal card from his lodge and then applies for admission to two other lodges but is rejected and no cause assigned, he cannot recover from the order, on the death of his wife, which occurred shortly after his last rejection, as he was not then a member in good standing. Meyer v. American Star Order, 2 N. Y. Supp. 492.

And in Jones v. National Mut. Ben. Assn. (Ky.) Jan. 6, 1897, it was stated that the decision of an officer within a corporation acting judicially on the expulsion of a member would be res adjudicata in the absence of fraud, but that was not the question involved.

And in Com. v. Pike Beneficial Soc., 8 Watts & S. 247, in an action of mandamus it was stated that where the member has had a hearing according to the charter and there is no irregularity in the proceeding, the judgment of the society is conclusive and will not be inquired into by mandamus, or action, or in any other mode.

And in Fritz v. Muck, 62 How. Pr. 69, in an action to restore an expelled member where the court required him to be reinstated, it refused to pass on the question as to his right to recover weekly payments during the time of expulsion, as such was proper matter for the regular committee of the order and there was no charge of fraud or bad faith against it.

association after forfeiture of membership, but in ignorance of that fact, do not estop the member from denying his liability to pay subsequent assessments.

(February 12, 1894.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to compel payment of assessments made on behalf of a mutual insurance company. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. James E. Hereford and M. W. Huff for appellant.

Mr. Rufus J. Delano for respondent.

Martin, Special Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case are substantially like the facts in the case of Ellerbe v. Barney (Mo.) 28 L. R. A. 485, with one exception. That exception includes some facts which tended to show that the respondent was not a member of the Masonic Mutual Benefit Association at the date of the assessments, for the collection of which this suit was brought. The court below held that he was not a member of that date, and entered judgment in his favor, from which the superintendent of insurance has appealed.

But where no notice or hearing of the accused member was given, the society is liable on the certificate. Downing v. St. Columbia's R. C. T. A. B. Soc. 10 Daly, 267; Simmons v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. & Oswego S. Benev. Soc. 32 N. Y. S. R. 428.

So where the expulsion was for a cause not recognized by the contract, constitution, and by-laws of the society, a recovery was allowed. Mulroy v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 28 Mo. App. 453.

So where the suspension for ninety-nine years, which was the same as an expulsion, was groundless and the grand lodge had reversed such judgment after the death of the member, a recovery was allowed. Vivar v. Supreme Lodge K. of P. 28 N. J. L. 455.

And in a suit to recover the weekly stipend by an expelled member, a complaint stating that there was a waiver of the rule as to his being over age when admitted, and that he was expelled for leaving the sick room without the permission of the physician and the president of the association, will be held good on demurrer, as there is no allegation of power of the association to expel on that ground, and the rule that pleading is construed against the pleader is changed by N. Y. Code, § 159, providing that pleadings shall be liberally construed. Olery v. Brown, 51 How. Pr. 92.

A judgment of expulsion from a lodge based on appearance and admission of the member is not binding on him where he was insane at the time of such appearance and expulsion, as appearance implies consent which cannot be given by an insane person, and a recovery may be had on the certificate after his death by the beneficiary. Supreme Lodge A. O. U. W. v. Zuhke, 129 Ill. 298.

But, on the contrary, in Pfeiffer v. Weishaup, 13 Daly, 161, it was held in an action on a benefit certificate, that it was a good defense that the member had been expelled on trial and hearing, notwithstanding his insanity, the court saying, "A person who has even been adjudged a lunatic and of whom a committee both of person and estate has been appointed may be sued at law and the judgment recovered against him is not void."

The case of ELLERBE v. FAUST holds that a member of masonic benefit society receiving his 25 L. R. A.

A clause in the constitution or charter of the association, as it existed in 1883, when the respondent became a member, provides that "a requisite qualification for membership shall be that the applicant be a Mason of good standing." The association was established for the benefit of Masons and their families. Another clause in the constitution or charter gave the board of directors power to make and amend by-laws relating to the forfeiture of membership, declaring the effect thereof, and the manner in which the same should be brought about. In October, 1888, the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of Missouri, including the subordinate lodge of said order, to which the respondent belonged, passed a resolution barring and denying saloon keepers (including the respondent, who was and continued to be a saloon keeper) from the membership and privileges of said order of Masons. The respondent, upon receiving notice of this action, acquiesced in it, and withdrew from his lodge, and thereafter ceased to be a Mason in good standing. In October, 1890, the Masonic Benefit Association, to which respondent also belonged, as already stated, desiring to comply with the spirit and intent of the order of the grand lodge, passed a by-law to the effect that, if any of its members should become a saloon keeper or bar keeper, he should forfeit card on account of a by-law excluding saloon keepers from the benefit of the order, is not liable for assessments made thereafter by the order. The cases on the question of liability on the certificate except this are cases in which the society is sued, and the liability depends generally on the effect of the judgment of expulsion. If notice, hearing, and trial are fairly given according to the constitution and by-laws such judgment will be conclusive and defeat a recovery on the certificate.

Damages.

There are not many cases on the question of damages for expulsion of a member of a benefit society and the cases conflict, some holding that he has property rights of which he could not be deprived, and at least is entitled to nominal damages where he was expelled without notice or trial. Ludowski v. Polish Roman Catholic St. Stanislaus Koska Benev. Soc. 29 Mo. App. 337.

And a recovery of damages to the extent of injury and value of sick benefits to which the member was entitled was allowed where he was expelled without notice as required by the constitution and by-laws. Washington Beneficial Soc. v. Bacher, 20 Pa. 425.

But Lavalle v. Société St. Jean Baptiste de Woonsocket, 16 L. R. A. 302, 17 R. I. 690, holds that damages are not recoverable for an expulsion, as such claim admits that the claimant is not a member, and besides it would be difficult to provide payment for such a judgment.

And in Peay v. Mutual Relief Soc. of the French Zouaves, 90 Cal. 240, it was held that a recovery of damages could not be had as the expulsion was substantially in accord with the constitution, but if he should be entitled to reinstatement damages should not be awarded as this would punish his friends who voted against his expulsion.

And a judgment for damages for expulsion is a bar to an action of mandamus for reinstatement. State v. Lipa, 28 Ohio St. 665.

Cases of mandamus for restoration of expelled member are not included in this note. I. T.

feit his membership in the same, and all benefits therein, and his certificate of membership should thereby, ipso facto, become null and void. The by-law went further, and provided that a failure to give notice of the adoption of the by-law should have no effect on the forfeiture. It also declared it to be unlawful to pay any benefits under any such certificate, irrespective of any knowledge of the association, prior to the member's death, of the fact of forfeiture, or of the receipt of assessments after forfeiture. It also forbade the officers of the association, the executive committee, and the board of directors to receive any assessments from any member after notice of the existence of the facts constituting an ipso facto forfeiture of his membership. Another by-law, or section of a by-law, provided that an "expulsion from his lodge shall, ipso facto, work a forfeiture of membership in this association." The manifest intention of this action of the association was to keep in line with the lodges of the state, from which, alone, its members were recruited. After passage of the edict against saloon keepers by the united lodges of the state, no one pursuing the occupation of a saloon keeper, whether technically in, or formally expelled from, his lodge, could be received by the association as eligible to membership. It is argued by counsel for appellant that the respondent was not within the purview of the by-law recited by us, for the reason that he was a saloon keeper before and at the time it was passed, and therefore did not become one after its passage. The by-law must be interpreted so as to meet the abuse or thing prohibited, and to correct it, if possible. The intention is manifest to prevent any of its members from pursuing the occupation of saloon keepers or bar keepers. Of course, it was not intended to affect the standing of any one who had pursued the occupation of a saloon keeper, but who, upon passage of the law, discontinued that occupation. I think it was intended to apply to only such as should be or become saloon keepers after its passage. As the respondent is admitted to have continued to be a saloon keeper after its passage, he comes within the operation of its provisions, and, according to the declared effect of it, lost his membership, ipso facto, without any formal action of the association.

But, irrespective of the by-law against saloon keepers passed by the association, it would seem that the respondent lost his membership in it by virtue of the action of the lodge to which he belonged debarring him from membership therein, and the by-law of the association which declared that, when a member of the association suffered expulsion from the lodge to which he belonged, he thereby, ipso facto, ceased to be a member of the association, without any action on its part.

It is contended by counsel for appellant that the respondent, although ceasing to be a member of the lodge to which he had belonged, was not formally expelled therefrom, and therefore did not strictly fall within the operation of the by-law which discontinued him as a member of the association, ipso facto, as soon as he was expelled from his lodge. The termination of his membership in his lodge was in substance and effect an expulsion, although not such in form. He was, against his will, lebarred of all the rights and privileges of membership by the lodge, on account of his being and continuing a saloon keeper. After this, it is admitted that he took his "demit." I do not see what else he could have done. He had no rights in the lodge, and, as a law abiding citizen it was his duty to go away.

It is, however, contended by counsel for appellant that after this forfeiture the officers of the association still recognized and treated him as a member in good standing, and collected assessments from him, prior to the date of the assessments for which this suit is brought, and that the effect of this treatment was to restore him to his membership, by waiver of the forfeiture, notwithstanding he continued to pursue the occupation of a saloon keeper all the time. This position is attempted to be supported by an appeal to the doctrine of estoppel. There are several reasons against this position, some of which may be briefly attended to: It is possible that the board of directors could have changed the by-law directed against saloon keepers, and thus relieved the respondent from its effect. There is no evidence that the board did this, or that it approved of any act of its officers tending to continue the respondent as a member. Certainly, the executive committee, and the other officers of the association who are claimed to have made and collected assessments, were expressly forbidden by the by-law from doing this in respect to saloon keepers. The by-law could not be set aside by them. It also provides that no action by them in collecting assessments shall operate to relieve any member from a forfeiture. Moreover, if a forfeiture took place under the by-law relating to an expulsion from the member's lodge,—a forfeiture which, ipso facto, discontinued the respondent's membership,—the directors, as well as the officers, in restoring him, would seem to be acting in violation of the clause in the charter which authorized them to admit only Masons in good standing. Again, the elements of an estoppel in behalf of the association are evidently wanting. There is no evidence of fraud, misrepresentation, or imposition upon the association. An estoppel which might possibly be invoked by the respondent in a suit against the association is not available in behalf of the association in its suit against the respondent. The unbrought action of the respondent is not before us, and we could not safely pass upon its merits, in order to furnish the appellant with an estoppel. Lastly, it is admitted by the appellant that the payments by respondent were actually made by him in ignorance of the fact that his membership had been forfeited under the by-laws. He paid them under the impression and belief that he still owed them. The appellant, who received them under such circumstances, has no equity, as against the respondent, in attributing to them the effect of giving to him a membership which had been taken from him, especially as appellant knew that it had no right to receive them. The right of the respondent to plead his ignorance in the payments as a fact of estoppel belongs to him, and not to the association. In his answer, however, he disavows the supposed advantages of such a plea, and alleges that he does not claim, and never has claimed since knowledge of the by-laws, any rights of membership in the association.

As the assessments were made after the respondent ceased to be a rightful member of the association, I am convinced that the judgment of the court below was correct, and that it should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

All the other judges concur in the result, except Brace and Macfarlane, JJ., not sitting.

Black, J.:

The judgment in this case should be affirmed for the reasons stated in the dissenting opinion in the case of the Same Plaintiff v. Barney, 22 L. R. A. 435. Entertaining the views there expressed, it is not necessary to express any opinion as to the matters discussed in the foregoing opinion.

NOTE.—Compulsory vaccination.

The main case which holds it to be within the power of school authorities to require children to be vaccinated, as condition of attendance on the public schools, is directly supported by the California decision in Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 233, which decided in substance the same. These are the only American cases which we have found, that directly present the question, and it will be noticed that neither of these decides the question of power to compel vaccination, but merely decides that until vaccinated, the privilege of attendance on the public schools may be denied.

The vaccination of school children was incidentally involved in the case Fort Wayne v. Rosenthal, 76 Ind. 156, 39 Am. Rep. 127, in which a physician, who was a member of the board of health, made a claim for compensation for vaccinating school children under contract with the board of which he was a member. The statute under which this was done gave power to provide by ordinance for the compulsory vaccination, but no question on this point was raised.

In an early Vermont case, Hazen v. Strong, 2 Vt. 497, the validity of a tax to pay the expenses of vaccinating the inhabitants of a town, under order of the selectmen, was brought in question, but it was upheld under general statutory authority to take measures for the prevention of the spreading of disease.

provided for compulsory vaccination, and has been enforced in various cases. It was held in Re v. Justices of the Cinque Ports, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 191, that where a parent had been duly summoned, and the court found that notice to the parent to procure the vaccination of the child had been disregarded, the justice might order the child to be vaccinated, although no appearance was made by either parent or child in answer to the summons.

The same decision was made in Dutton v. Atkins, L. R. 6 Q. B. 373, 40 L. J. M. C. 157, 24 L. T. N. S. 507 19 Week. Rep. 799, except that the parent without the child appeared in that case.

Under the Act of 30 & 31 Vict., the parent may be fined successively for disobeying successive orders to have the child vaccinated. Allen v. Worthy, L. R. 5 Q. B. 163, 39 L. J. M. C. 32; Tebb v. Jones, 37 L. T. N. S. 576.

But under the prior Act of 16 & 17 Vict., one conviction was a bar to further prosecutions. Pilcher v. Stafford, 4 Best & S. 775, 33 L. J. M. C. 113, 10 Jur. N. S. 651, 9 L. T. N. S. 759, 12 Week. Rep. 407.

The act has also been construed in other particulars and enforced in other cases.

Knight v. Halliwell, L. R. 9 Q. B. 412, 43 L. J. M. C. 113, 30 L. T. N. S. 359, 22 Week. Rep. 699; Broadhead v. Holdsworth, L. R. 2 Exch. Div. 321, 45 L. J. M. C. 173, 38 L. T. N. S. 329; Miller v. Rhind, 29 L. T. N. S. 52.

But in no case has the general question of power to enforce compulsory vaccination been contested.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. par. 808.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff seeks to compel by a writ of mandamus the admission of his minor son to the common schools of the city of Williamsport. The board of school directors admit that the child is of proper age, is in good health, and possesses the qualifications that are enumerated in the general school laws as those that entitle him to admission. They allege, however, that he is excluded because of noncompliance with a regulation adopted in the exercise of a proper measure of care for the public health. The facts appearing in the answer are substantially as follows: First. That the city of Williamsport provided by an ordinance adopted in 1872, and still in full force, that no pupil "shall be permitted to attend any public or private school in said city without a certificate of a practicing physician that such pupil has been subjected to the process of vaccination." Second. That smallpox now exists in Williamsport, and "is and has been epidemic in many near-by cities and towns." Third. That, in view of this situation, the attention of the school board was drawn to the subject by a communication from the board of health, requesting them to take action "to the effect that no pupil shall attend the schools of this city except they be vaccinated, or furnish a certificate from a physician that such vaccination has been performed." Fourth. That upon considering this communication, "and from the general alarm prevailing in the city over the report that a case of smallpox was in the city," they adopted a resolution in conformity with the recommendation of the board of health. Fifth. That this resolution is not enforced against those not at present in a condition to undergo vaccination; and as to those unable to bear the expense the board provide vaccination without charge. The plaintiff demurred to this answer, and the questions thus raised are over the power of the school board to adopt reasonable health regulations for the benefit of their pupils and the general public, and over the reasonableness of the particular regulation complained of in this case. It should be borne in mind that there is no effort to compel vaccination. The school board do not claim that they can compel the plaintiff to vaccinate his son. They claim only the right to exclude from the schools those who do not comply with such regulations of the city and the board of directors as has been thought necessary to preserve the public health. It would not be doubted that the directors would have the right to close the schools temporarily during the prevalence of any serious disease of an infectious or contagious character. This would be a refusal of admission to all the children of the district. They might limit the exclusion to children from infected neighborhoods, or families in which one or more of the members was suffering from the disease. For the same reason they may exclude such children as decline to comply with requirements looking to prevention of the spread of contagion, provided these requirements are not positively unreasonable in their character.

Is the regulation now under consideration a reasonable one? That is to be judged of in the first instance, by the city authorities and the school board. It is only in the case of an abuse of discretionary powers that the court will undertake to supervise official discretion. Vaccination may be or may not be a preventive of smallpox. That is a question about which medical men differ, and which the law affords no means of determining in a summary manner. A decided majority of the medical profession believe in its efficacy. The municipal regulations of many, and I have no doubt of most, of the cities of this state and country provide for it. In the present state of medical knowledge and public opinion upon this subject, it would be impossible for a court to deny that there is reason for believing in the importance of vaccination as a means of protection from the scourge of smallpox. The question is not one of science in a case like the present. We are not required to determine judicially whether the public belief in the efficacy of vaccination is absolutely right or not. We are to consider what is reasonable in view of the present state of medical knowledge and the concurring opinions of the various boards and officers charged with the care of the public health. The answers of the city and the school board show the belief of the proper authorities to be that a proper regard for the public health and for the children in the public schools requires the adoption of the regulation complained of. They are doing, in the utmost good faith, what they believe it is their duty to do; and, though the plaintiff might be able to demonstrate by the highest scientific tests that they are mistaken in this respect, that would not be enough. It is not an error in judgment, or a mistake upon some abstruse question of medical science, but an abuse of discretionary power, that justifies the courts in interfering with the conduct of the school board or setting aside its action. It is conceded that the board might rightfully exclude the plaintiff's son if he was actually sick with, or was just recovering from the smallpox. Though he might not be affected by it, yet if another member of the same family was, the right to exclude him, notwithstanding he might be in perfect health, would be conceded. How far shall this right to exclude one for the good of many be carried? That is a question addressed to the official discretion of the proper officers, and when that discretion is honestly and impartially exercised, the courts will not interfere.

The learned judge of the court below reached a correct conclusion in this case, and his decree is now affirmed, at the cost of the appellant.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

Dan. FORD et al.

v.

S. J. FORSGARD and Wife, Piffs. in Err.

(.....Tex.....)

Rooms in a house which stands on a homestead lot cannot be subject to forced sale, on the ground that the homestead as to them has been abandoned, under the Texas constitution and laws, by which the exemption is placed on the lots and not upon the improvements.

(June 27, 1894.)

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Third Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment modifying a judgment of the District Court for McLennan County in favor of plaintiffs in a suit brought to enjoin the execution sale of certain property belonging to the plaintiffs upon the ground that it was exempt from execution as homestead property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—Upon the question of the division of a building in enforcing homestead exemptions, see note to Cass County Bank v. Weber (Iowa) 12 L. R. A. 47.

Messrs. Robertson & Davis, for plaintiffs in error:

The homestead in a city, town, or village, shall consist of lot or lots not to exceed in value $5,000 at the time of their designation as the homestead, without reference to the value of any improvements thereon, provided the same shall be used for the purpose of a home or as a place to exercise the calling or business of the head of a family; provided, also, that any temporary renting of a homestead shall not change the character of the same when no other homestead has been acquired, and if S. J. Forsgard and wife used the lots in question in connection with and for their homestead, and the same was and is necessary to their enjoyment of their homestead, a renting of part of two houses will not destroy their homestead right to said houses, provided parts of the same are necessary for family uses and for business purposes.

Texas Const. art. 16, §§ 50, 51; Azer v. Bassett, 68 Tex. 545; Medlenka v. Downing, 59 Tex. 32; Shryock v. Latimer, 57 Tex. 674; Blum v. Whitworth, 66 Tex. 350; Willis v. Morris, Id. 628, 59 Am. Rep. 634; Bowman v. Watson, 66 Tex. 295; Malone v. Kornrumpf, 84 Tex. 454.

Forsgard built the entire property on his lots as residence and business homestead. Parts of all of it being necessary for the use of his family and being used by his family, gave to all of it the character of residence homestead. Then when he cut off two small rooms in the two-story brick storehouse, using the rest of said house for family purposes, and it being necessary for such purposes, the renting of two small rooms would not destroy the homestead character of the house, and when he rented the partial use of one room in the one-story house, it did not destroy its homestead character, because the residue of said house was necessary for his family purposes. It is not like renting an entire house on homestead lots.

Hancock v. Morgan, 17 Tex. 583; Andrews v. Hagaden, 54 Tex. 571, and authorities above cited.

Messrs. Baker & Prendergast, for defendants in error:

Both storehouses are clearly subject to appellants' levy, and are not exempt to appellees, as either residence or business homestead.

He conducts no business nor follows any occupation in either of them. Has conducted no business in either of them for from five to eight years, but during all this time has kept them rented to others who did business in them. Never followed any occupation in either of them.

He has never used either of them as his residence. He resides with his wife and son—his only family, in a residence building 16×53 feet, two stories high, with kitchen detached, making five large rooms.

The constitution defines the homestead in a city: "Shall consist of lot or lots not to exceed in value $5,000, at the time of their designation as the homestead, without reference to the value of any improvements thereon: provided that the same shall be used for the purposes of a home."

These storehouses are in no way used for the purposes of a home.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted in the district court of McLennan county to enjoin the sale by Dan. Ford, sheriff of said county, of one half of lots 4 and 5, and all of lots 10, 11, and 12, in block No. 2 in the city of Waco. Mary A. Hanna recovered a judgment against S. J. Forsgard for $4, 182.80, and defendants, T. J. Harper, M. M. Harper, Mary A. Hanna, F. J. Vesey, and J. B. Vesey recovered judgment against said Forsgard for $1,079.48, upon each of which judgment execution was issued, placed in the hands of sheriff, and by him levied upon the property described above. The plaintiffs, Forsgard and wife, claimed the lots as part of their homestead, and the district judge issued a writ of injunction, enjoining the sale of the lots, which, upon trial before the court, were found to be exempted, as part of the plaintiff's homestead, and the injunction was perpetuated. Upon appeal the court of civil appeals (25 S. W. Rep. 445) found that so much of lot 5 as is covered by a one-story brick building was subject to forced sale, and that all of that half of lot 5 involved in the suit was part of the homestead, and exempted, but that two rooms on the first floor of the building were not exempted, and decreed that these rooms be sold; dissolving the injunction as to so much of lot 5 as was covered by the one-story brick building, and as to the two rooms in the building on lot 4. Under the findings of facts by the court of civil appeals, the judgment of that court, as to the one-story brick and that part of lot 5, must be affirmed.

The facts as found by the court, with reference to the half of lot 4, are, in substance, that lot 4 fronted on Bridge street 25 feet, with a two-story house upon it, covering the entire front, and running back 85 feet. Under the entire house, running up to the front, was a cellar. The first floor above the cellar was divided into three rooms by running a partition across the house 25 feet from the front, and another partition dividing the front into two rooms fronting on the street. The court of civil appeals finds that the entire lot under the house is exempted, as homestead, by reason of its use; that the rear room on the first floor and the second story are likewise exempted; but that the two front rooms on the first floor are not exempted, they having been abandoned as homestead, and rented out for other uses. The question presented is, Can a part of a house standing on a lot that is homestead be subjected to forced sale, under our constitution and laws? The house upon lot 5 was a fixture, within the meaning of the law, and, as such, was a part of the land itself. A sale of the land would carry the house, and every part of it. Hutchins v. Masterson, 46 Tex. 555, 26 Am. Rep. 286; Sinker v. Comparet, 62 Tex. 476. The house, being attached to, and a part of, the realty, could not be seized and sold separately from the land. Willis v. Morris, 66 Tex. 628, 59 Am. Rep. 684.

The constitution of this state (art. 16, § 51) defines an urban homestead in this language: "The homestead in a city, town, or village, shall consist of lot or lots not to exceed in value $5,000 at the time of their designation as a homestead without reference to the value of any improvement thereon; provided, that the same shall be used for the purposes of a home or as a place of business to exercise the calling or business of the head of the family; provided, also, that any temporary renting of the homestead shall not change the character of the same when no other homestead has been acquired." By this provision of the constitution the exemption is placed upon the lots, and not upon the improvements. This is emphasized by the further provision that the value of improvements shall not be included, in determining the right. The use of the lot or lots impresses upon the land the homestead character. Whatever is so attached to the land as to become a part of it must partake of the character of the land, and if the land is subject to sale the improvements upon it will be subject. If, however, the land cannot be sold, neither can the structures built upon it as permanent buildings adapted to its use, and intended by the owner for such purposes. It would not be contended, if this lot were not exempt from forced sale, that the sheriff could seize and sell the two rooms, under these executions, nor would it be asserted that a sale of the lot would not carry the whole house. If the house, as a whole, be part of the realty, as it evidently is, how can it be said that a portion of the house is not a part of the land? And, if it be a part of the lot, under what rule of procedure can it be separated from the lot for the purposes of seizure and sale under execution? Let us suppose that the house should be destroyed by fire. The purchasers of these rooms would not be entitled to participate in the erection of another building upon the lot. The result of such a doctrine would be that the land under the house would be protected by the constitution, but the use of a part of it would not be. The purchaser of the two rooms would not dare, without the consent of the owner, to set foot on the soil, for if he did so he would be a trespasser; and the owner of the soil upon which the house stands would likewise be a trespasser, if he, without consent, entered the two rooms which rest upon the soil. This doctrine has been asserted and acted upon in Iowa, under the statutes of that state. McCormick v. Bishop, 28 Iowa, 239. In that case the lots and the lower rooms were sold, and the upper rooms held to be homestead. It is evident that the statutes of that state are very different in their provisions from our constitution, or the decision is not correct. The court says in that case that: "The owner might grant the right to use a part of the house, or he might sell the lot, and reserve a use in part of it,—the building; and why is it that the like result cannot be reached by forced sale?" The reason is plain. The owner is not inhibited by the constitution from disposing of the homestead as he and his wife may deem best; but the officers of the law have no rights, by the process of courts, to enter the precincts of the homestead, to parcel out the use and ownership of that which the constitution has exempted from the claims of creditors and the powers of courts and officers. In Wisconsin the supreme court has held that no part of the house upon the lands exempted can be sold. One member of the court dissented, but we think that the reason of the law is with the majority of that court. Phelps v. Rooney, 9 Wis. 70, 76 Am. Dec. 244.

The court of civil appeals erred in holding that the two rooms in the house on lot 4 were subject to forced sale, for which error the judgments of the District Court and Court of Civil Appeals are reversed, and this court now renders such judgment as the court of civil appeals should have rendered on the facts found by it. It is ordered that the injunction be dissolved as to so much of lot 5, block 2, in the city of Waco, as is covered by the one-story brick building, and the same is adjudged subject to sale under the executions levied upon it, and that as to the remainder of said lot 5, and half of lots 4 and lots 10, 11, and 12, in said block 2, the said injunction be, and the same is, made perpetual, and that the plaintiffs in error, S. J. Forsgard and F. G. Forsgard, recover of defendants in error, and their sureties on their appeal bond, all costs, and that this judgment be certified to the district court for observance.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

James DOYLE, Admr., etc., of Cornelius J. Doyle, Deceased,

v.
FITCHBURG R. CO.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A railroad employe having a monthly ticket given him, which is good for more rides than are necessary in attending to his work, with the express privilege of using them for his own private interest or pleasure, is not, when passing over the road entirely for his own business, or pleasure, an employe, but is a passenger, within Pub. Stat., chap. 112, § 112, creating a liability for injury to a passenger.

2. Conditions on the back of a ticket cannot release the railroad from liability for the penalty given by Pub. Stat., chap. 112, § 112, to the widow and children and next of kin of a passenger injured by the gross negligence or carelessness of the servants of the company.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Middlesex County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiff's intestate, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. George A. Torrey, for defendant:

It by no means follows that because the plaintiff's intestate was riding upon a train and not actually engaged in service that he was a passenger.

Robinson v. Old Colony R. Co. 156 Mass. 435.

The defendant was under no common-law or statutory obligation to transport the plaintiff's intestate in the manner in which he was riding at the time of the accident, and it did not stand towards him in the relation of a common carrier. He was upon the train, not as a passenger who has a right to be there, but as an employe of the defendant, who was there through the license of the defendant, as a sheer gratuity or accommodation.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Price, 90 Pa. 256.

A servant is still in the employment of his master while being carried to and from his work by the master.

Salmon*, 11 Kan. 88; Seaver v. Boston & M. Railroad, 14 Gray, 466; Gilman v. Eastern R. Corp. 10 Allen, 283, 87 Am. Dec. 635; O'Brien v. Boston & A. R. Co. 133 Mass. 387, 53 Am. Rep. 379.

A servant who is permitted, but not required, to ride in an elevator is not a passenger but an employe while so riding, and the degree of care required of his employer was that of a master towards his servant, and not that of a common carrier of passengers.

McDonough v. Lampher (Minn.) Dec. 18, 1893. See also Vick v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. supra; Abend v. Terre Haute & L. R. Co. 111 Ill. 208, 53 Am. Rep. 616; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Ryan, 83 Tex. 565; Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Phillips (Ala.) April 26, 1898; Parkinson Sugar Co. v. Riley, 50 Kan. 401; Evansville & R. R. Co. v. Mad-dux, 134 Ind. 571.

The fact that the conductor of the train received and treated him as a passenger was of no consequence.

Texas & P. R. Co. v. Scott, 94 Tex. 549.

The defendant was relieved from liability by reason of a contract entered into between the plaintiff's intestate and the defendant, by virtue of the reception and use of the ticket upon which the plaintiff's intestate was riding at the time of the accident.

If this were an action to recover damages for personal injuries to the plaintiff's intestate, even assuming that he were a passenger, the conditions on the back of this ticket would preclude his recovery in this commonwealth.

The basis of the plaintiff's action is the injury done to his intestate; and when his intestate released us from all liability for such injury, he released us from liability to compensate his administrator for his death.

In Goodsell v. Hurford & N. H. R. Co. 83 Conn. 51, it is held that the basis of an action for damages for death is not the loss to the relatives for the death, but the injury to the deceased.

In Yelton v. Evansville & I. R. Co., 21 L. R. A. 158, 184 Ind. 414, it was held that in an action by the administrator to recover damages for death for the benefit of the widow, a settlement with the widow is invalid, and is not a bar to the maintenance of the action.

Clearly, therefore, this is an action brought by the administrator, and he has no ground of action if his intestate had relinquished all claim for injuries received at the collision that caused his death.

A settlement with the deceased in his lifetime bars an action for damages for his death.

Messrs. Allin & Mayberry for plaintiff.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is conceded that the death of the plaintiff's intestate was due to the gross negligence of an engineer in the employ of the defendant. The defense rests on two propositions: First, that the plaintiff's intestate was not a passenger, but an employé; secondly, if that is not so, that the defendant is not liable, by reason of the conditions on the back of the ticket. The statute is as follows: "If by reason of the negligence . . . of a corporation operating a railroad . . . or of the unfitness, or gross negligence or carelessness of its servants . . . while engaged in its business, the life of a passenger, or of a person being in the exercise of due diligence and not a passenger, or in the employment of such corporation is lost, the corporation shall be punished." Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 212. We do not think that, at the time of the injury, the plaintiff's intestate was in the employment of the defendant, within the meaning of the statute. The defendant was not transporting him to or from the place of his daily labor pursuant to the arrangement which existed between them. It had no control or authority over him. He was not traveling on any service for it. His time was his own, and the defendant was not paying him for it. He could use it as he saw fit, and was passing over the defendant's road entirely for his own business or pleasure. So long as he was working from day to day for the defendant, it might be said, in a popular sense, that he was in its employment; but we do not think that is the sense in which the words are used in the statute. Otherwise, if, at any time, under any circumstances, passing over the railroad on a highway crossing, on Sunday, for instance, on an errand to get a doctor for his father or a friend, he was injured by the gross negligence of the defendant's servants while engaged in its business, he would have no right of recovery. Nothing but the plainest language would warrant such a result.

Was he a passenger? The question is a more difficult one, and there is force in the argument which is urged that to hold that he was a passenger would subject the defendant to a higher degree of care towards him when traveling on its road on his own pleasure than when traveling pursuant to some purpose connected with his service as an employé. Nevertheless, we think that he must be regarded as having been a passenger. It is clear that a person may at one time be an employé when passing over a railroad, and at another time, in passing over the same road, be a passenger, though continuing all the while, in a popular sense, in the employment of the railroad company. The ticket on which the plaintiff's intestate was riding was not a mere gratuity. It furnished part of the consideration by which he was induced to enter the employment of the defendant. A ticket was given to him each month, and it contained more rides than were necessary in traveling to and from his work. It is expressly conceded that persons holding these tickets could use them for their own private interest or pleasure; and we think the result must be that the plaintiff's intestate held towards the defendant the relation of a passenger at the time when he was injured. The cases to which the defendant has referred us are distinguishable from this. Those in this state were where the plaintiff was being transported in immediate connection with his employment. Gill-shannon v. Stony Brook R. Co. 10 Cush. 228; Seaver v. Boston & M. Railroad, 14 Gray, 466; Gilman v. Eastern R. Corp. 10 Allen, 238, 87 Am. Dec. 635; O'Brien v. Boston & A. R. Co. 188 Mass. 387, 53 Am. Rep. 279. In the cases in other states the circumstances under which the injuries occurred were such that the plaintiff could at the time fairly be said to be in the employ of the defendant. Russell v. Hudson River R. Co. 17 N. Y. 134; Vick v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 267, 47 Am. Rep. 36; Abend v. Terra Haute & I. R. Co. 111 Ill. 208, 53 Am. Rep. 616; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Ryan, 82 Tex. 565; Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Phillips (Ala.) 13 So. Rep. 65; Parkinson Sugar Co. v. Riley, 50 Kan. 404; Evansville & R. Co. v. Maddux, 184 Ind. 571; Manville v. Cleveland & T. R. Co. 11 Ohio St. 417; O'Connell v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 20 Md. 212, 83 Am. Dec. 549; Hutchinson v. York, N. C. & B. R. Co. 5 Exch. 343; Tunney v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 291.

Considering the effect of the contract on the back of the ticket, the fact that the statute is a penal one must be borne in mind. The word "damages" is not used in a strictly legal sense. Sackett v. Rider, 152 Mass. 408, 9 L. R. A. 391. Damages are to be assessed not less and not more than a certain amount, and with reference to the degree of culpability of the corporation, its servants or agents. Originally, the remedy was by indictment. Afterwards it was extended to an action of tort. Stat. 1871, chap. 381, § 49; Stat. 1874, chap. 872, § 163; Stat. 1881, chap. 199, §§ 1, 6. But only one of the remedies can be pursued by the executor or administrator; and, whether the amount is received by the indictment or in an action of tort, it goes, in either case, to the widow and children or the next of kin, and the executor or administrator has no interest in it. It is, in substance, a penalty given to the widow and children and next of kin, instead of the estate, and, as such, the intestate could not release the defendant from liability for it. Com. v. Vermont & M. R. Co. 108 Mass. 7, 12. 11 Am. Rep. 301; Com. v. Boston & L. R. Co. 184 Mass. 211;

Littlejohn v. Fitchburg R. Co. 148 Mass. 478, 482, 2 L. R. A. 502. Save as a matter of convenience, the proceedings, properly enough, might be instituted by the widow and children or next of kin, if the statute permitted it, as is done in certain instances under the employer's liability act. Stat. 1887, chap. 270, § 2. We have not found it necessary to consider whether a release of damages for causing the death of a human being is or is not justified by public policy, though a recent statute has been enacted which seems to authorize such a release by express messengers. Stat. 1894, chap. 469, § 2. Upon that, however, we express no opinion.

The result is that we think that the exceptions must be overruled, and it is so ordered.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

George W. FISH

(..... R. L. ....)

The sale of standing timber by a written instrument not acknowledged or recorded as a deed amounts only to an executory contract or revocable license which is revoked by a subsequent conveyance of the land to another person.

(July 24, 1894.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings made during the trial of an action of trespass quare clausum fregit for the cutting and removal of certain trees from plaintiff's property which resulted in a verdict in favor of defendants. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. J. Arms for plaintiff.

Mr George T. Brown for defendants.

Stiness, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action of trespass quare clausum fregit was brought by the plaintiff, grantee of Nicholas Brown, to recover damages for the cutting and removal of trees from his close by the defendants, who justified under a writing, signed and sealed by said Brown, as follows, viz.: "Know all men by these present, that I, Nicholas Brown, of Coventry, R. L., have sold to Oliver H. Greene, of said Coventry, and Edward C. Capwell, of West Greenwich, R. L., all of the standing wood on a certain lot of land situated in said West Greenwich, bounded as follows: Northerly by the Greene land, so called; easterly by a wall; southerly by land of James Rathbun; and westerly by land of Edward C. Capwell,—estimated to contain ten acres; to have and to hold the same to said Greene and Capwell, their heirs, executors, and administrators, within two years from the date hereof to cut and remove said wood in, they having paid me the sum of fifty dollars, being in full for said standing wood, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged. In witness whereof, I hereunto set my hand and seal, at Coventry, R. L., Dec. 13, 1892. Nicholas Brown. (L. S.) In presence of S. W. Griffin." This instrument was not acknowledged and recorded, as required for deeds of real estate by Pub. Stat., chap. 178, §§ 3, 4. The plaintiff asked the judge to rule that this was a mere license from Brown, revocable at his will, and that his deed to Fish revoked it. The judge denied these requests, and ruled that, if the plaintiff knew of this instrument at the time he bought the land, he was bound by it, and could not maintain the action. To these rulings the plaintiff excepted, the verdict being for the defendants.

The first question is, What was the nature of the instrument? Did it convey an interest in land or not? In Greenleaf's Cruise on Real Property (page 55, § 45, note) the learned editor says: "The cases on this much-vexed question are extremely contradictory, but the principle now most generally recognized seems to be this: that in contracts for the sale of things annexed to and growing upon the freehold, if the vendee is to have a right to the soil for a time, for the purpose of further growth and profit of that which is the subject of sale, it is an interest in the land, within the meaning of the fourth section of the statute of frauds, and must be proved by writing; but where the thing is sold in prospect of separation from the soil immediately, or within reasonable and convenient time, without any stipulation for the beneficial use of the soil, but with a mere license to enter and take it away, it is to be regarded as substantially a sale of goods only, and so not within that section of the statute; although an incidental benefit may be derived to the vendee from the circumstance that the thing may remain for a time upon the land." The same distinction, between permanency of the soil and products bought with a view to their separation from it, is also stated in 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, 14th ed. § 271. In Browne on Statute of Frauds, 4th ed. §§ 235-258, this subject is very thoroughly discussed, and the general rule deduced that where the states holding such sales to be within the statute as to attempted sales being regarded as a license. The only way to reconcile the two positions would seem to be to hold that no sale was effected until the timber was delivered. In other words that a sale could not be made of standing timber.

intention is to convey a mere chattel, though it may in the interim be a part of the realty, it is not affected by the statute of frauds; but if it is to confer an exclusive right to the land for a time, for the purpose of making a profit of the growing surface, it is within the statute, and must be in writing, even though the purchaser's real profit may come from the sale of the produce of the land as a chattel. On the other hand, Judge Washburn gives, as an attempt to harmonize decisions, the result that a sale of growing trees or other fructus naturales, when they are not to be severed at once, but are to remain in the soil some definite or indefinite time, is generally regarded as a grant of an interest in the land. 8 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. 368. Mr. Benjamin states the rule in this way: that, where a sale is made which vests the property at once in the buyer before severance, a distinction is made between fructus naturales and fructus industriales, the former being an interest in the land, which is within the statute of frauds. 1 Benjamin, Sales, Kerr's ed. § 186.

We think the better reason is with the view which holds the sale to carry a chattel interest, and not an interest in the land. Evidently, the parties to a sale of standing trees, as in this case, have in mind the trees as timber, and not the land. They are not bargaining for occupation, and would not often think to clinch the trade by deed. They have contracted for wood, which happens not to have been cut; but why should a mere contract of that sort be different, in legal effect, from a contract for wood which has been cut? If, by its peculiar terms, it necessarily involves an occupation of land, there is reason for it, but not otherwise. If a man sells cut wood, he may refuse to deliver it, and become liable for a breach of contract. We see no reason why the same rule should not apply where the thing sold is standing wood, simply. What the buyer pays for and expects to get is not an interest in land, but trees severed from the land. The whole thing rests in contract. This view is supported by respectable authority. It is very clearly stated by Bigelow, Ch. J., in Drake v. Wells, 11 Allen, 141, where it is held that a sale, such as the one before us, does not pass an interest in land, but only in the trees when they are severed from the land; that it is an executory contract for the sale of chattels when they shall be cut, with a license to enter on the land for the purpose of removal. Before they are cut, the license may be revoked; otherwise it would amount to an interest in the land. In some of the cases the contract has been oral, and in others written, but we do not see that this is important; for if the sale be an executory contract, either form is sufficient. To the same effect are Silby v. Trotter, 29 N. J. Eq. 228; Herrick v. Newell, 49 Minn. 198; Poor v. Oakman, 104 Mass. 315; Cain v. McGuire, 13 B. Mon. 340; Byassee v. Reese, 4 Met. (Ky.) 873, 68 Am. Dec. 481; McClintock's App. 71 Pa. 365; Sterling v. Baldwin, 42 Vt. 306. In Owens v. Lewis, 46 Ind. 489, 15 Am. Rep. 295, there is as thorough an examination of this subject as can be found anywhere, with the conclusion that the contract for the sale of growing trees is a contract for the sale of an interest in land. See also Williams v. Flood, 68 Mich. 487.

While we must concede that this view is taken by the greater number of authorities, yet we are constrained to think that the other view—that such a sale is an executory contract for trees to be severed from the land, and so not within the statute of frauds—is much more sensible. From the nature of the transaction, it is plain that what the buyer is after is wood, not land. If so, we do not see why we should say that, by legal construction, he buys an interest in land, and not wood. The buyer has just the same rights and remedies under the contract, as we construe it, that he would have for a sale of any chattel; whereas, under a contract by parol or in writing, not conformable to the statute, if it be held to be an interest in land, he would have none at all. In this case there was a written instrument, which was substantially a deed of the trees; but, if we give effect to it as a deed of an interest in land, we must say that it is more than a deed of trees, and that it practically amounts to a lease of the land for two years, because under it the purchasers might fell the trees at once, and obstruct the use of the land for any other purpose for nearly all that time. Now, the parties have made no such express agreement. It is more reasonable to imply that the owner meant to retain the possession and use of the land, subject to the license to remove the trees, than that he virtually surrendered it under such a license. If the deed carries an interest in land, suppose the purchaser refuses to take the trees, what then? The owner of the land cannot get back the interest he has conveyed, so as to be able to deal with another, unless he also can get a deed from the purchaser. Yet who would think of a purchaser of trees making a deed back in order to clear the title. The fact is the parties have simply made a contract, and it ought to be treated as such; and putting it into the form of a deed does not make anything more than a simple contract. One party has agreed to turn a part of his realty into personality, and sell it to the other. If he had agreed to turn cattle into beef, he would not be held to convey a present interest in the cattle, and there is no greater reason to hold that in the former case he conveys a present interest in the land. Courts have frequently tried to avoid the full effect of their construction of these contracts by making a distinction between the natural growth of the land (fructus naturales) and crops produced by tillage (fructus industriales), calling the former a contract for realty, and the latter for chattels. But we see no logical ground for this distinction. They are both a part of the realty until they are severed. The fact that the policy of the law allows the latter to go to the executor or administrator as a reward for the labor of the husbandman does not change its character in the meantime. The better reason, as it seems to us, is to put both classes on the same footing, and treat them as contracts for things to be severed. Construing this contract, then, as amounting only to an executory contract or parol license, it follows that it was revocable (Foster v. Browning, 4 R. I. 47, 67 Am. Dec. 505; Owens v. Lewis, 46 Ind. 489, 15 Am. Rep. 295); and the conveyance to the plaintiff operated as a revocation, because as to him the license was void. Thurber v. Dwyer, 10 R. I. 355.

The refusal to charge as requested must therefore be held to be erroneous, and a new trial granted.

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO R. CO.,
Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A statute making a railroad company liable for damages caused by fire from a locomotive does not impair the obligation of a contract in its charter which merely authorizes the use of steam or of animal power or by mechanical power in operating the road.
2. The equal protection of laws is not denied to railroad companies by a statute making them liable for fires set by engines without regard to negligence.
3. No natural right is contravened by making a railroad company liable without regard to negligence for fires set by locomotive engines where experience has demonstrated the danger of fires from such sources.
4. A railroad company is not deprived of its property without due process of law or contrary to the law of the land by a statute making such company liable for all fires caused and communicated from locomotives.

NOTE.—Constitutionality of statutes making railroad companies absolutely liable for damage by fires set out by them or for stock killed by them, irrespective of negligence.

The courts have uniformly held statutes imposing absolute liability for fires set out by railroad locomotives to be valid or have assumed their validity as a basis for decision, and they have almost as uniformly held statutes invalid which attempted to impose absolute liability for stock killed on the track.

Fires.

A statute imposing liability for fires set out is not unconstitutional either, (1) as denying equal protection of the laws, (2) as taking property without due process of law, or (3) as impairing the contract contained in the charter. Griswell v. Housatonic R. Co. 54 Conn. 447.

In Union Pac. R. Co. v. DeBuak, 8 L. R. A. 350, 12 Colo. 294, the question of the constitutionality of a law imposing absolute liability for destruction of property by fire was fully discussed and the law was upheld with the remark that the statute was but a re-enactment of the common law on the subject.

That case was followed in Denver. T. & G. R. Co. v. DeGraff, 2 Colo. App. 42; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Arthur, 2 Colo. App. 199; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Tracy, (Colo.) Jan. 15, 1894.

The South Carolina statute makes the railroad company liable for the burning of all property to which the fire is set by its locomotives, unless it was put on its right of way without its consent, and it has been held constitutional in McCandless v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 18 L. R. A. 440, 38 S. C. 103; Hunter v. Columbia, N. & L. R. Co. (S. C.) March 14, 1894; Lipfeld v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. (S. C.) April 19, 1894.

And the validity of the law had been assumed in the prior case of Thompson v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 24 S. C. 366.

A statute imposing absolute liability for fire does 35 L. R. A.

5. Absolute liability and not merely a prima facie liability is created for fires set by locomotives under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 261A, declaring that each railroad corporation "shall be responsible" in such cases.

6. The known judicial construction of a statute by courts of another state is deemed to be adopted by the legislature when it adopts such statute.

7. The opinion of a witness that trees, shrubs, plants, and vines are by their inherent nature not susceptible to insurance is not admissible since the judge and jury are as competent in respect to that question as any witness.

8. Allowing weeds to grow on one's premises cannot be held to be contributory negligence which will defeat the liability of a railroad company for a fire communicated from a locomotive, especially under the statute which makes the railroad company an insurer against fires thus caused.

9. A railroad company is not entitled to any part of the insurance contracted for and collected by the owner of property destroyed by a fire communicated from a railroad locomotive, although the railroad company is given by a statute an insurable interest in such not interfere with the right of congress to regulate interstate commerce. Smith v. Boston & M. Railroad, 68 N. H. 25.

In Martin v. New York & N. E. R. Co., 62 Conn. 340, the court upheld a statute making the railroad company liable irrespective of the question of negligence, on the ground that it rested on broad grounds of justice and equity. But the Connecticut statute fixes the liability of the railroad only in case of absence of contributory negligence of the property owner.

In Simmonds v. New York & N. E. R. Co., 52 Conn. 264, the court held the railroad company liable, where its men, at the request of the owner of the property first ignited, ceased their attempts to put out the fire, which they could easily have done, and the fire then spread to the property of a third person, who brought suit for the injury done him.

The validity of a statute imposing absolute liability for the destruction of property by fire has been assumed in Massachusetts. Trask v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 16 Gray, 71; Ingersoll v. Stockbridge & P. R. Co. 8 Allen, 438; Safford v. Boston & M. Railroad, 103 Mass. 583; Pierce v. Worcester & N. R. Co. 105 Mass. 199; Basett v. Connecticut River R. Co. 145 Mass. 129.

And the same is true in New Hampshire. Hooksett v. Concord Railroad, 38 N. H. 242; Adden v. White Mountains N. H. R. Co. 55 N. H. 413, 20 Am. Rep. 220; Rowell v. Railroad Co. 57 N. H. 123.

And in Connecticut. Began v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 60 Conn. 124.

In Iowa it has been held that a statute making railroad companies absolutely liable for fires set out by their locomotives may be upheld under the police power. Rodemacher v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 297, 20 Am. Rep. 592.

This ground of decision is not concurred in by all the courts.

In Small v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 50 Iowa, 340, property with the right to insure it for its own protection.

10. Including in damages for condemnation an allowance for the danger of fires by operation of the railroad will not prevent the owner of the property from recovering for its loss by subsequent fire communicated from the railroad locomotives, as the original damages were compensation for the depreciation to the value of the property.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for losses sustained by fire set out by defendant's locomotive. Affirmed.

Statement by Gantt, J.:

This is an action for damages caused by the destruction and injury to plaintiff's property, a suburban residence and grounds near the city of St. Louis, in St. Louis county, by fire alleged to have been set out by an engine operated by the defendant on its railroad. The petition contains two counts; the first being an action at common law, charging "that on the 9th day of August, 1887, and for a long time prior thereto, defendant negligently suffered a large amount of dry grass, weeds, and rubbish to accumulate and remain upon and along its railway and right of way adjoining the land of the plaintiff, and used and employed, in operating said railway, locomotive engines and other machinery that were improperly and negligently constructed, so that sparks of fire could and did needlessly escape said engine," and that by reason of such negligence fire was communicated to said dry grass, weeds, and rubbish, and extended to plaintiff's land, and destroyed a dwelling house, barn, outbuildings, personal property therein, trees, and shrubbery, of the value of $30,000, for which judgment is prayed. The second count is based upon the statute (Rev. Stat. 1889, §2615), and charges that the defendant owned and operated a railroad adjoining plaintiff's land, "having locomotive engines in use on the same, and on said 9th day of August, 1887, fire was communicated from a locomotive engine then in use upon said railroad, owned and operated by defendant as aforesaid, to plaintiff's property on his said land," and then avers the destruction of the same property, of the same value as charged in the first count, and avers damages in, and prays judgment for, the same amount.

The answer admits the incorporation of defendant, and the operation of the line of railway described in the petition, and the use of however, the Iowa statute was held to establish only a prima facie liability.

In Stearns v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co., 46 Me. 95, the validity of the law was attacked, but it was upheld without much discussion as to its validity on the part of the court.

And the Maine statute was held valid in Thatcher v. Maine Cent. R. Co. 85 Me. 502.

In Hart v. Western R. Co., 13 Met. 99, 46 Am. Dec. 119, the Massachusetts statute was enforced without its validity being questioned.

And in Lyman v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 4 Cush. 383, it was held to apply to roads created before its enactment.

In Ross v. Boston & W. R. Co., 6 Allen, 87, however, it seems to be assumed that under the Massachusetts statute the owner of the property must have been in the exercise of due care in order to entitle him to recovery.

And in Perley v. Eastern R. Co., 98 Mass. 414, 98 Am. Dec. 645, the question was discussed as to whether or not back fires contributed to the loss for which the suit was brought.

Contributory negligence is not a defense. Denver, T. & G. R. Co. v. De Graff, 2 Colo. App. 42; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Arthur, 2 Colo. App. 159.

Unless it is intentional. Union, Pac. D. & G. R. Co. v. Williams (Colo.) Oct. 24, 1893.

But the Colorado court has refused to base a recovery entirely upon presumption and has held that the facts as to the origin of the fire must be proved and not left to inference. Denver, T. & G. R. Co. v. DeGraff, 2 Colo. App. 42.

As to the general rule of liability for setting fires which spread to the property of others, see note to Brown v. Brooks (Wis.) 21 L. R. A. 255.]

Killing stock.

In analogy to the statutes imposing absolute liability for setting out fire some of the states enacted statutes which attempted to impose an absolute liability for the value of livestock killed on the track. There is ground for making a distinction between the two classes of cases in that the livestock cannot be killed unless it is trespassing on the 25 L. R. A.

track, while in the case of the fire the owner of the property may be entirely without fault beyond his misfortune in owning property in proximity to the railroad. In some of the earlier cases under stock killing laws the validity of the laws was assumed or at least not denied.

Thus, in Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Peacock, 25 Ala. 229, a liability was enforced under a stock killing law, but the question of its constitutionality was not considered.

And a similar result was reached in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Lujan, 6 Colo. 338.

So the cases of Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Henderson, 10 Colo. 1; Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Zastrow, 10 Colo. 4; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Sternberg, 13 Colo. 141,—were each based on the stock-killing law, but failed because plaintiff had not on his part complied with the provisions of the statute.

Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Betts, 10 Colo. 431, was an action based on the Colorado stock-killing act, and while the validity of the act does not seem to have been attacked, the judgment against the company was reversed on other grounds.

In Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Stewart, 1 Colo. App. 227, the court refused to apply the stock-killing law on the ground that at the time of the killing the stock was running at large contrary to the provisions of a statute.

But when the validity of the laws was questioned they speedily fell upon various constitutional grounds.

A statute which makes a railroad company absolutely liable for killing animals is unconstitutional as depriving the company of property without due process of law. Zeigler v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 56 Ala. 594.

The authority of that case was recognized in Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Lyon, 62 Ala. 71.

A law imposing absolute liability for the value of stock killed on the track is unconstitutional. Jensen v. Union Pac. R. Co. 4 L. R. A. 724, 6 Utah, 238; Bielenburg v. Montana Union R. Co. 2 L. R. A. 813, 8 Mont. 271; Thompson v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 8 Mont. 279.

A statute making the killing of stock a misde-locomotive engines thereon, and denies generally every other allegation in the petition, and then, as special defenses to each count of the petition, avers: "(1) That plaintiff has assigned to persons to this defendant unknown his right of action against this defendant, if any he ever had, and is neither a necessary nor proper party plaintiff herein, and is not the real party in interest, and is not, therefore, entitled to maintain or prosecute this action. (2) That there is a defect of plaintiff, in this, to wit, that the Detroit Fire & Marine Insurance Company, the Commercial Union Insurance Company, and the Imperial Fire Insurance Company, and each and every one of them, are parties in interest in this case, and are necessary parties plaintiff herein. (3) That, on the date and at the time in the petition mentioned, there were growing and standing upon the property in said petition described, adjacent to and continuous from the right of way of defendant to the house, shrubbery, and trees of plaintiff in his petition described, large quantities of dry grass, leaves, weeds, and other combustible and highly inflammable matter, which were carelessly and negligently allowed to grow and accumulate upon said premises by and with the knowledge and consent of plaintiff; that the accumulation of dry, combustible, and highly inflammable matter as aforesaid had been carelessly and negligently allowed to remain upon said premises for a long time previous to the 9th day of August, 1887, to wit, for many years; that it was gross negligence for plaintiff to allow said dry and combustible matter to accumulate and remain upon the said premises without taking precautions to prevent the spread of fire which might accidentally be set upon the right of way of defendant railway company, or which might accidentally escape from passing engines, which said negligence of plaintiff did proximately and directly contribute to the injuries of which he complains. (4) That the said dwelling house, barn, and outbuildings in the petition described were on the 9th day of August, 1887, insured in certain insurance companies named in the answer for the aggregate sum of $10,000, which, as defendant avers, was greatly in excess of the real value of said dwelling house, barn, and outbuildings; that said insurance companies, after the fire in plaintiff's petition alleged, paid to said plaintiff the sum of $10,000 on account of the loss sustained by reason of the burning of said dwelling house, barn, and outbuildings as aforesaid. Wherefore, defendant says that the sum so paid by the said insurance companies as aforesaid should be applied pro tanto to the satisfaction of plaintiff's claim, if any he has, which defendant denies."

And the answer, in addition to the above counts, which are common to both counts of the petition, contains the following counts, meanor and subjecting the officials of the road to indictment unless they pay the damages to the owner within a certain time is unconstitutional. State v. Divine, 98 N. C. 778.

A statute imposing absolute liability for cattle killed on a railroad without any negligence or default on the part of the owner of the road is unconstitutional. Cateril v. Union Pac. R. Co. 2 Idaho, 540.

The statute making the railroad company absolutely liable in double damages for killing stock is unconstitutional. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Outcalt, 2 Colo. App. 386.

A law making railroad companies liable for cattle killed by them at a value to be fixed by appraisal is unconstitutional as depriving them of the right of trial by jury. Graves v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 5 Mont. 553, 51 Am. Rep. 81; Dacres v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 1 Wash. 525.

In Wadsworth v. Union Pac. R. Co., 28 L. R. A. 612, 18 Colo. 600, the court had before it the question of the validity of the stock-killing law, and held it unconstitutional; but it states: "We do not decide that the legislature has not the power to enact a valid statute making railroad companies liable for domestic animals killed or damaged by the operation of their trains irrespective of the question of negligence." They then stated that as there was no duty to fence, the statute could not be enforced as a penalty, and that the mode of ascertaining the value of the property destroyed was unconstitutional.

It has generally been held that the companies could lawfully be compelled to fence their tracks (see authorities collected in note to State v. Chicago, M. & N. R. Co. (Wia.) 12 L. R. A. 180) and that for refusal to comply with the statute they might be subjected to the penalty of paying for stock killed by reason of the failure. In some instances an attempt has been made to impose an absolute liability upon the companies for the killing of stock from which they might relieve themselves by fencing.

a statute was held valid which imposed an absolute liability on the company for killing stock, but provided that such liability might be escaped by erecting a lawful fence.

The same rule was followed in Hopkins v. Kansas Pac. R. Co., 18 Kan. 462, and Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Harper, 19 Kan. 520.

But in Washington a statute imposing absolute liability for stock killed in case the road was not fenced was held unconstitutional in Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Smalley, 1 Wash. 206, there being no law in terms requiring the fencing of the road.

There are several other instances in which an absolute liability is imposed as a penalty for failure to comply with some statutory requirement. An illustration is where a lookout is required to be kept on the track ahead of the train, failure to do which subjects the company to liability for injuries caused thereby. The authorities on that subject are collected in the note to Smith v. Norfolk & Southern R. Co. (N. C.) post, 267. There is, however, a clear distinction between these cases on the imposition of absolute liability with no violation of duty, and that class of authorities are therefore not valuable upon the latter question. There are, however, two analogous cases which may be stated here as throwing light on the subject.

In Nebraska it has been held that a statute imposing absolute liability on a railroad company for injuries received by a passenger, unless he is guilty of criminal negligence or has violated some express rule or regulation of the road, is valid. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Porter, (Neb.) Nov. 8, 1893.

That statute was enforced in Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Baler, 37 Neb. 236, and Omaha & S. V. R. Co. v. Chollette, 38 Neb. 143.

But in Illinois it was held that a law making railroad companies liable for the expenses necessary in connection with the disposal of the bodies of persons who die or are killed on its cars is unconstitutional. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Lackey, 73 Ill. 55.

H. P. F.

which are addressed to the second count of the petition only: "(5) Defendant avers that the alleged cause of action set forth in the second count of the petition is founded on an act of the legislature of the state of Missouri entitled 'An act to establish the responsibilities of railroad companies and persons owning or operating railroads for damages by fire communicated by locomotive engines,' approved March 31, 1887, which act defendant avers is illegal, unconstitutional, and void, in that it seeks to deprive the defendant of its property without due process of law, and is contrary to the provisions of section 30, article 2, of the Constitution of the state of Missouri. (6) That the said act of the legislature is illegal, unconstitutional, and void, in that it denies the defendant the equal protection of the law, contrary to the provisions of section 1, article 14, of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and in this: that it deprives defendant of its property without due process of law, contrary to the provisions of article 5 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and in this: that it impairs the obligations of a contract made between the state of Missouri and defendant, by the terms of which it was impliedly agreed that said defendant might and could use fire for the purpose of generating steam to propel locomotive engines, and cars attached thereto, and be responsible only for the negligent and careless use thereof; and is contrary to the provisions of article 1, section 10, of the Constitution of the United States. (7) That heretofore, to wit, on the 1st day of June, A. D. 1882, the plaintiff was the owner of the land described in his petition and also of a certain strip of land along and adjacent to the west side of said tract, 100 feet wide, being the same strip of land now occupied by defendant's roadbed and right of way, that defendant was desirous of building its road upon said strip. That plaintiff and defendant could not agree as to the amount of compensation to be paid to plaintiff for said strip, and defendant commenced proceedings in the circuit court of St. Louis county against plaintiff, the object and nature of which was to condemn a right of way upon said strip, and through and along plaintiff's said land. That commissioners were duly appointed by said circuit court of St. Louis county, before whom the matter of compensation of plaintiff was to be heard, and before whom was then and there pending, among other things, the question of how much compensation plaintiff should receive from defendant—First, for actual amount of ground taken; second, for the injury to the property as a place of residence, caused by running the road where it now runs; third, for cutting up or dividing the property then owned by plaintiff into detached portions; fourth, for danger of fire for all time to come. That thereafter, to wit, on the 1st day of July, A. D. 1882, the said matters so pending before said commissioners were all compromised and settled between plaintiff and defendant upon the agreement that in consideration of all of said matters the defendant should pay plaintiff the sum of nine thousand dollars, in full payment, settlement, accord, and satisfaction of said right of way and said strip of land, and all the matters and things so pending before said commissioners as aforesaid. That thereafter, to wit, on the 15th day of July, A. D. 1882, defendant, for the consideration aforesaid, paid to said Leonard Mathews, and said Leonard Mathews received from the defendant, the said sum of nine thousand dollars, pursuant to and in compliance with said contract and agreement. Wherefore, defendant says the plaintiff ought not to prosecute or maintain said cause of action in said second count set out."

The replication was a general denial of all new matter set up in the answer.

Upon the trial, and when the plaintiff first offered testimony in his behalf, the defendant objected to the introduction of any testimony for the reasons "(1) that the petition does not state a cause of action; (2) that, in the first count, plaintiff has not specifically pleaded; (3) that he has combined two causes of action in one count, involving different rules of evidence, and different measures of damage; (4) that the law on which the second count is based is unconstitutional." These objections were overruled, and exceptions duly saved by defendant, and thereupon defendant moved the court to require plaintiff to elect between the two counts in his petition, "because the measure of damages in the alleged causes of action set forth in said petition are totally different, and because a different, and not the same, proof is required to support each of the said alleged causes of action." This motion was by the court overruled, and exception duly saved by defendant.

The testimony on the part of plaintiff tended to show that the plaintiff was the owner of a piece of real estate lying between the Pacific Railroad on the north, and the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway on the south, Holmes avenue on the west, and the property of Anderson on the east; the northern part of this tract, containing about eleven and one half acres, and lying between the Pacific Railroad and Elliott avenue, was called the "Home Place," and was bounded by osage orange hedges on the south, east, and west. This home place had been improved and planted on plans prepared by a landscape gardener, and contained a large assortment of all kinds of ornamental trees, shrubbery, and plants, as well as fruit trees and vines. There was on it a large dwelling, of nineteen rooms,—the front or main building made of concrete, and the rear building of frame, in imitation of stone; also, a large barn of 75 feet in length by 30 feet in width, with a bowling alley therein, and a cow-shed attachment. There were also one or more outbuildings of no very considerable value, and in the house, barn, and bowling alley, some personal property, to the amount of probably two or three hundred dollars in value. As is generally the case, the testimony as to the value of this house and barn, and of the property as a whole, with its improvements by planting, etc., was conflicting; plaintiff's witnesses putting the value of the house and barn alone as high as $18,000, and the value of the shrubbery, etc., destroyed, as high as $6,000. On the afternoon of August 9, 1887, at a time when everything was very dry, a fire started along the railroad track and on the railroad right of way adjoining plaintiff's property, and at a point southeast of the barn, and was carried by a south or southeast wind, with great rapidity, into plaintiff's property, set fire to the barn, and then to the house and out-buildings, and ran pretty much over the whole place, destroying the buildings, and much the larger part of the trees, plants, shrubbery, vines, etc. Albert B. Chandler testified: He was at home, south of the railroad, opposite Mr. Mathews' place, on the day of the fire. It started near where Elliott avenue crosses the railroad, and swept up the railroad bank there, and caught the Mathews barn, and burned it down, and the shingles flew from the barn, and burned the house. After the fire, he went down, and saw ashes on the track, and saw where the fire had burned up the bank. He stirred the ashes, and there were a few coals. When he first observed the fire, it was going up the railroad bank. Samuel K. Harding testified that on the 9th day of August, 1887, he was a brakeman in the employ of the defendant, and on that day was braking on a train which was called the "Hoodlum," and which passed plaintiff's place about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and when it passed there he was on the rear part of the train, and saw some grass on fire on the defendant's right of way, opposite the Mathews place, about six or eight feet from the ends of the ties, on the bank in the cut. This fire was about three feet across. The engine gave out a great many sparks. He had noticed before that it gave out sparks. He had been running on that train since the 1st of August. The place was occupied by plaintiff as a residence up to 1880, when he removed to St. Louis, leaving a man named Cleary in charge of the place. Cleary lived in the back part of the house, and took care of the place, till 1885, when it was rented to a Mr. Wright, who lived there until September, 1884, from which time until the fire the place was vacant, except that some member of plaintiff's family would go out once in a while, and sometimes stay all night, and sometimes a week or two. After the fire, plaintiff sold the place for $9,000. There was verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $11,000. In due time, motions for a new trial and an arrest of judgment were filed, heard, and overruled, and defendant appealed to this court.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Among the grounds assigned for the reversal of the judgment of the circuit court, is the unconstitutionality of section 2615 of the Revised Statutes of 1889 (Laws 1887, p. 101), which is as follows: "Each railroad corporation owning or operating a railroad in this state shall be responsible in damages to every person and corporation whose property may be injured or destroyed by fire communicated directly or indirectly by locomotive engines in use upon the railroad owned or operated by such railroad corporation, and each such railroad corporation shall have an insurable interest in the property upon the route of the railroad owned or operated by it, and may procure insurance thereon in its own behalf for its protection against such damages." It is argued by counsel that this act is unconstitutional for three reasons: "It impairs the obligation of a contract; it deprives defendant of its property without due process of law; it denies to defendant the equal protection of the laws." The defendant is a railroad corporation organized under the general laws of this state on the 10th of September, 1875, and prior to the passage of section 2615. The contention of defendant raises a question of prime importance, and has received our most careful consideration.

Does section 2615 impair the obligation of the contract made by the state in the grant of defendant's charter? The claim is that it interferes with the right of defendant, granting in the sixth paragraph of section 2543, Rev. Stat. 1889, to propel its cars by steam, in subjecting it to an increased burden or liability for fires set out by its locomotives. Said paragraph is as follows: "Sixth. To take and convey persons and property on their railroad by the power or force of steam or of animals, or by any mechanical power, and to receive compensation therefor." Defendant insists that because there was no statute in force at the time it was organized, which would render it liable for damages by fire in the absence of proof or presumption that it had been guilty of negligence in the operation of its trains, the construction of its engines, or the care of its right of way, and because the decisions of this court prior to the adoption of this section had never held it liable in such cases save for negligence, the law on this subject, as then understood, became part of its charter, and hence inviolable, under the Constitution of the United States.

It is wholly unnecessary to review the decisions which sustain the view adopted in the Dartmouth College Case,—that defendant's charter is a contract between it and the state. It has been uniformly followed by this court. This ground has been gone over so often, and this limitation so thoroughly discussed, that nothing new can be said on the subject. Says Judge Cooley, in his great work on Constitutional Limitations (6th ed. chap. 18, pp. 707, 708): "The occasions to consider this subject in its bearings upon the clause of the constitution of the United States which forbids the states passing any laws impairing the obligation of contracts have been frequent and varied; and it has been held, without dissent, that this clause does not so far remove from state control the rights and properties which depend for their existence or enforcement upon contracts as to relieve them from the operation of such general regulations for the good government of the state and the protection of the rights of individuals as may be deemed important." "All contracts and all rights, it is declared, are subject to this power; and not only may regulations which affect them be established by the state, but all such regulations must be subject to change from time to time as the general well-being of the community may require, or as the circumstances may change, or as experience may demonstrate the necessity." "Perhaps the most striking illustration of the principle here stated will be found among the judicial decisions which have held that the rights insured to private corporations by their charters, and the manner of their exercise, are subject to such new regulations as from time to time may be made by the state with a view to the public protection, health, and safety, and in order to guard properly the rights of other individuals and corporations. Although these charters are to be regarded as contracts, and the rights assured by them are inviolable, it does not follow that these rights are at once, by force of the charter contract, removed from the sphere of state regulations, and that the charter implies an undertaking on the part of the state that in the same way in which their exercise is permissible at first, and under the regulations then existing, and those only, may the corporators continue to exercise their rights while the artificial existence continues." "The obligation of the contract by no means extends so far; but on the contrary the rights and privileges which come into existence under it are placed upon the same footing with other legal rights and privileges of the citizen, and subject in like manner to proper rules for their due regulation, protection, and enjoyment." To this clear, lucid statement of the rule deduced from the decisions, little can be added, save to point out the various statutes that have been held to be legitimate exercise of the police power inherent in the several states, which cannot be taken from them, in whole or in part, and cannot be exercised by congress.

This identical question was before this court in Gorman v. Pacific Railroad Co., 26 Mo. 441, 73 Am. Dec. 220. That was an action to recover the value of three head of cattle killed by the railroad company. It was alleged they were killed at a point on the road where it ran through inclosed fields: that defendant had failed to erect and maintain fences as required by law; that the cattle were killed by reason of this failure. The company denied that it was subject to the Law of 1853, requiring railroad companies to fence their roads where they passed over inclosed fields. It was conceded that the company's charter antedated the Act of 1853, and, moreover, that the legislature, by the Act of March 1, 1851, had yielded the right to suspend or repeal its charter. Sess. Acts 1851, p. 270, § 4. Judge Scott wrote the opinion of the court, and conceded that the charter was a contract between the state and the company, but held, notwithstanding, that the corporation, like natural persons, was subject to those regulations which the state may prescribe for the good government of the community. He says: "Where such dangerous and powerful agents as steam engines are brought into use, there should be a power in the legislature to prescribe such reasonable regulations as will prevent injuries resulting from their employment." "The foresight of man is not competent to the task of prescribing in a charter all the regulations which time may show to be necessary for the security of the interests of the people of the state against injuries caused by the introduction of new, powerful, and dangerous agents for carrying on her intercourse and commerce." The charter must be taken subject to the understanding that in its operation, affecting the interests of society, it will be, like individuals, liable to be controlled by such reasonable enactments as may be dictated by a sense of what is required for the preservation of the persons, lives, and property of the people, such enactments not contravening the expressed or plainly implied provisions of the charter." He cited with approval the case of Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co., 27 Vt. 140, 63 Am. Dec. 625, in which Judge Redfield firmly and ably sustained the power of the state legislature to impose upon existing railroad companies the duty of maintaining fences, and to construct and maintain cattleguards, as clearly within the police power of the state. The court also cited with approval the decision of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts in Lyman v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 4 Cush. 288, in which it was held that a statute "making the proprietors of railroads responsible for injuries by fire communicated from their locomotive engines applied to railroads established before as well as since its passage, and extends as well to estates, a part of which is conveyed by the owner, as to those of which a part is taken by authority of law for the purposes of a railroad." This statute of Massachusetts enacted in 1840 was the first to render the railroad companies liable for fires put out by their locomotives. It is important to note that the point was made in this first case that the act did not apply to charters granted before its passage, but the claim was denied, the court saying in its opinion that the act was "one of those general remedial acts passed for the more effectual protection of property against the hazards to which it has become subject by the introduction of the steam engine." "The right to use the parcel of land appropriated to a railroad does not deprive the legislature of the power to enact such regulations and impose such liabilities for injuries suffered from the mode of using the road as the occasion and circumstances may reasonably justify." This Act of 1840 has again and again been held valid, and enforced, by the supreme court of Massachusetts, and its constitutionality never seriously questioned since the first case. Hart v. Western R. Corp. 13 Met. 99, 46 Am. Rep. 719; Ross v. Boston & W. R. Co. 6 Allen, 87; Pierce v. Worcester & N. R. Co. 105 Mass. 199. The Massachusetts act was adopted by the legislature of Maine in 1842, and sustained by the supreme court of Maine in Chapman v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co. 87 Me. 92, and in Pratt v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co. 43 Me. 579, as binding equally upon corporations whose charters were granted prior to its enactment as to those subsequently organized. The act was adopted by New Hampshire as early as 1850, and enforced by its highest court, in Hooksett v. Concord Railroad, 88 N. H. 242. It became the law of Iowa in 1878 (Code 1878, § 1289), and received a most careful consideration by the supreme court of that state in Rodemacher v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 297, 20 Am. Rep. 592, and its constitutionality unanimously affirmed, as a valid exercise of the police power of the state, and applied as well to a company incorporated prior to the enactment as to one subsequently chartered. Drady v. Des Moines & Ft. D. R. Co. 57 Iowa, 398. The state of Connecticut also adopted the Massachusetts statute, in effect, in 1881. The constitutionality of the statute was challenged in Grissell v. Housatonic R. Co., 54 Conn. 447, and fully sustained by the supreme court of that state. A statute similar in principle was upheld by the supreme court of Colorado in Union Pac. R. Co. v. De Busk, 12 Colo. 294, 8 L. R. A. 350. In Ohio & M. R. Co. v. McClelland, 25 Ill. 140, an act requiring all railroads that were open for use to be fenced, and imposing a penalty for non-compliance, was considered; and it was held constitutional, the court saying, "To hold otherwise would be to say that the legislature might create an imperium in imperio."

These decisions all agree that subsequent acts imposing the duty to fence, and affixing penalties for a failure, are clearly within the police power of the state, subject to which all laws are enacted in this state; and yet those acts imposed a burden and cost upon the roads, not named in their charters. These laws require the companies, at their own expense, to erect and maintain these fences along their roads. They are sustained on the ground that experience demonstrated that the operation of the roads with steam engines resulted in great loss to the adjoining owners, in the destruction of their stock lawfully running in their fields, and was liable to cause loss of life, by wrecking trains. The damage by fires set out by trains comes within the same reasoning. It had not been anticipated to what extent engines would destroy the crops and property along the road, but when it was demonstrated that it was a common occurrence; that the company had the right to run its trains at all times of day and night; and that the injured party was powerless, often, to show negligence, on account of his inability to show what particular train had set out the fire, or the particular cause of the fire; and because the owner was entirely innocent, in the premises, of any negligence,—it was determined by the legislature that, when one of two innocent parties must suffer, the one who operated the dangerous agency should suffer the loss. Notwithstanding the great weight of authority that such an act is within the police power of the state, the defendant challenges it here. We are, however, not impressed with its reasons to the contrary. If the state is powerless to protect its citizens from the ravages of fires set out by agencies created by itself, then it fails to meet one of the essentials of a good government. Certainly, it fails in the protection of property. The argument of the defendant, reduced to its last analysis, is this: The state authorized the railroad companies to propel cars by steam. To generate steam, they are compelled to use fire. Therefore, they can lawfully use fire, and, as they are pursuing a lawful business, they are only liable for negligence in its operation, and when, in a given case, they can demonstrate they are guilty of no negligence, then they cannot be made liable. To this the citizen answers: "I also own my land lawfully. I have the right to grow my crops, and erect buildings on it, at any place I choose. I did not set in motion any dangerous machinery. You say you are guiltless of negligence. It results, then, that the state, which owes me protection to my property from others, has chartered an agency which, be it ever so careful and cautious and prudent, inevitably destroys my property, and yet denies me all redress. The state has no right to take or damage my property without just compensation." But, what the state cannot do directly, it attempts to do indirectly, through the charters granted to railroads, if defendant's contention be true. When it was demonstrated that although the railroads exercised every precaution in the construction of their engines, the choice of their operatives, and clearing their rights of way of all combustibles, still fire was emitted from their engines, and the citizen's property burned notwithstanding his efforts to extinguish it, and notwithstanding he had in no way contributed to setting it out, it is perfectly competent for the state to require the company who set out the fire to pay his damages. He is as much entitled to the protection from fire set out by engines as he is against the killing of his stock by those engines. Neither of these remedies was foreseen, as necessary when the charters were granted, but experience has shown both are now necessary for the protection of the citizen; and the organic law of the state prescribed, before defendant obtained its charter, that "the exercise of the police power of the state shall never be abridged, or so construed as to permit corporations to conduct their business in such manner as to infringe the equal rights of individuals, or the general well being of the state." Mo. Const. art. 12, § 5. Let it be conceded, for it is true, that, prior to the enactment of section 2615, by the decisions of this and other courts, defendant was only liable for negligence in setting out fire. Is it to be concluded that the legislature is powerless to enact laws which will give ample protection to citizens against fires? Most certainly not. Fire, as one of the most dangerous elements, has ever been the subject of legislative control. It ought not to excite surprise among a people, the great body of whose laws had their origin in England, that those who set out fires which destroy the property of others should be held absolutely responsible for them. Such was the ancient common law, before any statutes were enacted. "If my fire, by misfortune, burns the goods of another man, he shall have his action on the case against me. If a fire breaks out suddenly in my house, I not knowing it, and it burns my goods, and also my neighbor's house, he shall have his action on the case against me. So if the fire is caused by a servant or a guest, or any person who entered the house with my consent; but otherwise if it is caused by a stranger, who entered the house against my will." Rolle, Abr. Action on the Case, B, title, Mra. Under ordinary circumstances, this was thought to be a harsh rule, and it was not generally adopted by the courts of the several states; but the question we are discussing is not what the courts have generally regarded as the reasonable rule, but what is the power of the lawmaking power to adopt as a correct one? In considering it, the dangerous character of fire must be kept in mind. Many laws have been sustained which were enacted to prevent destruction of property by fire, which at first blush seemed arbitrary, and infringing on natural right. Thus, the owner of a lot in a city may desire to build a frame or wooden building upon it, but the municipal corporation may establish fire limits, and prevent the building of wooden buildings. Charleston v. Reed, 27 W. Va. 681, 55 Am. Rep. 336; King v. Davenport, 98 Ill. 805, 88 Am. Rep. 89; Knoxville v. Bird, 12 Lea, 121, 47 Am. Rep. 826.

Counsel, in his brief, with great earnestness, insists that "no law can be sustained as a police regulation which imposes a penalty or confers an action for doing that which has never been declared unlawful, and which, on the contrary, is made legal." But has not counsel gone too far in his assumption? Is there anything in defendant's charter that exonerates it from damage by fire it may set out, or permits it to destroy with impunity? If there is, would not the charter itself be liable to the charge of unconstitutionality? Evansville & C. R. Co. v. Dick, 9 Ind. 483. The right to use steam is granted, but it is granted subject to the right of the state to render the company liable for damages it may do in the use. The position of the defendant is that the law of the state permitting it to use steam in the operation of its trains is a protection from liability for fire set out by its engines, provided it is guilty of no negligence; and he invokes the principle that what the law authorizes cannot be a nuisance, although it may result in damages to individual rights or property. That there are cases where corporations acting in the performance of a public duty imposed upon them by the legislature, or in the exercise of a right conferred by law, and where persons appointed or authorized by law to perform a public duty or to do acts of a public character, are not responsible for consequential damages, if they act within their jurisdiction, and are guilty of no negligence or want of care, is certainly true. The cases sustaining this rule will generally be found to be those where municipal corporations were engaged in grading and improving public streets or highways, or where the act causing the injury was done by a corporation in the construction of its works upon property acquired under the power of eminent domain. Northern Transp. Co. of Ohio v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 636, 25 L. ed. 836; Uline v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 101 N. Y. 98, 58 Am. Rep. 123, 54 Am. Rep. 661; Conklin v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. 102 N. Y. 107; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 671.

But there is another rule of law, that has passed into a canon of construction, and of great utility in these days, when nearly all the business affairs of the country are carried on under corporate authority, and it is this: That "in the construction of grants by the legislature, whether public or private, only such rights and powers can be exercised under them as are clearly comprehended within the words of the act, or derived therefrom by necessary implication, regard being had to the object of the grant." Carroll v. Campbell, 108 Mo. 550; Fanning v. Gregoire, 57 U. S. 16 How. 534, 14 L. ed. 1047; Minturn v. Larue, 64 U. S. 28 How. 485, 16 L. ed. 574. "And the rule is now established that the statutory authority which will justify an injury to private property and afford immunity for acts which would otherwise be a nuisance, must be express, or must be a clear and unquestionable implication from powers expressly conferred, and it must appear that the legislature contemplated the doing of the very act which occasioned the injury." Bohan v. Port Jervis Gas Light Co. 123 N. Y. 18, 9 L. R. A. 711; Cogswell v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 103 N. Y. 10, 57 Am. Rep. 701; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 817, 27 L. ed. 789; Hill v. Metropolitan Asylum Dist. Managers, L. R. 4 Q. B. Div. 483, 6 App. Cas. 218.

In the case last cited, Lord Watson said: "When the terms of the statute are not imperative, but permissive; when it is left to the discretion of the persons empowered to determine whether the general powers committed to them shall be put to execution or not,—I think the fair inference is that the legislature intended that discretion to be exercised in strict conformity with private rights, and did not intend to confer license to commit nuisance in any place which might be selected."

It may be remarked that in the grant to defendant it is nowhere imperatively required and compelled, as argued by its counsel, to use steam. Its charter permits it "to convey persons by the force of steam or animals, or by any mechanical power." To charge that the legislature ever intended, by this grant, to authorize defendant to destroy the property of the adjoining landowners by the use of fire, and deny them redress therefor according to well-settled principles of the common-law, as evidenced by numerous decisions both in England and in the highest courts of this country, would be an imputation upon their sense of justice, and contrary to the ordinary rules of construction of such grants. No good reason can be shown, in my opinion, why the companies organized under this act should not be liable for the damage occasioned by their use of highly dangerous machinery; but most certainly the hands of all subsequent legislatures have not been so securely tied that they may not adopt a just and equitable rule in such cases, and not be charged with impairing the obligation of the state's contract with the railroad companies organized under the general law. Although the decisions of this court only held landowners liable for fire set out by negligence, when this charter was granted, still there is nothing in the state or federal constitutions that can restrict the state to those regulations, and those only, existing at the time; but it has the right, in order to guard the property of its citizens along these roads, to adopt new regulations from time to time, as the necessity may require. The state has, and can have, no higher function than the duty to provide for the safety of its citizens and their property. All laws and all charters are passed subject to this duty, wherever it may arise.

Having come to the conclusion that this section in no wise impairs the obligation of the contract made in defendant's charter, we are brought to the next contention,—that defendant is deprived of the equal protection of the law.

That the statute is not open to this serious charge, we think is clear. Defendant is brought into the same courts that are provided for other corporations and natural persons; upon the same process, and the plaintiff is required to make out his case according to the law of the land. If it could be shown that this statute imposes a burden upon railroads from which it exempts others under the same or similar circumstances, then it would be open to the criticism that it deprived the railroads of the equal protection of the law. But if the circumstances are different; if no other person, natural or artificial, is authorized to condemn or purchase a narrow strip of land through the lands of others on its route, and to run trains propelled by steam over its road at all times of day or night, and at all seasons, wet or dry, and using engines that scatter fire and burn property, although operated with a degree of care that amounts to "faultlessness," all for its own profit,—then we assert that the statute is not obnoxious to the charge of denying the railroads the protection it accords to others. So long as the state imposes this duty upon the only agency that has like powers, and creating similar hazards, it cannot be charged with inequality or unjust discrimination. This is a familiar rule in taxation, where uniformity and equality are required by the constitution. The statute applies to all railroads in this state,—a class of carriers operating 138 railroads, with a mileage of 6125 miles, in 1890. If it essayed to render only one road liable, it would be open to the objection; but, as it is, it might as well be said that a statute regulating the practice of medicine, or peddlers, is unconstitutional. This objection was overruled in Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Emmons, 149 U. S. 864, 87 L. ed. 769. The example cited by counsel as a similar case is that of a steamboat operated by steam. Nothing could well be more dissimilar in their surroundings than a railroad and a steamboat. The one is propelled upon the water, upon which the sparks from its smokestacks fall, and are instantly extinguished. The other runs along and beside fields full of grain, dry straw, and other highly combustible material, upon which the sparks light, and cinders are blown, at places and at times when it is almost impossible for the owner to be present, and guard against the damages. It seems to us the example emphasizes the dangerous exception which railroads constitute to all other person using steam as a means of transportation.

Finally, is it unconstitutional because it deprives defendant of its property "without due process of law," or in defiance of "the law of the land?" We accept Mr. Webster's definition of the "law of the land." "By 'law of the land' is most clearly intended the general law,—a law which hears before it condemns; which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society. Everything which may pass under the form of an enactment is not, therefore, to be considered the law of the land. If this were so, acts of attainder, bills of pains and penalties, acts of confiscation, acts reversing judgments, and acts directly transferring one man's estate to another,—legislative judgments, decrees, and forfeitures, in all possible forms,—would be the law of the land." "Such a strange construction would render the constitutional provisions of the highest importance completely inoperative and void. Judges would sit to execute legislative judgments and decrees, not to declare the law, or to administer the justice of the country." We cheerfully concede that, if this act comes within this definition, it is our sworn duty to declare it void and inoperative, notwithstanding the high respect we have and owe to the legislative and executive branches of our government, which enacted and approved this act. Let us subject this statute to the test.

At common law, if a person use a highly dangerous machine, he must do so at the peril of the consequences, if it cause injury to others. Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265; Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, and the authorities referred to in Comyns' Dig. title "Action on the Case for Negligence," A 6. But when the legislature expressly authorized railroads, in this state, to operate and propel their cars by locomotive engines, it was ruled by our courts that the roads were only liable for negligence in setting out fire upon the premises of adjoining owners in the absence of specific legislation to the contrary. And here lies the real contention of defendant in this case: It is that it is not competent for the legislature or lawmaking power to attach an absolute liability. We have seen that at common law the liability for fire was absolute. In Jones v. Festiniog R. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. 738, Blackburn, J., said: "The general rule of the common law is correctly given in Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265-279, affirmed in house of lords, Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330,—that when a man brings or uses a thing of a dangerous nature on his own land, he must keep it at his peril, and is liable for the consequences if it escapes, and does injury to his neighbor." "Here the defendants were using a locomotive engine, with no express parliamentary powers making lawful that use, and they are therefore, at common law, bound to keep the engines from doing injury; and if the sparks escape, and cause damage, the defendants are liable for the consequences, though no actual negligence be shown on their part." It took acts of parliament (6 Anne, chap. 31, and 14 Geo. III. chap. 78) in England to repeal this absolute liability for fire accidentally set out on one's own premises, and extending upon his adjoining proprietor. But, if parliament might repeal, it might also re-enact. By Conn. Gen. Stat. 1875, p. 489, § 6, one who kindles a fire on his own land is made liable for all damages it may do if it runs upon the land of another, and proof of negligence is not required. A similar statute was passed in Iowa, and sustained in Conn. v. May, 36 Iowa, 241. When the legislature passed the general railroad act giving them the right to use steam, had it also annexed as a condition that the railroads should be absolutely liable for all damages they might cause by fire set out by them, would any one have questioned its power to do so? Had it been done then, would it not have been a valid exercise of its police power? No violation of the obligation of the contract could be charged in that case, and, if it be a valid exercise of police power, all the authorities, and defendant's counsel, agree that the state is not restricted from asserting it by reason of the prior grant of the charter, for all charters are subject to it.

Does it, then, contravene natural right? Is it open to the indictment preferred by defendant,—that it arbitrarily takes its property, and confers it upon another, without a hearing or consideration? We have seen that it was the ancient common law that the owner was liable for fire escaping from his own premises, whether negligent or not, and that different states in the Union have re-enacted the old common law, by which the owner is now absolutely liable for damage by fire put out on his own premises. Looking for the reason underlying the ancient rule of law, we find that it had its origin in the dangerous character of fire, and that whosoever put this dangerous agency in motion was rightfully required to see that it did no harm; that while it was an elementary principle that every individual is entitled to the undisturbed possession and lawful enjoyment of his own property, the mode of enjoyment was necessarily limited by the rights of others, otherwise it might result in the destruction of their rights altogether. Hence the maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas." So that while it has been generally held that one is only liable for negligence in the prosecution of a lawful business, nothing is more firmly settled than that a man cannot erect a nuisance or employ dangerous agencies, to the annoyance of an adjoining proprietor, even for the purposes of a lawful trade; and it was an old common-law maxim that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer loss from an act done, it is just that it should fall on the one who occasioned the injury, rather than upon the one who had no agency in producing the damage. Counsel for defendant, in his earnest denunciation of the act as violative of every principle of justice, and indefensible as a police regulation, says: "But we are not aware that this principle of 'Sic utere,' etc., has ever been extended so far as to make a man liable for the lawful and careful use of his own property." In Hay v. Cohoes Co., 2 N. Y. 159, 51 Am. Dec. 279, the court of appeals of New York had this case before it: The defendant was a corporation chartered by the legislature, and authorized to construct a canal. In the construction of the canal, they resorted to blasting, and threw stone, gravel, and slate upon the house and premises of plaintiff. He brought his action without alleging negligence. The defendant moved for a nonsuit, insisting that it was necessary both to aver and prove negligence and wantonness, and plaintiff had failed to do either. The trial court nonsuited plaintiff. The court of appeals reversed the case, saying: "The defendant had a right to dig the canal. Plaintiff had a right to the undisturbed possession of his property. If these rights conflict, the former must yield to the latter, as the more important of the two, since, upon grounds of public policy, it is better that one man should surrender a particular use of his land, than that another should be deprived of the use of his altogether, which might be the consequence of the privilege of the former should he be wholly unrestricted." In Tremain v. Cohoes Co., 2 N. Y. at page 163, 51 Am. Dec. 284, the defendants offered to prove "that the work was done in the best and most careful manner." The common pleas court rejected it as irrelevant, as the declaration neither averred willfulness nor negligence. The court of appeals sustained the common pleas court, and held it was not necessary to charge or prove negligence, to recover. In McAndrews v. Collierd, 42 N. J. L. 189, 36 Am. Rep. 508, these two cases in New York were reviewed and approved. In the New Jersey case, the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Company was authorized by its charter to construct a tunnel through Berger hill. It contracted with McAndrews to do the work. The tunnel was driven through rock; was begun in 1873, and finished in 1877. McAndrews constructed near the eastern end of the tunnel, and within the limits of Jersey City, a magazine for explosive materials which he used for blasting. In 1875, at night, the materials exploded, doing damage to property, and, among others, injured Collierd's houses. In a suit by Collierd for damages it was held: "(1) That the legislative authority to a private corporation or an individual to do work for its or his own profit does not include authority to use, at whatever hazard to the persons or property of others, dangerous materials, even though they are necessary to the convenient prosecution of the work. (2) They will be liable for injury, although no negligence or want of skill in executing the work is proved, and liable for actual damages, even though they show that they have done the work in the most careful manner." In Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579, 36 Am. Rep. 654, the action was sustained upon the ground that the manufacturing and storing of fireworks, and the use and keeping of materials of a dangerous and explosive character for that purpose, constituted a private nuisance, for which the defendant was liable to respond in damages, without regard to the question whether he was chargeable with negligence or carelessness. The defendant had constructed a powder magazine upon his premises, with the usual safeguards, in which he kept stored a quantity of powder, which, without apparent cause, exploded and caused the injury. The court says: "The fact that the magazine was liable to such a contingency, which could not be guarded against or averted by the greatest degree of care and vigilance, evinces its dangerous character, and might in some localities render it a personal nuisance."

"In such case, the rule which exonerates a party engaged in a lawful business, when free from negligence, has no application." It is significant that the argument employed by the court in that case to show the dangerous character of the magazine, and for that reason to take it out of the rule that exonerates one in a lawful business from liability, save for negligence, is identically the same used by defendant in this case to escape liability. It admits that it uses fire in its engines, and that the utmost care cannot and does not prevent its destroying the property of adjoining proprietors, and yet insists, because it is engaged in a lawful business, it can only be made liable save for negligence. See also Bohan v. Port Jervis Gaslight Co. 123 N. Y. 13, 9 L. R. A. 711; Lafan & R. Powder Co. v. Tearney, 181 Ill. 322, 7 L. R. A. 262. We think it is clear that, upon the plainest principles of justice, it ought to be liable, and that when experience demonstrated the dangerous character of the locomotive engine, in setting out fire, it was not only the right, but the manifest duty, of the legislature, to hold the railroads liable for fires set out by them, without reference to whether they were guilty of negligence or not. Nor do we think there is any force in the argument that by so doing their property is arbitrarily taken without right. The right to compel them to respond is based upon their use of a dangerous element, and by their destruction of adjoining proprietors' property. Moreover, it is not done in an arbitrary manner. The plaintiff is required to show to a jury or court organized as in any other case that the road did set out the fire; that it did destroy his property; and the jury must, from the evidence, determine the amount of the damage. In no sense is it a finding without a hearing, nor are the essentials to a recovery based upon unreasonable or untenable grounds. In a word, he is simply called upon to respond to a legal duty established by proofs. The wrong done by the dangerous agency set in motion by the company, and under its control, is ample consideration for the compensation it is required by the statute to make the owner whose property it destroys.

But, were it without compensation, it would not follow that the statute would be void. Many instances to the contrary were enumerated in Boston & M. R. Co. v. York County Comrs., 79 Me. 386, in which it was held that the legislature might lawfully require railroads to fence their tracks, although the act was subsequent to the charter, and although it imposed a burden and expense on the company not existing when it was incorporated." Emery, J., says, "The wide extent of the police power can be illustrated by instances of its actual exercise without direct compensation." Many of these instances are too familiar to need citations of authorities. He enumerates those cases in which licenses to manufacture liquor have been recalled, and the manufacture prohibited, after much expenditure by the licensees. Beer Co's Case, 97 U. S. 33, 24 L. ed. 992. Lotteries chartered for a consideration paid have been suppressed. Stone's Case, 101 U. S. 814, 26 L. ed. 1079. The various inspection laws, by which dealers are required to pay the inspection fees. Dealers using weights and measures must have them approved, and pay the approving officer. The blameless sufferer from a contagious disease is often compelled to leave home and friends, and bear his pain in some quarantine hospital, and his clothing destroyed, all at his own expense. The right of municipalities to destroy buildings, to prevent spread of fire, in an emergency. The owners of theaters, hotels, and other public buildings are required, at their own expense, to provide fire escapes, and more ample means of exit. Steamboats are subject to inspection, and must pay the fees therefor. Railroads are constantly having imposed upon them additional duties with reference to safety of persons and property. New inventions in brakes, switches; blocking their switches, etc. Pierce, Railroads, 462, 463. In this state, the action for damages in case of death was given after many of the old charters were granted, which must have greatly increased the cost of running the road, and yet Judge Scott says no one questioned that the act was constitutional.

2. But it is contended by the appellant that the legislature never intended to make the fact of the injury anything more than prima facie evidence of negligence; that the circuit court erred in holding that proof of care and diligence on part of the defendant railroad would not relieve it of liability under the statute. If this is all that was in the contemplation of the legislature, it was a work of supererogation, because it has been the settled law of decision in this court since the determination in Fitch v. Pacific R. Co. 45 Mo. 322, (in 1870,) "that, where it is proved that the property was destroyed by fire escaping from the defendant's engine, a prima facie case of negligence is made out; that the burden is then thrown on defendant, by its evidence, to rebut the presumption of negligence by showing the absence of negligence." Coale v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 227; Olemens v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 53 Mo. 866, 14 Am. Rep. 460; Randle v. Pacific Railroad, 65 Mo. 325; Miller v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 90 Mo. 389.

In the light of this judicial history, and of the history of the act itself, we think the legislature meant more than this mere prima facie liability. Section 2615 is a rescript of the Massachusetts act. That act had been adopted in other New England states and in Iowa, and a construction given it that rendered the railroad companies liable, independent of the question of negligence, for damages occasioned by fires set out by them. It is a familiar rule of construction in this state that when the legislature enacts a statute which is a transcript of a statute of another state, that has received a known judicial construction by the courts of that state, it is deemed that our legislature adopted that construction as an integral part of its act. State v. Macon County Ct. 41 Mo. 453; Skouten v. Wood, 57 Mo. 889; West v. McMullan, 112 Mo. 405; Rodemacher v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 297, 20 Am. Rep. 593; Grisell v. Housatonic R. Co. 54 Conn. 447; Union Pac. R. Co. v. DeBuck, 12 Colo. 294, 3 L. R. A. 350; Hooksett v. Concord Railroad, 38 N. H. 242; Rowell v. Railroad, 57 N. H. 132; Lyman v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 4 Cush. 238. We are confirmed in our views by the reasoning of the learned judge in Small v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 50 Iowa, 538. He shows that in Iowa the court had not, previous to the statute, held the fact of the fire prima facie evidence of negligence, and the language of the statute is made the turning point. Nothing, however, said in that case, in our opinion, destroys the force of Judge Dar's decision in Rodemacher v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 297, 20 Am. Rep. 592.

3. Appellant complains of a ruling of the court in excluding certain evidence. It offered to prove by Howard Blossom, an insurance agent, that trees, shrubs, plants, and vines were, by their inherent nature, not susceptible of insurance, and it was impracticable, from a business standpoint, to insure such classes of property, and why it is so impracticable. Upon objection that this evidence was immaterial and irrelevant, the court excluded it, and defendant excepted. It is not contended by defendant that "trees, shrubs, plants and vines" are not property, often of great value, and that, as such, they would not be included in the general term "property," used in the statute, but it urges that such property is not insurable. Its offer was to show that the inherent nature of such property is uninsurable. The act under consideration is not limited to any specific property. It is broad enough to include both real and personal property. The statute is an enabling act. By its terms the property becomes a subject of insurance. The mere fact that no person has as yet applied for insurance upon growing timber and ornamental shrubs would not meet the case. This character of property is of inherent value, adds greatly to the value of realty, and certainly is not more subject to change than ordinary personal property, which is clearly insurable. That this class of property is subject to destruction by fire, all must admit, and no valid reason appears why it may not be insured. We take it that it is not an open question, under this statute, and no error was committed in declining to hear the evidence offered. The judge and jury would be as competent to respond to that question as any witness. Such property was held clearly within a similar statute in Maine, and insurable, in Pratt v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co. 42 Me. 579,—a case much later than that cited by defendant from 87 Me. 92 [Chapman v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co.] and following Hart v. Western R. Corp. 13 Met. 99. Chief Justice Bigelow, in Ross v. Boston & W. R. Co. 4 Allen, 87, pointed out the difficulties in which the supreme court of Maine had become involved by attempting to confine the right of recovery to permanent property, and repudiated any such limited construction. He maintained that the statute was broad enough to cover every species of property, and the claim for indemnity was as strong in one as in the other. The evidence, if permitted, would have led to a distinction unauthorized by anything in the statute, which is remedial in its nature, and not to be strictly construed against those for whose benefit it was enacted. It becomes unnecessary to say more in regard to the point that the personal property in the house was not insurable. The personal property that was burned was stored in the residence and barn, and no reason is given why it was not insurable. The defendant's point as to this is not sustained.

4. On the trial, defendant introduced witnesses who testified that they lived in the neighborhood of the Mathews home place; that it had been neglected for years prior to August 9, 1887, and no care taken of it, except to mow the meadow and lawn around the house; that the garden, nursery, and orchard had been permitted to grow up in weeds, some of which were two or three years old, and on the day of the fire were very dry; that the place was a resort for boys, who frequented it to swim in the pond, and, in the fall, to hunt; that the weeds and inflammable material at the southeast corner, near the nursery, ran right down to the defendant's right of way. At the conclusion of the evidence, defendant asked two instructions to the effect that the conduct of plaintiff in permitting these weeds to grow on his place, as above testified, constituted such contributory negligence as would prevent plaintiff's recovery, or, if such weeds augmented the loss, he could only recover for so much of the injury as would have followed, had he not been negligent in that regard. The circuit court declined to give either of said instructions, and defendant complains of that ruling. The instructions are predicated on the fact that the jury should first find that the fire was communicated by defendant's engine to this grass or weeds, but assumes that it was contributory negligence in plaintiff to permit these weeds to grow upon his land in this manner. This question has often been before this court, beginning with Fitch v. Pacific R. Co., 45 Mo. 322; and it has uniformly been ruled that it was not contributory negligence in a farmer to permit dead and dry grass to remain in his fields adjoining the right of way, "especially," as was said in Patton v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co., 87 Mo. 117, 56 Am. Rep. 448, "when there is no evidence that this is out of the usual course of husbandry." These decisions of this court are amply supported by both reason and authority in other states. In Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Medley, 75 Va. 499, 40 Am. Rep. 784, Judge Waller R. Staples delivered the opinion of the court. It appeared in that case that the plaintiff's land was covered with dry grass and broom sedge; that this grass was of a highly combustible nature, and easily ignited. The point was made that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, but the court held otherwise, saying: "The legislature, in legalizing the use of engines running through the country, scattering fire and cinders on all sides over lands in the vicinity of the road, certainly did not intend to impose any additional burdens or duties upon the owners of such lands." "They are subject only to such risks as are necessarily incidental to the proper and legitimate operation of the road by those having charge of it." "Any other rule would impose upon property holders near the line of a railroad the necessity of removing their grain, hay, and whatever is of a combustible nature, to some distant point,—not infrequently, of changing the whole course of husbandry, of incurring enormous expenses, and of exercising ceaseless vigilance,—in order that the company may negligently permit the accumulation of dangerously inflammable matter upon its own lands, liable at any moment to be ignited from its own locomotives." "It has been well said that fire is an extremely dangerous element, even when employed for a lawful purpose. The exercise of due care is imposed on him who uses it, and sets it in motion for his own advantage, and not upon him who is merely passive, confining himself to lawful employment and business in the conduct of his own affairs." "There are some few cases holding a contrary doctrine, but the great weight of authority is in conformity with the views here expressed. I refer particularly to an exhaustive discussion of the whole subject by Chief Justice Dixon in Killogg v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Wis. 223, 7 Am. Rep. 69; also, to a very able opinion of Judge Raymond in Snyder v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 11 W. Va. 14; Salmon v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 38 N. J. L. 5, and Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Salmon, 29 N. J. L. 299, 23 Am. Rep. 214. In Philadelphia & C. R. Co. v. Schultz, 93 Pa. 341, the supreme court of Pennsylvania characterized the claim of defendant that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence because he permitted dry leaves, brushwood, and other rubbish on his property, which could be readily fired by sparks from its locomotive, as "an extraordinary proposition," assigning, among other reasons, that "it was an attempt to impose upon property owners along the line of a railroad duties unknown and unnecessary before the building of the road," and, "if this proposition means anything, it means that upon such property owners devolves the duty of guarding against the negligence of railroad companies and their servants, which is absurd;" and citing Judge Agnew's opinion in Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hendrickson, 80 Pa. 182, 21 Am. Rep. 97. See also, Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Jones, 86 Ind. 496, 44 Am. Rep. 834; Vaughan v. Taff Vale R. Co. 8 Hurlst. & N. 750; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Nixon, 79 Ind. 111. It will be observed that defendant's own witnesses testified to the mowing of the grass and meadow, and the only accumulation was in the nursery, garden, vineyard, and orchard. As remarked in Patton's Case, supra, there was no evidence whatever that it was not customary, or even proper, at times, to let weeds grow. Certainly, it cannot be affirmed that weeds, even, are not often put to a most useful purpose, in mulching and manuring. In any aspect of the case, we think there was nothing showing contributory negligence by the plaintiff. But there is another ground upon which this plea should have been denied, and that is, by virtue of section 2615, the defendant is made an insurer against fire set out by its engines; and it is a familiar rule that contributory negligence, short of fraud, does not furnish any defense to an action by the insured on his policy of insurance, and this was the view taken and enforced in Rowell v. Railroad, 57 N. H. 132.

5. In this connection, we are called upon to consider the position taken by defendant in the fourth paragraph of its answer, which is, in brief, that, at the time of the fire, plaintiff was insured in certain insurance companies to the amount of $10,000; that, after said fire, said companies paid said loss of $10,000. Wherefore, defendant prays that the insurance money so paid to plaintiff by said insurance companies shall be applied pro tanto to the damages sued for in this case. The defendant is most clearly not entitled to any benefit of the insurance money which accrued to plaintiff by reason of defendant's own act in destroying the insured property. In Dillon v. Hunt, 105 Mo. 154, this division held the rule as stated in 1 Sutherland on Damages, 242 (ed. 1882), to be correct, viz.: "That there can be no abatement of damages on the principle of partial compensation received for the injury, when it comes from a collateral source, wholly independent of the defendant, and is, as to him, res inter alios acta. The payment of such moneys not being procured by the defendant, and they not having been paid or received to satisfy in whole or in part his liability, he can derive no benefit therefrom, in mitigation of damages for which he is liable. To permit a reduction on such a ground would be to allow a wrongdoer to pay nothing, and take all the benefit of a policy of insurance without paying the premium." A similar conclusion had previously been reached in Carroll v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 88 Mo. 289, 57 Am. Rep. 382, to which our attention was not called at the time. Although an insurer, defendant, having itself destroyed the property, has no right to share the immunity afforded other insurers. Their relation as to this loss is entirely antagonistic to it. The defendant's liability is first and principal; that of the insurance companies, secondary. Plaintiff and the insurance companies who paid his loss stand opposed to defendant, who was the cause of loss to both. There is no contractual relation or principle of subrogation that will enable defendant to require of them that they shall share their losses pro tanto with it. The statute points out the way by which it may protect itself against the loss. It confers on it an insurable interest in the property, and only by availing itself of this right can it guard against those losses which occur by fires put out by it on the lands of adjoining owners. May, Ins. § 455; Harding v. Townsend, 43 Vt. 536, 5 Am. Rep. 304; The Monticello v. Mollison, 58 U. S. 17 How. 152, 15 L. ed. 68; Hammond v. Schiff, 100 N. C. 161; Hart v. Western R. Corp. 13 Met. 105, 46 Am. Dec. 719; Ross v. Boston & W. R. Co. 6 Allen, 90.

6. At the trial, defendant offered to prove that its right of way was a portion of the property described in plaintiff's petition; that when its railroad was built through plaintiff's premises, in 1882, condemnation proceedings were instituted against plaintiff, to which he was made a party; that before the commissioners appointed to assess plaintiff's among other items of damage caused by defendant's road, plaintiff claimed, as one, "damage of fire for all time to come." Defendant then offered to show by H. W. Hough and W. T. Essex, two of said commissioners, that they awarded plaintiff, for his damages to all his property, $9,000, and for this home place they assessed the damage at $3,000; that in estimating the damage they took into consideration the danger to said property from accidental fire set out by engines on the railroad; that plaintiff and defendant finally agreed to abide the award, and the damages were accordingly paid. The court was requested to charge the jury, in the second instruction prayed by defendant and refused by the court, that if the commissioners did assess the damages, and in so doing took into consideration the danger to plaintiff's property by accidental fire, and said danger was also considered by plaintiff and defendant, then plaintiff cannot recover, provided such proceedings and compromise were had prior to March 31, 1897. When a part of a tract of land is taken for railroad purposes under condemnation proceedings, the jury or commissioners may properly take into consideration the risk from fire to the buildings, fences, timber, or crops upon the remainder, in so far and to the extent, only, that it depreciates the value of the property; but compensation for a probable or future loss by fire is entirely too speculative and remote to be made the basis of damages. As said in Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. v. McGraw, 104 Mo. 282, loc. cit. 294, "It would not be proper to estimate the possible damage from fires or injuries to persons." "Neither may ever occur, and to take them into the estimate would be mere speculation." "We think they may properly be considered, however, in so far as they tend to depreciate the value of the whole property, and to affect the proposed changes, but no further." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 497; Mills, Em. Dom. §§ 163-166; Bangor & P. R. Co. v. McComb, 60 Me. 290; Adden v. White Mountains N. H. Railroad, 55 N. H. 418, 20 Am. Rep. 220; Pittsburgh, B. & B. R. Co. v. McCloskey, 110 Pa. 486.

The plaintiff's claim before the commissioners was damage from the risk of fire. In so far as that risk affected the value of his property not taken, by depreciating it, it was a proper claim. There was nothing to show that it was unjustly extended to an estimate of damages that might accrue at some future time, or might never occur. The damages assessed were $3,000, and paid. After the assessment, then, plaintiff held his property in its depreciated condition. How defendant can arrive at the conclusion that if this property, in its depreciated condition, is subsequently destroyed, plaintiff is not entitled to recover whatever damages shall accrue from such subsequent destruction, we cannot understand. The prior condemnation assessment has been made and settled. After that, plaintiff owns what is left, absolutely, as he owned the whole before a portion was appropriated by the road. The subsequent damages constitute no part of the first. It is not double damages, in any sense, as we view it. If the property is destroyed by negligence, there can be no question of the liability of the company for burning it, nor is it material, under section 2615, whether it was the result of negligence or pure accident. 25 L. R. A.

The statute operates upon the estate as it is when the fire occurs, and, as we hold the statute valid, the company is liable. Bangor & P. R. Co. v. McComb, 60 Me. 290; *Adden v. White Mountains N. We find no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court, and accordingly affirm it.

(.....Mo.....)

1. There is no constitutional objection against making a railroad company absolutely liable for the injury caused by fire set out by its locomotives along the line of its road.
2. A recovery for injury by fire set out by a locomotive without proof of negligence will not be prevented where the statute authorizes such recovery by the mere fact that negligence is alleged in the petition.
3. Evidence that both before and after the occurrence of a fire which caused the injuries forming the basis of the suit other fires had been started by sparks from defendant's engines at different places along the road is admissible as tending to show that the fire in question was so caused.
4. A statute making railroad companies responsible "to every person or corporation whose property may be injured or destroyed" by fire set out by their locomotives will not be limited by construction to embrace only insurable property, although the companies are given by the statute an insurable interest in the property for the destruction of which they may be liable.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

leged, by the burning of plaintiff's building, fences, shrubbery, etc., by fire communicated from one of defendant's locomotives. The petition charged negligence on the part of defendant in permitting fire to escape. The answer was a general denial. It is agreed by counsel that the evidence, though circumstantial, tended to prove that the fire which consumed plaintiff's property was communicated from one of defendant's engines while being operated on its road. The court permitted a recovery under section 2615 of the Revised Statutes, without proof of negligence on the part of defendant.

1. The first proposition insisted upon as ground for reversal of the judgment is that said section 2615, which makes every person and corporation responsible in damages for property injured or damaged by fire communicated, directly or indirectly, by locomotive engines in the use upon their railroads, without proof of negligence, is unconstitutional. This objection has received the careful consideration of this court in banc at this term in the case of Matthews v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (Mo.) ante, 161, in which the statute in question was held valid. The objection under the authority of that case must therefore be overruled. It may not be out of place here to take the occasion of stating that, in my opinion, the statute can be sustained on the broad ground that it is merely remedial in its character, and is authorized under the general powers of the legislature to provide appropriate remedies for the redress of such wrongs as are contemplated. "The remedy does not alter the contract or the tort. It takes away no vested right for the defaulter can have no vested right in a state of the law which left the injured party without, or with only a defective, remedy." Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 285. It is unquestioned that the utmost diligence and care cannot prevent the escape of fire from locomotive engines. We have, then, this condition of things: The corporation is given the right, by the statute, to run its engines by steam power, necessitating the use of fire. Fire necessarily escapes, and is scattered along the route. The citizen owns property on the line of the road, which is exposed to fire from those engines, regardless of the care and vigilance he may exercise. Both parties are faultless, but nevertheless the property of the owner is consumed by fire from an engine. The property owner has the right to own the property, and to claim protection under the law, equal, at least, to the right of the corporation to use fire on its engines. The loss must necessarily fall upon one or the other of these parties. Which one of them shall suffer the loss,—the one through whose agency the damage was caused, though in the lawful use of its own property, or the one equally innocent of wrong, and who had no agency in causing the damage? Tested by the rule of natural right and equity, there could be but one answer to the inquiry. This answer is formulated into the maxim that "every one should so use his own property as not to injure that of his neighbor." Prior to the statute under consideration, the loss was made to fall upon the owner who was innocent of fault in the use and care of his own property, 35 L. R. A.

and had no part in setting at liberty the destructive agency. The rule was manifestly unjust. To change this rule, and place the liability where it should rest, is the purpose of the statute. In the language of Dewey, J., in Lyman v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 4 Cush. 290, we consider the statute "as one of those general remedial acts passed for the more effectual protection of property against the hazards to which it has become subject by the locomotive engine. The right to use the parcel of land appropriated to the railroad does not deprive the legislature of the power to enact such regulations, and impose such liabilities for injuries suffered from the mode of using the road, as the occasion and circumstances may justify." The statute considered in that case imposes on the railroad company absolute liability for damages caused by fires escaping from engines. So, in a recent case in Connecticut, the court, in discussing a similar statute, says: "In this view of the case the statute rests upon broad grounds of justice and equity. It is designed to do justice where before there was a partial failure of justice. It is therefore a 'remedial statute,' in the best sense, and we must so construe it as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy." Martin v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 62 Conn. 840. The contract between the state and the corporation is that the latter may propel its trains by the use of steam generated by fire. There was no agreement that it should be exempt from liability for the consequence relating to others from its use of fire. In respect to such consequences it is subject to control by remedial laws to the same extent as natural persons. Fire, when uncontrolled, is necessarily destructive of property. As shown in the opinion of Gantt, J., in the Matthews Case, supra, damage caused by fire was recoverable at common law without proof of negligence. There is no reason why the common law could not, or indeed should not, be restored in cases in which the lawful use of property by one necessarily exposes the property of others to damage by fire. A statute of this state declared that "if any person shall willfully set on fire any woods, marshes, or prairies, so as thereby to occasion any damage to any other person shall make satisfaction for such damage to the party injured, to be recovered in an action on the case." Rev. Stat. 1845, p. 1091, § 8. This act came before this court in 1848, and its validity was not questioned, though that distinguished jurist, Leonard, afterwards judge of this court, represented the party charged with the damage, and a recovery without proof of negligence was affirmed. In that case the court held that the fact that the fire was set on defendant's land constituted no defence under the statute. Finley v. Langston, 12 Mo. 123. A similar statute was held valid by the supreme court of Iowa. Conn v. May, 36 Iowa, 241. We think there can be no doubt that the state has the power to impose absolute liability upon one causing loss of property to another by the use of agencies necessarily destructive, and in the use of which absolute control is impossible, whether the one using the agency be a private person or a corporation.

2. The petition charged that the fire causing the injury was permitted to escape through the negligence of defendant, and the court permitted a recovery under the statute without proof of negligence. Defendant assigns this action of the court as error, in that it permitted a recovery upon a cause of action different from that charged in the petition. The petition states all the facts necessary to authorize a judgment under the provisions of the statute, and, in addition thereto, the allegation of negligence. By the statement of more than was required, plaintiff did not forfeit his right to recover upon proof of the facts he was required to state, and did state, in his petition, Radcliffe v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 90 Mo. 181; Morrow v. Surber, 97 Mo. 155.

3. During the trial, witnesses were permitted to testify, over the objection of defendant, that other fires, both before and subsequent to the one in question, at different places on the line of defendant's road, had been started by sparks from some of defendant's engines. The admission of this evidence is assigned as error. In Coale v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 60 Mo. 227, this court held that, in order to prove that one engine was insufficient, or that the employees of the company in charge of such engine were careless or incompetent, evidence was not admissible to prove that other engines were defective, and other employees were incompetent or negligent. The ruling in that case is not controlling on the question of the admissibility of the evidence complained of here, for the reason that the statute creates an absolute liability, without respect to the character of the machinery or the competency of the employees. The admission of the evidence was clearly harmless if it only tended to prove want of care on the part of defendant. The only issue involving the liability of defendant was whether the fire was communicated to plaintiff's property, directly or indirectly, by a locomotive engine in use upon its road. Was this evidence admissible as tending to prove that issue? The question was sharply contested on the trial whether the fire causing the damage did, in fact, originate from one of defendant's engines. The evidence was all circumstantial. It was important, then, to show that there was a possibility that sparks may have been thrown a distance sufficient to reach the building in which the fire originated, and that they contained heat enough to set it on fire. The facts that live sparks were thrown from engines, and did ignite grass and other combustible materials, would tend to prove the probability that the fire was communicated from an engine. It was not shown that the engine from which alone the fire could have been communicated was constructed or manned with more care than all others in use on the road. The admissibility of such evidence was affirmed in Sheldon v. Hudson River R. Co., 14 N. Y. 228, 67 Am. Dec. 155, by a divided court. The court in that case says: "The competency of this evidence has been directly decided in the English court of common pleas. Piggot v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 10 Jur. 571; Aldridge v. Great Western R. Co. 3 Mann. & G. 515. These cases upon this point are well decided. The principle is essential in the administration of justice, inasmuch as circumstantial proof must, in the nature of things, be restored to, and inasmuch as the jury cannot take judicial cognizance of the fact that locomotive engines do emit sparks and cinders, which may be borne a given distance by the wind. The evidence was competent to establish certain facts which were necessary to be established in order to show a possible cause of the accident, and to prevent vague and unsatisfactory surmises on the part of the jury." This ruling was followed without division in Field v. New York Central Railroad, 32 N. Y. 839, and Webb v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 421, 10 Am. Rep. 389. A similar ruling was made by the Supreme Court of the United States in Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 470, 23 L. ed. 362. Mr. Justice Strong, who wrote the opinion of the court, says: "The question has often been considered by the courts of this country and in England; and such evidence has, we think, been generally held admissible, as tending to prove the possibility, and consequent probability, that some locomotive caused the fire." He follows this statement of the law by a number of citations, both English and American, including the case of Sheldon v. Hudson River R. Co., supra. Further on in the same opinion the judge says: "The particular engines were not identified, but their crossing raised at least some probability, in the absence of proof of any other known cause, that they caused the fire; and it seems to us that, under the circumstances, this probability was strengthened by the fact that some engines of the same defendant, at other times during the same season, had scattered fire along their passage." To the same effect are the following cases: Smith v. Boston & M. Railroad, 68 N. H. 25; Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 3 C. C. A. 264, 52 Fed. Rep. 711, 10 U. S. App. 875; Thatcher v. Maine Central R. Co. 85 Me. 509. We think the evidence tended to prove the possibility, and consequent probability, that the fire was communicated to plaintiff's property from one of defendant's engines, and that the evidence was admissible, and its probative force was for the determination of the jury. If the issue had been of negligence in the construction or management of the engine only, and the engine which could only have caused the damage had been clearly identified, evidence that other engines emitted sparks and set fires would have been inadmissible under the decisions of this court. Coale v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. supra; Patton v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 87 Mo. 117, 56 Am. Rep. 446. But, in case the fact whether the fire originated from the engine was alone in issue, and there was no direct proof of the fact, it seems very clear that such evidence would have some tendency to prove that issue. The evidence was all circumstantial, and the facts testified to were circumstances, though slight they may have been, bearing upon the issue.

4. Defendant insists, further, that plaintiff was not entitled to recover under the statute for personal property burned, nor for shrubs, trees, and flowers, upon which defendant could not obtain insurance. For support of this contention, counsel cite Chapman v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co. 87 Me. 92. The loss considered in that case was of a lot of cedar posts temporarily deposited near the road. The statute made the railroad responsible "when a building or other property is injured by the fire communicated by a locomotive engine," and gave to the corporation "an insurable interest in the property along the route for which it is responsible." After discussing the statute, the court says: "The conclusion to which we have arrived is that the liability of railroad corporations under this statute extends only to property permanently existing along their route, and capable of being insured, and that as to movable property, having no permanent location, the liability of such corporation is to be determined by principles of the common law." In Pratt v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co., 42 Me. 579, the same court held that the liability of the company under this statute was not confined to real estate, but extended to personal property as well. Exemption from responsibility under the statute of that state has never extended beyond injury to movable property temporarily placed near the track. In the recent case of Thatcher v. Maine Central R. Co., supra, the supreme court of that state very evidently disapproves the decision in the Chapman Case, though it expressly states that it had no intention of overruling it. The court agreed that a different construction of the statute had been given by the courts of Massachusetts, Vermont, and New Hampshire for the one declared in the Chapman Case. We do not think so narrow a construction should be given our statute. It is remedial, and such construction should be given it as will advance the remedy. Indeed, the language of the statute is so plain and unambiguous as to admit of but one construction. The corporation shall be responsible "to every person or corporation whose property may be injured or destroyed." This language leaves no room for discussion as to the character of the property contemplated; it includes all property that may be injured or destroyed. We do not think it necessary to the validity of the statute that the railroad corporations should have been given an insurable interest in the property upon the route of their roads; nor does the fact that such interest was given limit their responsibility to insurable property that may be injured or destroyed. The purpose of the law was to give the corporation the same right and opportunity of protection and indemnity from fires as the owner of the property had. What property is the subject of insurance must be determined by the insurance companies, whether the indemnity is sought by the owner or by the corporation.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (Div. 2).

Edward W. RUHE, Appt.,
v.

Oliver W. BUCK et al., Respts.

(.....Mo.....)

1. An attachment of the property of a married woman which is not allowed by state law in the case of its own citizens will not be allowed to a nonresident creditor, al- though the debt was created in another state where the married woman resided and where the contract creating it was valid.

2. The spirit of comity does not require that a nonresident shall be allowed a remedy which is by the policy of the state law denied to its own citizens.

(Sherwood, J., dissents.)

(July 8, 1894.)

NOTE.—Enforceability of contracts of married women outside of state in which they are legally made.

The general rule is to apply the same rule to contracts by married women which is applied to other classes of contracts.

If the contract is valid in the state where it is made it is valid everywhere. Holmes v. Reynolds, 55 Vt. 39; Nixon v. Halley, 78 Ill. 611; Kelly v. Davis, 28 La. Ann. 773; Bond v. Cummings, 70 Me. 125; Hill v. Pine River Bank, 45 N. H. 300.

If a married woman is competent by the law of the domicile to make contracts, her contracts so made will be valid in every other country. Union Nat. Bank v. Hartwell, 84 Ala. 379.

The validity of the transfer by a married woman of a note is governed by the law of her domicile if the transfer is made there. Clanton v. Barnes, 50 Ala. 260.

Where a deed of gift in trust for the separate use of a married woman was made in Alabama by parties living there at the time of its execution, the laws of that state as to the rights of the parties under it will govern, in a litigation in regard to it brought in Florida. Maiben v. Bobe, 6 Fla. 381.

A note executed by a married woman as surety for a firm of which her husband is a member in a state where the makers resided and where the note is payable, if valid in that state may be enforced 25 L. R. A.

against her in the courts of another state, although if made in the latter state it would have been void. Robinson v. Queen, 3 L. R. A. 214, 87 Tenn. 445.

Where a married woman living in Pennsylvania bought a farm in Delaware, for which she gave her bond valid in Delaware, it was held that a personal judgment could be rendered against her in Pennsylvania, although such course was not authorized in case of a Pennsylvania contract. Baum v. Birchall, 150 Pa. 164, reversing 11 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 222.

To what extent states in which the disabilities of married women have not been removed will regard contracts made by such persons in other states as so opposed to the policy of their law as to be unenforceable has not been directly considered in many cases, although by sustaining such contracts there is an implied adjudication that such policy is not contravened.

However in Hayden v. Stone, 13 R. I. 106, the court takes the broad ground that a contract valid by the laws of one state cannot be enforced in another, unless such a contract between its own citizens would be enforced there.

On the other side in Wright v. Remington, 41 N. J. L. 48, 32 Am. Rep. 180, the court held that a statute empowering a married woman to contract in the same manner as if she were unmarried was not so in conflict with the public policy of New Jersey.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Atkinson County in favor of defendants in an action brought to perfect the plaintiff's title to certain property which he had bought at a sheriff's sale. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lewis & Ramsay, for appellant: The equitable title of defendants Julia E. and O. W. Buck in the property in controversy was subject to attachment, execution, and sale.

Rev. Stat. 1889, § 4915; Eddy v. Baldwin, 23 Mo. 588; Eneberg v. Carter, 98 Mo. 647.

The assignment of the Perkins contract to Mrs. Julia E. Buck was a fraud upon her husband's creditors, and the land was therefore liable to sale upon attachment and execution at the instance of such creditors.

Jordan v. Buschmeyer, 97 Mo. 94; Ryland v. Callison, 54 Mo. 513; Bobb v. Woodward, 50 Mo. 95.

Upon showing the insolvency of the husband and his purchase of the lot in the wife's name the burden devolved upon her to show that it was purchased in good faith with her own moneys.

Seitz v. Mitchell, 94 U. S. 580, 24 L. ed. 179; Stoan v. Torrey, 73 Mo. 623; Crook v. Tull, 111 Mo. 283.

The attachment proceedings against Oliver W. Buck and his wife, Julia E. Buck, being for a personal legal liability against both of them, there was no reason why it could not be enforced in a legal proceeding against both of them—even under the strict old common-law rules such judgments might be so rendered in the cases where she was so personally liable—as in case of her antenuptial contracts, or torts during coverture.

Bruen v. Bamberger, 11 Mo. App. 261; Walker v. Deaver, 79 Mo. 664; Merrill v. St. Louis, 12 Mo. App. 473, 83 Mo. 244, 53 Am. Rep. 576; Conrad v. Howard, 89 Mo. 219; Smith v. Beard, 73 Ind. 159. See also 14 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 637, and note 7, p. 638, and note 9, pp. 661, 762; Kingman v. Paulson, 126 Ind. 507.

The Dakota judgments, which were general personal liabilities of Mrs. Buck, were entitled to "full faith and credit in every other state."

An attachment or execution could issue against a married woman.

Reidworth v. Bowman, 104 Mo. 44; Walker v. Deaver, and Merrill v. St. Louis, supra.

The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, that is of the question of her personal liability upon the Dakota judgments, conceded to be personal liabilities against her where she lived, and having jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the person, the judgment could not be void on account of the form of the proceedings.

Babb v. Bruere, 23 Mo. App. 604; Gates v.

as to afford a reason for the nonenforcement of the contract against her in that state.

And it has also been held that the settled public policy of North Carolina will not be contravened by enforcing contracts made in another state by married women domiciled there. Taylor v. Sharp, 102 N. C. 377.

As tending to throw some light on the question—In Cosío v. De Bernales, 1 Car. & P. 206, Ryan & M. 102, an action was brought by husband and wife trading as partners in Spain, and the court said before the action could be maintained it must be shown that a married woman was authorized in that country to have separate property and to trade on her own account. The plaintiffs must show that they had put a proper plaintiff on the record, according to the law of Spain, before the question could be raised whether or not a husband and wife being partners in trade in Spain could sue as such in English courts.

In Arnold v. Bernard, 8 Abb. Pr. N. S. 120, a contract was made abroad between two married women in reference to the rendition of services in an opera company and suit was brought for breach of it by one of them in New York. The court held the complaint bad because it did not show that the business was to be carried on in a state where married women were permitted to make such contracts, so that the benefits arising from it would be their own.

In Woodcock v. Reed, 5 Allen, 207, the court tested the right of a married woman to property claimed by her by the law of her domicile, without in terms stating that it must be so tried.

But in Whitridge v. Barry, 42 Md. 140, it was held that the validity of an assignment of a policy of insurance must be determined by the law of the forum. It is, however, remarked in the opinion that such seems to have been conceded by the parties interested.

If there is no statute governing the matter in the state of domicile, the rights of the parties must be determined by the general principles of common law and equity applicable to such cases. Hendricks v. Isaacs, 46 Hun. 239.

The presumption is that the common law is in force in the other state, in the absence of proof to the contrary. Tinkler v. Cox, 68 Ill. 119.

Contracts in relation to real estate situated where the suit is brought.

An exception to the general rule exists when the contract relates to real estate situated in the state where the suit is brought. In such cases the rule is to apply the lex rei sitæ in determining the validity of the contract.

The effect of the contract on real estate is determined by the laws of the place where the estate is located. Kelly v. Davis, 23 La. Ann. 773.

Statutes giving power to contract have no extra-territorial effect, where the particular contract involved relates to the conveyance or incumbrance of real estate situated in a foreign jurisdiction. Cochran v. Benton, 120 Ind. 58.

The courts where the land is situated will not give effect to a mortgage executed in another state, if it is void by the lex rei sitæ. Swank v. Hufnagle, 111 Ind. 453.

A mortgage will not be enforced against a married woman, if it is not permitted by the law of the place where the land lies. Wood v. Wheeler, 111 N. C. 231.

A mortgage executed in Michigan by a married woman, without her husband joining, upon her separate estate in Indiana, will not be enforced by the Indiana courts. Oris v. Gregory, 111 Ind. 504.

The validity of a contract intended to bind separate real estate is to be determined by the law of the place where the estate is situated. Johnston v. Gawtry, 11 Mo. App. 322.

Tusten, 89 Mo. 18; Scott v. Caruth, 50 Mo. 120; Clark v. Clark, 86 Mo. 114; Rosenheim v. Hartsock, 90 Mo. 357.

The real reason why under our practice equity was necessary to charge the separate property of a married woman, was because her contracts as such were void, and it was only her separate property that could be reached and in the very nature of things an equitable proceeding to appropriate same was necessary.

Davis v. Smith, 75 Mo. 219.

The presumption is in favor of the jurisdiction of the court.

McClanahan v. West, 100 Mo. 309.

Meers. Hunt & Bailey, for respondents: Under the Revised Statutes of 1879, sections 3295 and 3296, which have been the same since 1865, the property of the wife could not be attached for her own or her husband's debts.

The attachment suit was brought March 8,

1887, and judgment rendered February 8, 1890, and this suit was brought April 21, 1891, so that the Laws of 1879, governing married women's rights to control their property and sue and be sued, govern this case.

Under the law as it then stood she could not be sued at law, and certainly not by attachment, but the only remedy against her was by bill in equity.

Gage v. Gates, 63 Mo. 412; Williams v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 8 Mo. App. 135; Drake, Attachm. 2d ed. §§ 247, 249; Bachman v. Lewis, 27 Mo. App. 81; Gabriel v. Mullen, 80 Mo. App. 465; Frank v. Siegel, 9 Mo. App. 467; Brumback v. Weinstein, 37 Mo. App. 520; Boekhoff v. Gruner, 47 Mo. App. 22; State v. Belandmeier, 58 Mo. 226; Chicago Coffin Co. v. Fritz, 41 Mo. App. 389; Buer v. Pfaff, 44 Mo. App. 35; Decker v. Lidwell, 3 Mo. App. 586.

Prior to the Revision of 1889 a judgment at law against a married woman is a nullity.

And that principle was applied in Frierson v. Williams, 57 Miss. 451, to a case where the contract was invalid where made, but valid where the real estate was situated and the remedy sought.

But in Louisiana it was held that the law of the status of real property will not be applied in favor of married women residing in other states, for the purpose of upholding a contract between her and her husband conveying the property to her as against creditors of the husband residing in the state where the land is situated. Hyman v. Schlenker, 44 La. Ann. 108.

Contract outside of state of domicile.

The question how far the law of domicile follows a person and affects her contracts made in other jurisdictions has been the subject of considerable discussion. It would probably not be a practical question where the attempt was to enforce a contract made outside the state of domicile, in a third state. The lex loci contractus would in all probability alone be looked to in such cases. But when the remedy is sought at the domicile, there is a strong tendency on the part of the courts to determine the validity of the contract by the law of the domicile.

This is illustrated by the case of ARMSTRONG v. Buer which is reported in connection with the case to which this note is appended. In that case enforcement of the contract was refused although it was valid where made.

So in Goldsmith v. Ladson, 19 Wash. I. Rep. 733, a woman residing in the District of Columbia purchased goods on credit in New York, and the courts of the District of Columbia held that her title to the property depended on the law of the District.

But in a Massachusetts case it was held that a contract made in another state by a married woman domiciled in Massachusetts, which she was at the time not capable of making under the law of Massachusetts, but which was valid by the law of the state where made, will sustain an action against her in the courts of Massachusetts. Milliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 23 Am. Rep. 241. In that case, however, the contract would have been valid if made at the time the suit was brought. During the discussion of the case the court said: "In the great majority of cases, especially in this country, where it is so common to travel, or to transact business through agents, or to correspond by letter, from one state to another, it is more just, as well as more convenient, to have regard to the law of the place of the contract, as a uniform rule operating on all contracts of the same kind, and which the contracting parties may be presumed to have in contemplation when making their contracts, than to require them at their peril to know the domicile of those with whom they deal, and to ascertain the law of that domicile, however remote, which in many cases could not be done without such delay as would greatly cripple the power of contracting abroad at all."

But it was further said: "It is possible also that in a state where the common law prevailed in full force, by which a married woman was deemed incapable of binding herself by any contract whatever, it might be inferred that such an utter incapacity, lasting throughout the joint lives of husband and wife, must be considered as so fixed by the settled policy of the state, for the protection of its own citizens, that it could not be held by the courts of that state to yield to the law of another state in which she might undertake to contract."

In discussing the validity of the transfer of shares of stock the California court said: "The capacity of a married woman is regulated by the law of her actual domicile. Dow v. Gould & Curry Silver Min. Co. 31 Cal. 323.

As is apparent from the opinions in RUHR v. BUCK the greatest difficulty arises in determining the appropriate remedy by which the contract is to be enforced. The remedy is to be governed by the lex fori. But what is the law of the forum. If the particular contract is recognized by the law of the forum and a particular remedy provided for it, no question can arise. That remedy must be followed. But if as in RUHR v. BUCK the statute has provided no remedy because the validity of such contracts is not recognized in the state what course shall be pursued. There is no right without a remedy. Therefore if the court recognizes the contract as valid some remedy must be given. Will the court compel a resort to the limited and often inadequate remedies provided against married women who are by the law of the state under disability. Or will it permit a resort to the remedies afforded in case of similar rights arising upon contracts between parties not under disabilities. The statute specifies neither. Therefore the matter is entirely within the control of the court and it should give the one which is most adequate; that is the one applicable in cases of similar contracts between persons not under disabilities. Such is the rule which has generally been followed.

In Merriell v. State Bank of Keokuk, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 423, the liability of a married woman doing business in Iowa was sought to be enforced by attachment of her land in Texas, and it was con-

The law has never authorized an attachment against a married woman's property.

The indebtedness being for cigars were not necessities, and they nowhere allege that Julia E. Buck attempted to bind her own estate, hence it created no charge upon the separate estate of the defendant, Julia E. Buck, in the attachment suit, and the judgment was void, so also sheriff's deed passed no title to J. P. Lewis.

Hooton v. Ransom, 6 Mo. App. 22; Kimm v. Weippert, supra; Maguire v. Maguire, 3 Mo. App. 463; Bedsworth v. Bowman, supra.

A judgment is merely a record contract, and an action on a judgment of a sister state is at common law an action of debt, hence a sister judgment brought here for collection; the remedy is by the lex fori and not lex loci, and can have no greater privileges or rights accorded to it than judgments rendered here.

tended that the trial court erred in submitting to the jury the laws of Iowa to create a liability against the separate real estate of a married woman situated in Texas, contrary to the constitution, laws, and public policy of Texas. But the court of civil appeals held that the trial court correctly applied the law of Iowa, the lex loci contractus, in the enforcement of the obligation in suit.

If the contract is to be held valid and binding it would seem to reasonably follow that her property in the state where the contract is sought to be enforced should be subject, for to hold that a valid and binding contract is not enforceable at any time nor in any manner is absurd. Whenever it is ascertained and determined by judgment of court that a contract made by a married woman in another state is valid and binding according to the rule founded upon comity between the states, the remedy provided for satisfaction of judgments should be applied as though the judgment was against a feme sole, or a married woman invested with the rights and subject to the responsibilities of a feme sole. Gibson v. Sublett, 32 Ky. 596.

In attempting to enforce a judgment obtained upon a contract made in another state where it was valid, the husband need not be joined as a defendant, although he would be a necessary defendant if the suit was on a Pennsylvania contract. Brans v. Cleary, 125 Pa. 204.

Judgment may be rendered against a married woman upon a valid note executed at the place of her domicile in another state. Wood v. Wheeler, 111 N. C. 231.

In Spearman v. Ward, 114 Pa. 684, an action was brought in Pennsylvania to enforce the contract liability of a married woman living in Ohio, against land situated in Pennsylvania, and it was conceded upon the argument that if under the law of Ohio the common-law disabilities of married women had been removed and the defendant clothed with a general power to contract the same as a feme sole, the plaintiffs would be entitled to obtain a judgment against her in Pennsylvania which could be enforced by execution, as in other cases.

The New York court has held that a married woman domiciled and owning separate property in one state in seeking a remedy for an injury to it in another state is governed by the laws thereof, and may bring the action in her own name, if such laws permit it, regardless of the laws of the state of domicile. Stoneman v. Erie R. Co. 53 N. Y. 429.

In the cases in which such rule has not been applied there has been some peculiar circumstance to take it out of the rule.

Thus, where the contract is an equitable charge on the separate estate of the woman, it must be enforced by an equitable suit in a state preserving the distinction between legal and equitable remedies, although in the state where made it might be enforced in a suit at law. Burchard v. Dunbar, 32 Ill. 450, 25 Am. Rep. 384.

So if, although in the state where the contract was made all contracts of married women are valid and may be sued at law, a suit is brought in a state where only contracts relating to her separate estate will sustain suits at law, the suit must be in equity, unless the contract is one concerning her separate estate. Halley v. Ball, 66 Ill. 250.

The case of Louisiana Bank v. Williams, 46 Miss. 618, which apparently is the strongest one in support of RUHE v. BUCK, does not go nearly so far as the latter case goes. In fact from its peculiar circumstances it can have little application as a precedent in other cases.

In it a married woman living in Mississippi executed in Louisiana a note secured by mortgage on land in Louisiana, and the court said that if the creditor came to Mississippi to seek his remedy against her, he must be governed by the Mississippi law, which had not provided for a judgment against her but only subjected her personal estate to liability for the debt. But in the course of the opinion, the court says, if, by the Louisiana law, a married woman was competent to incur debts generally, and coverture imposed no disabilities, it would be a different question from that we are dealing with. And they held that the law which permitted the contract in Louisiana was a local one, not intended to apply to married women generally.

In New Jersey it has been held that, to make the liability enforceable under the remedy given by the lex fori, which is a departure from the common law, it must be shown that the lex loci contractus was the same. It will not be presumed to be the same, and if the law is not shown the common-law rule will be presumed. So, if a contract by a married woman seeks to charge her separate estate, it must be enforced in equity in the absence of anything to show the law of the place where made, although by the law of the forum a suit against her on such a contract could be maintained at law. Bradley v. Johnson, 46 N. J. L. 271.

That decision seems to ignore the rule that the remedy is governed by the lex fori. It is in doctrine opposed to Stoneman v. Erie R. Co. supra.

Grantt, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This record presents this case: At the time of the transactions involved, a married woman in Missouri was incompetent to make a valid contract at law. At that time, however, she was authorized by the laws of Dakota to contract as a feme sole, and sue and be sued as such. Mrs. Buck, the wife of O. W. Buck, became the purchaser of a city lot in Tarkio, Mo., and held a bond for title from Perkins, the owner, until a balance of the purchase money should be paid. Under the firm name of O. W. Buck & Co., Mrs. Buck and her husband became indebted in Dakota, and the interest of herself and her husband in said lot was attached for said debt, in an action commenced in the circuit court of Atchison county, Mo. After this attachment was levied on the lot, Mrs. Buck sold the lot to Thompson and Trout, who afterwards paid the balance of the purchase money to Perkins, and received a warranty deed from Perkins, which was recorded. That a married woman was not subject to a suit by attachment in Missouri prior to 1889 was decided by this court in Gage v. Gates, 62 Mo. 412; and that a judgment obtained against her in such a proceeding was a nullity was repeated in Lincoln v. Rowe, 64 Mo. 188; and that she could not be sued as a member of a mercantile firm at law was also settled in Weil v. Simmons, 66 Mo. 617. From these and many other decisions, it would appear that no resident creditor could proceed by an attachment at law against a married woman in this state for a debt contracted in this state, and this record presents the question whether our laws will give non-resident creditors remedies to collect their claims against a married woman in this state, which we uniformly deny to our own citizens.

The Supreme Court of the United States in Scudder v. Union Nat. Bank of Chicago, 91 U. S. 406, 23 L. ed. 245, sums up the general principle in a few words: "Matters bearing upon the execution, the interpretation, and the validity of a contract are determined by the law of the place where the contract is made. Matters connected with its performance are regulated by the law prevailing at the place of performance. Matters respecting the remedy, such as bringing of suits, admissibility of evidence, and statutes of limitation, depend upon the law of the place where the suit is brought." So that while we concede that, by the laws of Dakota, Mrs. Buck could enter into a contract of partnership with her husband, and become bound for the debts of that partnership, the question remains, when the creditors sue her in this state, are they bound to take such remedies, and such only, as our laws offer against a married woman (for such she remains, notwithstanding her capacity to contract and sue and be sued), or are we bound to treat her as a single person? Judge Story, in his treatise on the Conflict of Laws (8th ed. § 556), says: "Having stated these general principles in relation to jurisdiction (the result of which is that no nation can rightfully claim to exercise it except as to persons and property within its own domains), we are next led to the consideration of the question in what manner suits arising from foreign causes are to be instituted and proceedings to be had until final judgment." "Are they to be according to the laws of the place where the parties, or either of them, live, or are they to be according to the modes of proceeding and forms of suit prescribed by the laws of the place where the suits are brought? Fortunately, here there is scarcely any ground left open for controversy, either at the common law or in the opinions of foreign jurists or in the actual practice of nations. It is universally admitted and established that the forms of remedies and modes of proceeding and the execution of judgments are to be regulated solely and exclusively by the laws of the place where the action is instituted, or according to the lex fori." This principle has been illustrated in many ways. Thus in Williams v. Haines, 27 Iowa, 251, the supreme court of Iowa, in an opinion by Chief Justice Dillon, held, in an action on a sealed instrument, executed in Maryland, that although, by the laws of Maryland, the consideration could not be inquired into, yet as the Iowa statutes provided that "the want or failure in whole or in part of the consideration of a written contract might be shown as a defense," and "the addition of a seal should not affect the character of the instrument in any way," the consideration could be impeached in an action in Iowa. Said the court: "The plaintiff must take such remedy as our laws afford him. He has not a vested right in the courts of other states to all the common-law incidents of contracts, provided the obligation of the contract be not impaired." The courts of Iowa "must administer its own laws, and not those of other states." In Mathuson v. Crauford, 4 McLean, 540, Fed. Cas. No. 9,279, judgment was rendered in Indiana on a note executed in Ohio. The laws of Indiana required an appraisement of lands before a sale on execution, and that no lands should be sold for less than one half of their appraised value, but the sheriff sold without regard to the valuation laws. The question was whether the sale was void for failure to comply with the Indiana law. The contention was that, as the contract was made in Ohio, its laws should control, and not those of Indiana. Discussing the proposition that the remedy existing in the state where the contract was made constituted an essential part of it, Mr. Justice McLean said: "It is impracticable, and cannot be enforced." "In the present case the laws of Ohio cannot be recognized in Indiana, in giving a different remedy from the existing laws here. No difficulties arise in giving effect in any state to what is properly called the 'law of the contract,' in contradistinction to the 'law of the remedy.'" "In the case before us, the note was given to a firm in Cincinnati, and payment was to be made there. We look to Ohio for the rate of interest, demand, and protest, and notice required by the laws of Ohio." "But, as the remedy has been sought in Indiana, the laws of Indiana must govern," as to the execution and sale. So in Mineral Point R. Co. v. Barron, 38 Ill. 365, a garnishee proceeding was commenced against the company in Illinois to recover wages due Barron. The company answered that it owed Barron $40, but set up that Barron was a resident of Wisconsin, and the head of a family, and that, by the laws of Wisconsin, such wages were exempt. It was urged that as Barron was a resident of Wisconsin, and the debt was contracted in that state, the exemption laws of Wisconsin should control; but the supreme court of Illinois held that this law merely affected the remedy when an action should be brought in Wisconsin, and could not be invoked in Illinois, saying: "The remedy must be governed by the laws of the state where the action is instituted." And in Burchard v. Dunbar, 82 Ill. 450, 25 Am. Rep. 384, a married woman signed the note of her husband in New York, and bound her separate estate by an express agreement to that effect. It had previously been ruled that, upon this equitable charge, the laws of New York permitted a judgment at law, without indicating any property out of which it was to be satisfied. Corn Exchange Ins. Co. v. Babcock, 42 N. Y. 613, 1 Am. Rep. 601. An action was brought on this note in Illinois, and the circuit court held, on the authority of the New York decision last cited, that the note was valid and binding at law in New York, and that it could be enforced as such in Illinois; but the supreme court of Illinois held that it did not follow that, because the remedy was an action at law in New York, it would be the same in Illinois, Judge Scholfeld saying: "But the law of the remedy is no part of the contract. Wood v. Child, 20 Ill. 209. 'When the question is settled that the contract of the parties is legal, and what is the true interpretation of the language employed by the parties in forming it, the lex loci ceases its functions, and the lex fori steps in, and determines the time, the mode, and the extent of the remedy.' Sherman v. Gassett, 9 Ill. 531; Chenot v. Lefevre, 8 Ill. 648." "That appellant charged her separate estate with the payment of the amount of the note, by the law of New York, is beyond question, . . . but this is in equity only, and although, by our present statutes, married women may sue and be sued either with or without joining their husbands, and defend without regard to whether the husband shall defend or not, and judgments may be recovered against them, we still preserve the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, and there is no authority [in Illinois] for suing and obtaining judgment against them in actions at law on purely equitable liabilities.' It will be observed that though the wife's contract was a binding obligation, and could be sued at law by the lex loci, and although, by the laws of the forum, she could be sued with or without joining her husband, still the plaintiff was given such remedy only—to wit, a suit in equity—as the law of the forum afforded in such a case, irrespective of the lex loci.

In the case at bar it is argued that, had her undertaking in New York been good at law, she could have been sued at law in Illinois. So she could, but it would have been so because the law of the forum gave that right; but, as we have seen, the law of Missouri denied the right to attach a married woman prior to the Revision of 1889. In Milliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 28 Am. Rep. 241, the question was "whether a contract made in Maine by a married woman domiciled in Massachusetts, which a married woman was not at the time capable of making under the laws of Massachusetts, but was then allowed by the law of Maine, and which she could lawfully make in Massachusetts, at the time of the suit, could be enforced in the courts of Massachusetts;" and the supreme court of Massachusetts answered in the affirmative, placing the decision, however, on the comity of states, and that the contract, in view of the subsequent enabling act of Massachusetts, was not contrary to the policy of that state. As the contract was valid by the lex loci, and as the lex fori afforded a remedy at the commencement of the suit, there would seem to be no doubt of the soundness of that decision; but if the law of Massachusetts had up to that time regarded the contracts of married women as utterly void at law, and had not permitted them to sue or to be sued, it would seem a different conclusion would have been attained, judging from the intimation of the distinguished jurist, Mr. Justice Gray, "that it was possible that in a state where the common law prevailed in full force, by which a married woman was deemed incapable of binding herself by any contract whatever, it might be inferred that such an utter incapacity, lasting throughout the joint lives of husband and wife, must be considered as so fixed by the settled policy of the state for the protection of its own citizens that it could not be held by the courts of that state to yield to the law of another state in which she might undertake to contract." The case supposed by Judge Gray is this case in fact. By the law of this state, Mrs. Buck's contract would have been absolutely void at law, and no action could have been maintained thereon in our courts, and such was the long-established policy of this state, and, unlike Massachusetts, she had not relaxed this rule prior to and at the time this attachment was levied. Is this state required, out of a spirit of comity, to award a nonresident a remedy at war with her own policy, and one which she constantly denied to her own citizens? The supreme court of Rhode Island in Hayden v. Store, 18 R. L. 106, answered in the negative. That the law of the forum governs as to remedies in the enforcement of contracts, see also, Pickering v. Fisk, 6 Vt. 102; Commercial Nat. Bank of Chicago v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 45 Wis. 172; Leiber v. Union Pac. R. Co. 49 Iowa, 688; Denny v. Faulkner, 22 Kan. 89; Green v. Van Buskirk, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 307, 18 L. ed. 599; Whart. Conf. L. S. 121; Bank of United States v. Donnelly, 83 U. S. 8 Pet. 362, 8 L. ed. 974; Laird v. Hodges, 26 Ark. 356.

A case very similar to this arose in Illinois. An action at law was brought against a married woman. She pleaded coverture at the time of making the contract and the commencement of the action. Reply: "Contract good by the laws of Iowa, where it was made, and a liability to suit as a feme sole in that state." Discussing the sufficiency of this reply, the supreme court of Illinois said: "A party seeking to enforce a contract valid by the laws of another state must avail of the remedy provided by our laws." "That part of the replication which alleges that, by the laws of the state of Iowa, a married woman could be sued alone on contracts concerning her separate property, did present an immaterial issue." But because, by the laws of Illinois, she could be sued alone, it was held that enough remained to make a good replication. Halley v. Ball, 66 Ill. 250. A different conclusion was reached in Robinson v. Queen, 87 Tenn. 445, 3 L. R. A. 214, although the court recognized the rule already stated, in these words: "Under this rule, we act in requiring the husband to be made a party defendant with the wife, as was done in the case at bar. While under the law of Kentucky, this married woman has had her disabilities removed, and can contract, sue, and be sued as a feme sole, we recognize and enforce in this state [Tennessee] so much of the foreign law as determines and fixes her liability.—In other words, the law of the contract; but in enforcing such liability in the courts of this state, if she is plaintiff, she must sue by next friend or with her husband, and, as defendant, her husband must be joined with her as a party." In other words, her status as a married woman, by the laws of Tennessee, still remained, and the remedies there given against a married woman controlled. That was a proceeding in a chancery court, and we are not sufficiently advised of the practice in that state to draw any conclusion as to its persuasiveness as an authority for the practice here invoked. The general principle announced is in harmony with the rule heretofore deduced. In Gibson v. Sublett, 82 Ky. 596, the supreme court of Kentucky held a married woman personally liable in Kentucky on a note executed in Louisiana, although, if she had made the note in Kentucky, her promise would have been void. The reasons for this decision are tersely stated by the court. They say: "And if, by the law of the place of the domicile of the husband, a married woman has a capacity to sue or to make a contract or to ratify an act, her acts so done will be held valid everywhere." Story, 25 L. R. A.

Conf. L. S. 66a. "If, then, the contract is to be held valid and binding here because it is so in the state where it was made, it would seem to reasonably follow that her property here should be subject;" "for to hold that a valid and binding contract is not enforceable at any time nor in any manner is absurd." And the court consequently held "that the remedy provided for the satisfaction of judgments in Kentucky should be applied as though the judgment was against a feme sole." Entertaining, as we do, the highest respect for the court that decided this case, we do not think its reasoning convincing in that case. In our opinion, it has mingled the "lex loci contractus" with the "lex fori," which are distinct in their nature and obligation, and treats them as one. We do not think that many other courts have gone so far. The rule which recognizes the binding force of the contract where made has never gone to the extent of attaching to it the local remedies, and carrying them into another jurisdiction, but it is left to each nation and state to enforce such a contract according to its own laws.

As already said, when this action was brought, this court had, by uniform decisions, held that a married woman could not be sued by attachment in actions at law in Missouri. No such remedy was available in our courts in favor of resident creditors. Had any citizen of Missouri proceeded by attachment at law against this real estate on a contract made or to be performed in this state, no lien would have been created, and no valid judgment could have been rendered against Mrs. Buck, and no purchaser for value would have been affected; but, if plaintiff's contention is true, the fact that this claim originated in Dakota has changed all this, and his attachment is as valid as if Mrs. Buck was a single woman. But Mrs. Buck is still a married woman, and there was no such exception in our code of procedure in favor of contracts executed beyond our borders when this suit was brought, and an attempt to enforce such a distinction out of a spirit of comity would create endless confusion. A purchaser's rights ought not to depend upon the accidental circumstance of the place of the execution of the contract upon which the judgment is based. Our courts administer justice without distinction, according to the modes prescribed by the state, and those who seek them must take such remedies as are prescribed. An infant's contract may be good in Illinois, but, if he is sued in Missouri, he is proceeded against as an infant, by next friend or guardian. His status, for the purposes of the action, is determined by our laws in force when the suit is brought. It follows that the circuit court properly held that the proceedings by attachment against Mrs. Buck were void, and hence presented no obstacle to the purchase by Trout and Thompson, and its judgment is affirmed.

Burgess, J., concurs.

Sherwood, J., dissenting:

Lot No. 16, in block No. 9, in the town of Tarkio, furnishes the subject-matter for this litigation, which takes the form of an equitable proceeding to divest the title out of certain of the defendants, who had bought the equitable interest in the lot of O. W. Buck and wife after the levy of the writ of attachment on the lot, plaintiff being the purchaser under such attachment proceedings, which were instituted in March, 1887, amended in June, 1889, so as to include two personal judgments rendered against Buck and wife, then residents of Dakota, and judgment duly rendered thereon after publication against the Bucks, as nonresidents, who were husband and wife, and sued as copartners in the original suit by attachment. Thompson and Trout, two of the defendants herein, purchased the interest of Buck on the 27th of July, 1889; abstracts of the attachment suit then being on file in the proper office. In June, 1890, Perkins, the holder of the legal title to the lot, made a deed to Trout and Thompson, the previous purchasers of the equitable title of Julia E. Buck, the wife, and her husband, O. W. Buck. Buck and wife and Trout and Thompson, defendants in the present proceeding, averred that Mrs. Buck being a married woman, the court in which the attachment proceeding was brought acquired no jurisdiction over her or her husband or the subject-matter in that suit. The answer also contained general allegations of denial of the averments of the petition, and plaintiff replied. The lower court found in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Other facts as necessary will be hereafter adverted to.

1. This record discloses the fact that the predominant question herein presented is whether a married woman, resident in Dakota, capable by the laws of that state of contracting as a feme sole in every particular, and of suing and being sued like any other person, can be sued in this state as a nonresident, and her lands attached to satisfy a debt. Having elaborately considered the authorities, Mr. Justice Story reaches the conclusion that: "Generally speaking, the validity of a contract is to be decided by the law of the place where it is made. . . . If valid there, it is by the general law of nations—jure gentium—held valid everywhere, by the tacit or implied consent of the parties. The rule is founded, not merely in the convenience, but in the necessities, of nations; for otherwise it would be impracticable for them to carry on an extensive intercourse and commerce with each other. The whole system of agencies, of purchases and sales, of mutual credits, and of transfers of negotiable instruments, rests on this foundation." Story, Conf. L. § 242. Elsewhere the same eminent author says: "In regard to questions of minority and majority, competency or incompetency to marry, incapacities incident to coverture, guardianship, emancipation, and other personal qualities and disabilities, the law of the domicile of birth, or the law of any other acquired and fixed domicile, is not generally to govern, but the lex loci contractus aut actus—the law of the place where the contract is made or the act done." "Although foreign jurists generally hold that the law of the domicile ought to govern in regard to the capacity of persons to contract, yet the common law holds a different doctrine, namely, that the lex loci contractus is to govern." "If, by the law of the place of the domicile of the husband, a married woman has a capacity to sue or to make a contract or to ratify an act, her acts so done will be held valid everywhere." Id. §§ 103, 241, 66a. From these premises, supported, as is needless to say, by abundant authority, let us deduce and apply the principles they enunciate to the facts heretofore set forth. This case must, then, be dominated by the law of Dakota. That law made Mrs. Buck, as to the contracts which resulted in the judgments obtained, a feme sole to all intents and purposes. By that law, the feme defendant made contracts which, being valid where made, became, eo instanti, valid everywhere, and capable of being enforced in like manner as in the state of their origin. Those contracts, thus made, and judgments obtained in Dakota, bore with them, wherever taken, the stamp of the status, capacity, and condition of the feme defendant conferred by the laws of that state; hence she is to be regarded, in reference to such contracts and judgments, as a feme sole in this state, with full capabilities and liabilities as such, and with none of the disabilities incident to coverture in this state. This must be so, or else the acknowledgment of the validity of the contracts would be but a barren and idle ceremony, conferring no benefits and affording no remedy; because if, in this state, Mrs. Buck be permitted to assert her coverture as a defense to such contracts, she thereby overthrows the force and effect of the law under which those contracts were made and those judgments recovered. We hold, then, that Mrs. Buck, as to such contracts, etc., already mentioned, occupies the attitude before this court of a feme sole, suable as such in every point and particular, as if she were discover. For this reason, our laws, which do not admit a recovery of a personal judgment against a feme covert in an action at law, do not apply, and were not intended to apply, to such a case, as will be more fully seen later on.

A number of well-considered cases support the views here expressed. Thus, in Kentucky a married woman is incapable of binding herself by contract except in a limited way as to necessities; but yet, in that state, a married woman and her husband, being domiciled in the state of Louisiana, where such contracts were valid, having executed with her husband a promissory note, it was ruled that the payee of such instrument could maintain an action on such note in the state of Kentucky against the feme covert, recover a judgment against her as a feme sole, and subject her general property in that state to the payment of such judgment. Gibson v. Sublett, 82 Ky. 596. In that case the principles announced by Story were referred to and followed, and it was there aptly and forcibly said: "If, then, the contract is to be held valid and binding here, because it is so in the state where it was made, it would seem to reasonably follow that her property here should be subject; for to hold that a valid and binding contract is not enforceable at any time, nor in any manner, is absurd. . . . In our opinion, whenever it is ascertained and determined, by judgment of court, that a contract made by a married woman in another state is valid and binding, as, according to the rule founded upon comity between the states, the contract in this case must be adjudged, the remedy provided for the satisfaction of judgments should be applied as though the judgment was against a feme sole or a married woman invested with the rights and subject to the responsibilities of a feme sole." The point that no personal judgment was rendered against the married woman was not passed upon in that case, because not assigned for error; but the evident drift and intimation of the opinion sanction the rendition of such a judgment, and the quotation there made from Hart v. Grigsby, 14 Bush, 542, and the reference thereto, set this point forth in a very clear light. In that case it appears that, by a statute of Kentucky, a decree of chancery in certain circumstances might be obtained conferring on a married woman the power to make contracts, sue, and be sued as a feme sole; and it was there said in reference to an instance where such power had been conferred: "Power to make a contract necessarily subjects the person possessing the power to the obligations legally incident to the contract made in the exercise of the power; and a married woman, authorized by statute to contract as a feme sole, is bound as a feme sole upon any contract she may make under the power, and is subject to all the remedies to which she would have been subject if unmarried." In that case it is worthy of remark, no change had occurred in the general laws of Kentucky respecting the method of procedure against married women. In North Carolina a married woman (with one exception, not necessary to be here adverted to) is incapable of binding herself by contract, nor is there any method of procedure provided for recovering a personal judgment against her; but, nevertheless, it has been held in that state that a promissory note executed by a married woman in the state of New York, where, by the late acts (1884), she could contract as a feme sole, could be sued in North Carolina, and such married woman being served with process in that state, a personal judgment could be rendered against her. Taylor v. Sharp, 108 N. C. 377. In a later instance in that state, where the note was executed by the feme covert in South Carolina, and being there valid, it was ruled that a personal judgment could be rendered against her. Wood v. Wheeler, 111 N. C. 231. Both of these cases proceed upon the theory that, the contract being valid where made, that validity attends it and determines the status, condition, and capacity of the maker, in the forum of another state, whose laws do not recognize the validity of such contracts, when made within the jurisdiction of such forum. A married woman, resident in Kentucky, and emancipated from the disabilities of coverture by a decree to that effect in a court of that state, executed, as surety of a firm of which her husband was a member, a promissory note, and it was held, in a suit instituted in Tennessee, that a judgment could be recovered against her on such note, and her property in that state sold for the satisfaction of the judgment thus rendered, though, by the lex fori there, no suits could ordinarily be maintained against a married woman there resident. Robinson v. Queen, 87 Tenn. 445, 3 L. R. A. 214. In Illinois the same principle has been enforced. Thus, a feme covert, resident in that state, executed a promissory note in the state of New York, whereby, by the statutes and adjudications of that state, she only charged her separate equitable estate. Subsequently, she and her husband, who had joined in the execution of the note, were sued in Illinois on the note, in an action at law, and judgment recovered; but it was held, in reversal of the judgment, that as her contract, by the law of the place of contract, was only of an equitable character, the only recovery which could be had against her was by a proceeding in equity, notwithstanding, by the statutes of Illinois then and theretofore in existence, a married woman could be sued at law, either with or without her husband, judgment recovered against her, and her property sold to satisfy the same. Burchard v. Dunbar, 82 Ill. 450, 25 Am. Rep. 334. The clear corollary from this case is that had the feme, by the statutes of New York, bound herself by the execution as a feme sole, a legal judgment might have been recovered against her in the state of her residence. In other words, her status towards the note and her capacity respecting the same, as well as the obligation of the contract, were determined by the lex loci contractus. In Massachusetts a married woman resided. By the statutes of that state, at that time, she was incapable of contracting. She made, however, a written guaranty of her husband's debt, and the instrument was forwarded and delivered in Maine, where such contracts were valid and binding, and where they could be enforced in the same manner "as if she were sole." Subsequently, the statutes of Massachusetts were so amended that a married woman could contract and could be sued. In the particular instance referred to, the feme covert who gave the guaranty was sued in Massachusetts, and it was held, after an elaborate and learned discussion, in which the principles heretofore quoted from Story as to the force and effect of the law of the place of contract were distinctly recognized, that the action could be maintained. Milliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 28 Am. Rep. 241. Of the correctness of this ruling there would seem to be no doubt, as the statutes of Massachusetts, at the time of action brought were in substantial conformity with those of Maine. In Spearman v. Ward, 114 Pa. 634, a married woman, residing in Ohio, executed certain promissory notes there, and was afterwards sued upon them in Pennsylvania, where she was incapable of contracting. In that case the action failed, because it did not appear that the feme defendant was capable of making the notes under the laws of Ohio, the court in that case saying: "It was conceded upon the argument that if, by the law of the state of Ohio, the common-law disabilities of married women have been removed, and the defendant is clothed with a general power of contracting the same as a feme sole, the plaintiff would be entitled to obtain a judgment against her here, which could be enforced by execution as in other cases. It is very certain that if the defendant had carried on business in this state, and had given the notes here, there could be no recovery. The reason is that the note or other obligation of a married woman here is void, as at common law. . . . The statutes of the state of Ohio attached to the special verdict do not confer upon a married woman a general power of contracting. They do not authorize married women to enter into general business, and bind themselves personally for notes given." This language bears with it the clear recognition of the doctrine that, had the feme defendant been able in Ohio to bind herself generally by the notes sued, this would have been a sufficient basis in Pennsylvania for a general judgment and general execution against her, though not allowable against women resident in that state. This view of that case is taken in the subsequent one of Evans v. Cleary, 125 Pa. 204. In that case a married woman, residing in Illinois, contracted a debt which she was authorized by the statutes of that state to contract as if she was unmarried, and which debt could be enforced against her separately. Action was afterwards brought on this debt in Illinois, and judgment recovered against the contracting feme. Subsequently, a suit was begun in Pennsylvania on the judgment thus obtained, against both the husband and the wife, dismissed as to the former, and judgment as to the latter. This judgment was affirmed, the supreme court holding that, being individually liable where the contract was made and the judgment recovered, her status remained unchanged in the state where the suit was brought, and that joinder of the husband was unnecessary. In a subsequent case, in the same state, an action was brought on a bond executed by a married woman in the state of Delaware, where she was liable personally on her contract, she being then resident in Pennsylvania. She resisted the action, one ground being that, owing to her disability, the contract could not be enforced against her personally; but thereupon it was held that judgment was properly recoverable against her in the state of Pennsylvania, the supreme court remarking: "The remedy and the effect to be given to any existing disability in the maker of the instrument are also to be determined by the law of the place of payment." Hill v. Chase, 148 Mass. 129. . . . The courts of this state will administer in such cases the lex loci contractus as against one under disability. Evans v. Cleary, supra. . . . We have therefore a contract made, and, in legal effect, delivered in Delaware, for the purchase of real property in that state, upon which, according to the laws of that state, the defendant is personally liable, notwithstanding her coverture. In passing upon it here our courts will secure to her the advantages, and enforce against her the obligations, of her contract in accordance with the laws of that state." Baum v. Birchall, 150 Pa. 164. In Wright v. Remington, 41 N. J. L. 48, it was held that an ordinary action might be maintained against a married woman alone on a contract made by her in Illinois, where she was capable of contracting as if unmarried, notwithstanding there was no such statute in New Jersey, and that the enforcement of such a contract in New Jersey was not repugnant to the general interests of the citizens or of the policy of that state.

From these authorities, the rule is readily deducible that, although the lex fori must apply to the remedy, yet it belongs to the lex loci contractus to interpret the contract, ascertain its validity, the nature of its obligations, the capacity and status of the contracting party; and, having done this, the lex fori applies the remedy in accordance with the legal status of the party sued, as previously determined by the law of the place of the contract. Thus, if a feme covert is sued in a jurisdiction where she is incapable of contracting, on a contract executed in a country where she is capable, by the form of the action brought against her, she will be treated and dealt with as a feme sole. In no other way, indeed, could validity, force, or effect be given to contracts made in another jurisdiction, unless the courts, when appealed to to enforce such contracts, aimed to do so in such a manner as to give effect to them according to the law which gave them validity. Camfrangue v. Burnell, 1 Wash. C. C. 840, Fed. Cas. No. 2,342. Bishop says: "A court, called upon to enforce a contract made in another state or country, tests its validity by the foreign law, except where domestic policy forbids. Not that in any proper sense the foreign law controls the tribunal; but, being duly proved, it is, by that portion of its own law which is termed 'international,' made domestic for the purpose." Bishop, Cont. Enlarged ed. § 1871. See also, Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 88 U. S. 18 Pet. 589, 10 L. ed. 808; Story, Conf. L. §§ 88, 89, 99.

2. If the foregoing observations be taken as correct, no difficulty is encountered in holding that the feme in this case was properly proceeded against by attachment. If her status by the law of Dakota was, respecting the contracts in question, that of a feme sole, attachment would necessarily run against her, as well as against any other nondisabled person. In two of the cases already cited (Robinson v. Queen and Evans v. Cleary, supra), the proceedings were instituted by attachment. A different conclusion as to the right to sue a married woman by attachment has been reached in Rhode Island (Hayden v. Stone), 18 R. I. 106; but that case is entirely consistent with itself, for there it is declared that no suit at all could be there maintained against a married woman, even on a promissory note executed by her in Massachusetts, and conceded to be valid by the laws of that state.

3. Taking it, then, for granted that the feme defendant could be sued by attachment, and the writ of attachment being levied on the interest of herself and husband in the litigated lot, and due notice of the pendency of the attachment having been filed in the proper office prior to the purchase by Trout and Thompson, it follows that plaintiff's title to the lot purchased at the attachment judgment sale will prevail over that of defendants Trout and Thompson, who purchased the lot of Buck, as the representative of his wife, and subsequent to the levy of the attachment writ, and subsequent to notice given of the attachment lien, took subject thereto; and as an abstract of the attachment was duly filed, as required by section 543, Rev. Stat. 1889, they cannot successfully deny that they had notice of the levy of the writ notwithstanding they may have had no actual notice thereof; and that Mrs. Buck was a partner in the firm of Oliver W. Buck & Co., that such firm was indebted as stated, and that she was not a resident of this state when the attachment suit was brought, was settled and determined by the judgment in that suit as effectually as if she had been personally served with ordinary process. In Irvine v. Leyh, 102 Mo. 200, the reporter makes the court say that notice by publication was less effectual than by personal service; but this was a mistake, as three of the members of the court, the writer of this opinion among the number, took the contrary view, to wit, that a person notified by publication is as much notified as those served within this state with personal process by an officer. The only difference, in legal effect, between the two methods of service, so far as necessary to mention them here, would be, in the former a bill of statutory review would be allowable, and in the second no such bill would lie. It does not appear that the sheriff notified the actual tenants of the property, but this, under the ruling in Durosett v. Hale, 88 Mo. 846, would not invalidate the levy.

For these reasons, there was error in dismissing plaintiff's petition. The foregoing was tendered as the opinion of the court, but, as my associates entertain and express different views, I file this as my dissent.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

ARMSTRONG, CATOR & CO., Appts.,
v.

N. W. BEST and Wife.

(112 N. C. 59.)

1. A contract for the sale of goods, made by an order given by a married woman in North Carolina to a firm in Maryland, and its shipment of the goods in Maryland, is a Maryland, and not an North Carolina, contract.
2. A contract for the purchase of goods, made in another state where it is valid, by a married woman resident in North Carolina, where the common-law disability of married women still obtains, and their promises under the policy of the state are void, and no power exists to proceed to judgment against them in personam, will not be enforced in the latter state.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wayne County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the price of goods sold and delivered to defendant L. C. Best, the wife of defendant N. W. Best. Affirmed.

"The case was submitted on the following agreed statement of facts: It is agreed that at the time the goods, for the purchase money of which this action is brought, were bought, the plaintiffs were merchants doing business in the city of Baltimore, in the state of Maryland, and the defendant L. C. Best was carrying on the trade of milliner and merchant in the city of Goldsborough, state of North Carolina, in her own name, as a licensed trader. That said goods were ordered by the defendant L. C. Best of the plaintiffs, and they were shipped by the plaintiffs to her, from their place of business, in the city of Baltimore, and were to be paid for by defendant L. C. Best at the end of sixty days. That at that time, and since, the defendant was, and is, a citizen and resident of the state of North Carolina, and a married woman, living with her husband, the defendant N. W. Best. The goods have not been paid for, except the credits set out in the accounts filed, and those not paid for were worth the agreed price of $212.43. That the defendant has never been a free trader under the statutes of North Carolina, and her husband has never consented in writing, to the order of said goods, and to the sale thereof."

Mr. W. C. Munroe for appellants.

Mr. W. R. Allen for appellees.

Shepherd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If the contract which is the subject of this action was made in this state, it is well settled that it would be void, by reason of the common-law disability of the feme defendant to make any contract whatever, upon which a personal judgment can be rendered against her, except in the cases provided by statute. Pippen v. Wesson, 74 N. C. 437; Dougherty v. Sprinkle, 88 N. C. 300; Baker v. Garrie, 108 N. C. 218; Flaum v. Wallace, 103 N. C. 296; Parthing v. Shields, 106 N. C. 280.

The plaintiffs, however, insist that the contract was made in the city of Baltimore, Md., their place of business, where they accepted the proposal of the defendant by shipping the goods according to her order. In this they are correct; for, if a contract is completed in another state, "it makes no difference, in principle, whether the citizen of this state goes in person, or sends an agent, or writes a letter, across the boundary line between the two states." Milliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 28 Am. Rep. 241.

As was said by Lord Lyndhurst: "If I, residing in England, send down my agent to Scotland, and he makes contracts for me there, it is the same as if I myself went there and made them." Pattison v. Mills, 1 Dow & C. 342. So, if one in New York orders goods from Boston, "either by a carrier whom he points out, or in the usual course of trade, this would be a completion—a making—of the contract; and it would be a Boston contract, whether he gave no note, or a note payable in Boston, or one without express place of payment." 2 Parsons, Cont. 586.

The contract, then, being a Maryland contract, it is next insisted that it is one which a feme covert could have made in that state, and therefore enforceable in the courts of North Carolina. We are by no means certain that the present contract is a valid one,

NOTE.—As to the enforceability of the contracts of a married woman outside of the state in which they are lawfully made, see note appended to the case immediately preceding this one.

according to the laws of Maryland, as the statute of that state seems to recognize the legal capacity of a married woman only through the extent of contracting with reference to property acquired by her "skill, industry, or personal labor." Assuming, however, that it is a valid contract in Maryland, we will proceed to the examination of the question whether it should be enforced by the courts of this state.

It is well settled that the law of one state has, proprio vigore, no force or authority beyond the jurisdiction of its own courts, and that whatever effect is given to it by the courts of foreign countries or other states is the result of that international comity (more properly called "private international law") which is the product of modern civilization. Hornthal v. Burwell, 109 N. C. 10, 18 L. R. A. 740. It is left to each state or nation to say how far it will recognize this comity, and to what extent it will be permitted to control its own laws. It has, however, been very generally settled that all matters bearing upon the execution, the interpretation, and the validity of a contract are to be determined by the law of the place where the contract is made, and, if valid there, it is valid everywhere. Taylor v. Sharp, 108 N. C. 377. An exception is maintained by some of the continental jurists as to the capacity of a contracting party, and they generally hold that the incapacity of the domicil attaches to and follows the person, wherever he may go. We remarked in Taylor v. Sharp, supra, that this was not considered by Mr. Justice Story (Conf. Laws, 103, 104) as the doctrine of the common law; and we also stated the conclusion of Gray, Ch. J., in Milliken v. Pratt, supra, that the general current of the English and American authorities is in favor of holding that a contract which, by the law of the place, is recognized as lawfully made by a capable person, is valid everywhere, although the person would not, under the law of the domicil, be deemed capable of making it. The proposition, though denied by Dr. Wharton as to infants and femes coverti (Conf. L. 113, 118), seems to be generally accepted in this country, in so far as it relates to the enforcement of contracts in courts other than those of the domicil. If, for example, the plaintiffs were suing upon the present contract in the courts of Maryland, the defendant could not, it is thought, avail herself of the incapacity of her domicil, but the lex loci contractus would prevail. But quite a different question is presented when the action is brought in the forum of the domicil. In such a case a very important qualification of private international law is to be considered: and this is, that no state or nation will enforce a foreign law which is contrary to its fixed and settled policy. In Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274, Chief Justice Taney, speaking for the court, said: "The comity thus extended to other nations is no impeachment of sovereignty. It is the voluntary act of the nation by which it is offered, and is inadmissible when contrary to its policy, or prejudicial to its interests." To the same effect is the language of Story, — 36 L. R. A.

that no state will enforce a foreign law if it be "repugnant to its policy, or prejudicial to its interests." Conf. L. 87. That this qualifying principle is applicable to cases like the present is manifest, not only by reason and necessity, but also by the decisions of other courts. Even in Milliken v. Pratt, supra, in which the lex loci contractus is pushed to the extreme limit, it is suggested that where the incapacity of a married woman is the settled policy of the state, "for the protection of its own citizens, it could not be held by the courts of that state to yield to the law of another state, in which she might undertake to contract." In Robinson v. Queen, 87 Tenn. 445, 3 L. R. A. 214, the contract was made by the feme defendant in Kentucky, where she resided, and under whose laws she was capable of contracting. An action was brought in Tennessee, and the court held, as we did in the similar case of Taylor v. Sharp, supra, and Wood v. Wheeler, 111 N. C. 232, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The court, however, said: "If this were a suit against a married woman, a citizen of this state, on a contract made out of the state, there would be much force in the insistence of the defendant." In Johnston v. Gentry, 11 Mo App. 323, it was held that where a married woman, having a separate estate in land in Missouri, makes a contract in another state, her capacity to make the contract, and its validity, are to be determined by the law of Missouri, in a suit in a Missouri court to enforce such contract. In Louisiana Bank v. Williams, 46 Miss. 618, 12 Am. Rep. 819, the contract was made in Louisiana, where it would have been valid against the feme defendant. The suit was brought in Mississippi, the place of her domicil, and under whose laws the contract was void by reason of her coverture. The opinion of the court is very elaborate, and, although the special character of the Louisiana law is referred to, it is believed that its reasoning is of general application. The court said: "It is the prerogative of the sovereignty of every country to define the conditions of its members—not merely its resident inhabitants, but others temporarily there—as to capacity and incapacity. But capacity or incapacity, as to acts done in a foreign country, where the person may be temporarily, will be recognized as valid or not, in the forum of his domicil, as they may infringe or not its interests, laws, and policies." After speaking of the separate estate of the wife, and the statutes prescribing how it may be charged, the court, referring to the foreign plaintiff, says: "But he must satisfy the court that his debt was such a charge upon her estate, or its income, as she had the power to make; otherwise, it would be a violation of the tenure, the conditions, of her title, to allow him to subject it. But the creditor may say: 'I cannot bring this debt within the terms defined by your law. Nevertheless it was such a contract as a married woman could make, by the law of Louisiana. Comity requires your courts to treat the contract precisely as Louisiana would, and I demand a judgment against the wife.' 'No,' says the court, 'you cannot get here any fruit of a judgment. There is nothing subject to its payment, and our law affords no remedy against a married woman in any of its courts,—law or equity,—except through a property which she has, and which must be pointed out by the creditor. We know of no such thing as a personal obligation, aside from, and independent of, a property which may discharge it.' ”

In North Carolina it has been conclusively determined that the common-law disability of a feme covert still obtains, and that, except in the cases provided by statute, her promise, as was said by Ruffin, J., is “as void as it ever was, with no power in any court to proceed to judgment against her in personam.” Dougherty v. Sprinkle, supra. The constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof protect her separate estate, and prescribe the manner in which she may dispose of or charge it, and the assent of the husband is generally necessary. This brief reference to our laws in respect to married women is sufficient to show that the enforcement of the present contract is wholly repugnant to our domestic policy, as well as prejudicial to the interests of our citizens. It is not pretended that the defendant has attempted to charge her separate estate in any manner provided by our laws: and to hold that she may subject it to execution upon a personal judgment, by reason of a promise made during a short visit to another state, or, as in this case, by a simple order for goods, would afford an easy method of charging her property, in contravention of the public policy and laws of the domicil. It is further to be observed that in North Carolina, as a general rule, the written assent of the husband is necessary in order to give any effect whatever to her obligations, yet this wholesome provision may easily be evaded, even in the very presence of the husband, and despite his protest, by a simple correspondence by the wife with parties in another state, which may technically amount to a foreign contract. In this way she could indirectly dispose of or charge all of her real or personal property, entirely freed from the restraint of her husband, or the methods prescribed by the lex rei situs. We cannot assent to the proposition that a foreign law thus introduced, and so utterly subversive of the laws regulating a large amount of property within the limits of this state, will be recognized and enforced by our courts. The courts of our state have perfect jurisdiction over all personal and real property within its limits, belonging to the wife; and, if our laws in respect to the manner in which it may be charged conflict with those of another state, it cannot be made a question in our own courts as to which shall prevail. It is certainly competent for any state to adopt laws to protect its own property, as well as to regulate it; and “no nation,” says Story, “will suffer the laws of another to interfere with her own, to the injury of her citizens. That whether they do or not must depend on the condition of the country in which the foreign law is sought to be enforced, the particular nature of her legislation, her policy, and the character of her institutions. . . . That whenever a doubt does exist the court which decides will prefer the laws of its own country to that of the stranger.” Conf. L. 28.

For the reasons given, we cannot recognize the present contract as an enforceable one in our courts. We think his honor was correct in his ruling that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover.

Affirmed.

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin the alleged infringement of the trademark “Blackstone” as applied to cigars. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Putnam, Circuit Judge, and Nelson and Webb, District Judges.

Messrs. George L. Huntress and Morris S. Wise for appellants.

Messrs. Payson E. Tucker and George C. Abbott for appellees.

Putnam, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court.

The Reverend Mr. Blaxton, or Blackston, suggested a name which has become a favorite one for local geographical uses. A well-known street in Boston, on which two of the parties named in the controversy in this case conducted their business; a river, partly in Massachusetts and partly in Rhode Island (not of the first order, but so lined with manufactories and villages that it is well known throughout the United States); a canal following the line of that river (now almost a tradition, but formerly as well known as the river itself); a considerable town in the former state; and many local corporations,—bear the name of "Blackstone." From the best view of the facts of this case which could be taken for all, A. P. Holley & Son, Waitt & Bond, the defendants below, and Levy Bros., the complainants below, each without the knowledge of the acts of the others, and contrary to the caution of the courts, usually disapproving of the use of widely known geographical names as trade-marks, of which the last example of importance is Columbia Mill Co. v. Alcorn, 150 U. S. 460, 37 L. ed. 1144, adopted for cigars the word "Blackstone,"—A. P. Holley & Son, for the local market at and about Woonsocket, in the state of Rhode Island; Waitt & Bond, originally for Boston and the New England states; and Levy Bros., originally for New York and the west. It is not necessary for the court to decide now whether, under the circumstances of this case, this use of a geographical name for the several limited markets described could be protected by the law, as was done in Mouson v. Boehm, L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 398. Nor, in the view we take, need we consider the origin of the alleged rights of A. P. Holley & Son.

Levy Bros. claim priority. In 1878 they manufactured, on a special order, 5,000 cigars, with some samples, applying to them the name in question. These were intended for one Thompson, who was then doing business on Blackstone street, in Boston, and who ordered the cigars either through A. R. Mitchell & Co., of Boston, or from them; A. R. Mitchell & Co. being then either the selling agents of Levy Bros., or the only parties at Boston to whom Levy Bros. made sales of their goods. It is claimed that on this occasion this use of the name was suggested by Thompson, and that it belonged to him, rather than to Levy Bros. Thompson did not accept the cigars, and they were soon after sold by A. R. Mitchell & Co., either on their own account, or on account of Levy Bros. In the view we take of the law of trade-marks, it is not necessary to determine either of the foregoing alternative propositions, some of which came under consideration in the important case of Paine v. Daniels & Sons' Breweries [1893] 2 Ch. 567. No further sales of any cigars with this name were made by Levy Bros. until 1884. They claim that in the interval they kept samples on hand; but, as the cigars were not actually put on the market during the intervening period, the court considers this inconsequential, under the rules which we will hereafter state. It is undisputed that A. P. Holley & Son sold cigars under the trade-mark of "Blackstone" as early as 1881, in and about Woonsocket; and in 1884 Levy Bros. sold, either to or through A. R. Mitchell & Co., a lot of 5,000 cigars, ordered by one Cook, who also lived at Woonsocket, undoubtedly for sale in competition with the cigars of A. P. Holley & Son and in their market. The rules which we will hereafter explain make it clear that the transaction of 1878 did not establish in Levy Bros. an exclusive right, against Waitt & Bond, to the trade-mark now in dispute, and that, as the sale of 1884 occurred after the long interval of six years, it had only the effect of an incipient transaction. Moreover, as it operated as a direct interference with the market of A. P. Holley & Son, which had certainly been established as early as 1881, it was ineffectual for that reason, if for no other. Another lot of 5,000 cigars was manufactured during the same year (1884) by Levy Bros., intended for the same Cook, but they were not taken by him; and they remained in the hands of A. R. Mitchell & Co., undisposed of, until some time between the beginning of May, 1885, and the latter part of July, 1885, when they were sold by them. At the time of this sale, Waitt & Bond had already put on the market their own cigars with the name "Blackstone." Subsequent to the sale in 1884, Levy Bros. claim to have kept samples on hand, but as to that claim we make the same observations which we have made with reference to the claim touching samples between 1878 and 1884.

In April, 1885, Waitt & Bond, who were large manufacturers of cigars, doing business on Blackstone street, in Boston, put on the market cigars of their own manufacture, with the name "Blackstone," in ignorance of what had been previously done by Levy Bros. touching the same name, and in good faith. This was not a mere experiment on the part of Waitt & Bond, but was continuously followed by extensive sales and extensive advertisements, the sales amounting in 1885 to 412,142 cigars; in 1886, to 1,151,252; in 1887, to 1,488,136; in 1888, to 2,731,560; in 1889, to 5,386,096; in 1890, to 8,291,366. As already stated, their market was in Boston and New England. In 1889, Levy Bros. commenced the continuous manufacture and sale of cigars under this name, and have manufactured and sold the same from that time to the present in very considerable amounts, mainly in New York and the west. Their bill in the present case was filed November 12, 1890, and contains the following allegations:

"And the complainants further say that, until they found a market for their said genuine Blackstone cigars in the city of Boston, the complainants had never known or heard of a cigar other than their own being sold under the name of, and known as, the 'Blackstone Cigars;' but in the summer of 1889 the complainants learned for the first time that a cigar purporting to be made by the defendants was being sold throughout New England, and particularly in the city of Boston, under the name of, and known as, the 'Blackstone Cigar.' Thereupon, the complainants at once caused an investigation to be made, and found, and therefore charge, that subsequent to the adoption by the complainants of the name or mark of 'Blackstone Cigars,' etc.

The record shows that on July 26, 1889,

Levy Bros. wrote Waitt & Bond a letter, which, with the correspondence which followed, would be sufficient, if their rights were in other respects perfect, to lay a claim as of that date.

On the best theory of the facts for the complainants, the case stands as follows: In 1878 complainants manufactured and sold one lot of 5,000 cigars, and some samples, under the name in question; in 1884, another lot of 5,000; another lot in 1885, after Waitt & Bond commenced the manufacture and sale under the same name and no more, proved to the satisfaction of the court, until 1889. Meanwhile, in April, 1886, Waitt & Bond commenced the sale and manufacture under the name in question, and carried on the same continuously and extensively, as already explained. If there was any suggestion that Waitt & Bond knew the facts as shown by Levy Bros., and had surreptitiously made use of a name which they were well aware Levy Bros. claimed as their own, although they had not put it on the market, except as stated, there might be some ground for an equity against Waitt & Bond; but we believe no case can be found where, with intermittent offers of merchandise bearing a certain name, with such long lapses on the one side, and on the other the uninterrupted and innocent use of the same name for five years without question, and a consequent growth of an extensive and valuable business, the equity courts have interfered in favor of the former against the latter. The extensive dealings of Levy Bros., together with the fact of their relations with A. R. Mitchell & Co., whatever they were, making, through all these years, large sales of the cigars of Levy Bros. in the city of Boston, raise such a violent presumption against Levy Bros. as to the probability of their knowledge of the course of trade of Waitt & Bond touching this cigar as renders it difficult for this court to accept as true the claim that Levy Bros. were ignorant thereof, and did not acquiesce in it. However, we do not intend to rest this case on mere presumptions, on the doctrine of laches, or on that of abandonment, which latter was so fully argued. We rest it on the conclusion that Levy Bros. never acquired any right, sufficient to enable them to assert it to the detriment of any one using the name "Blackstone" under the circumstances, and at the time, under and at which it has been used by Waitt & Bond.

It seems to have been assumed in the discussions of this case that the common-law right to a trade-mark comes more from selection or discovery than from actual occupation of the market. Browne on Trade-Marks, at various points, is relied on; and, among other expressions found therein, the following, in section 52, is stated as though it constituted the whole rule, and required no limitation: "That is, how long does it take to adopt it? The answer is obviously this: The moment one who has selected a symbol to indicate his merchandise applies the mark to his goods, the act is complete. The avowal of his intention to adopt, his registration of the mark, and notice to the whole world, do not constitute adoption; but apply the mark to the articles for sale, and, eo instanti, the act is complete."

It may be that, according to the letter of this citation, the selection of the name "Blackstone," with a single sale, would have been sufficient to confirm in Levy Bros. the exclusive right to its use; and this independently of all questions which might arise from the fact that A. P. Holley & Son, Waitt & Bond, and Levy Bros. were practically occupying different markets. But this is not the law. The right to a trade-mark at common law must not be confused, as it too frequently is, with the prima facie right existing under registration statutes. It arises to such a limited extent from the mere matter of selection or discovery of the name or symbol used that this may be of trivial consequence. A singular illustration of this fact is found in Siebert v. Findlater, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 801, where, as applied to Dr. Siebert's bitters, the word "Angostura," indicating the place of their origin, was not selected by him as his trade-mark, but, instead thereof, the words "Aromatic Bitters," to which he added a statement that the bitters were prepared by him at Angostura. The public, however, applied to them the words "Angostura Bitters;" so that, by the act of the public, those words became the usual designation of the article, which the court protected in the case referred to. In the well-known Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82, 25 L. ed. 550, in which the court held the first trade-mark registration statute to be unconstitutional, it said (page 94): "The ordinary trade-mark has no necessary relation to invention or discovery. The trade-mark recognized by the common law is generally the growth of a considerable period of use, rather than a sudden invention. It is often the result of accident rather than design," etc.

Other positive expressions follow on the same page.

The opinion of Vice Chancellor Sir. W. Page Wood, in Collins Co. v. Brown, 8 Kay & J. 428, is a very good compendium of the common law of trade-marks. So far as the case at bar is concerned, the vice-chancellor expresses the principles and limitations of that branch of the law in the following words (page 427): "The simple question in these cases is, Has the plaintiff, by the appropriation of a particular mark, fixed in the market where his goods are sold a conviction that the goods so marked were manufactured by him; and if so, and if no one else has been in the habit of using that mark, another man has not the right to use that mark, so as to commit the fraudulent act of palming off his own goods as being the goods of the person who is known to have been in the habit of using it."

Many authorities could be cited, illustrating and approving these rules, and with them the principle that it is a fundamental basis of a right of action for the violation of a trade-mark that the public has been defrauded, or may be. It is frequently said that private rights in a trade-mark are only incidental to the prevention of public fraud. This peculiarly illustrates the force of the truth that, prior to the use of the name "Blackstone" by Waitt & Bond, Levy Bros.

had neither made any appropriation, nor fixed in the market any conviction on the part of the public, within the terms of the citation from Vice Chancellor Wood,—especially, not to such an extent that there was any possibility of the public being defrauded by others' use of the name. Of course, we do not determine whether, if there had been by one person a willful use of a name which had been in good faith selected by another, and experimentally put on the market, or even put on the market at long intervals, as in the case at bar, equity would not interfere, or what, under the other circumstances of this case, would have been the result, if the sales by Waitt & Bond had been only experimental; but as against innocent parties, who have, through a period of years, built up an extensive business, it is clear that Levy Bros. had not, on any view of the facts, brought themselves within the law. It is therefore plain that the conclusions of the circuit court were correct.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

MILLBRAE CO., App't.

H. H. TAYLOR et al., Respts.

(.....Cal.....)

1. The use as a trade-name by a milk dealer of the name of a well known ranch cannot be protected in equity, where the milk which he sells is not from that ranch, even if it is of a superior quality.
2. A contract by the owner of a ranch called "Millbrae," on division of business with a partner in the milk business who had no interest in the real estate, to furnish the latter a supply of milk from that ranch daily for at least one year does not convey the exclusive right to the use of the name "Millbrae" in the milk business so as to prevent the owner of the ranch from using the name after the other party has ceased to buy milk from that ranch.

Appellant in this case asserts no exclusive right to a trade-mark. No question as to the rights of the public at large is at issue. It is contended that after a man has sold his interest in the good-will of a particular business, it is wrong and unlawful for him to interfere with that good-will, to the injury and loss of his vendee. Equity does not permit unconscionable, unlawful methods of competition in business.

Haynes, O., filed the following opinion: Action to enjoin the defendants from using a "trade-name," which it is alleged belongs to the plaintiff (a corporation), and for damages. Findings and judgment were against the plaintiff, and this appeal is taken from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial. An outline of the facts, condensed from the findings, may be thus stated: Some time prior to 1865, the defendant D. O. Mills became and still is the owner of a tract of land in San Mateo county, at the railroad station now, and ever since 1865, known as Millbrae station. From 1865 until August, 1883, A. F. Green and defendant Mills were copartners, engaged in the business of raising and keeping cows of superior quality and breed upon said land, and selling the milk therefrom in the city of San Francisco, said business being conducted, at least since 1875, under the trade-name of "Millbrae Dairy;" the word "Millbrae" being compounded of the name of the owner of the ranch (omitting the "s") and the Scotch word "brae." In August, 1883, F. H. Green purchased a one-third interest in the cows and other personal property and business, and the firm as thus constituted continued the business until September 1, 1886, under the same trade-name. At the date last named the copartnership was dissolved by mutual consent, and in the settlement A. F. and F. H. Green took the milk routes and business of selling the milk in San Francisco, with the wagons, horses, and appurtenances, and defendant Mills, who was at all times the sole owner of the land, took all the dairy implements, supplies, cows, and other personal property at the ranch, and on the same day entered into an agreement with said A. F. and F. H. Green whereby he agreed to sell to them and they agreed to buy, not less than 270 nor more than 390 gallons of milk per day, at a price therein specified, the milk to be thus furnished by defendant Mills to be exclusively from his own dairy, and this agreement was to continue for at least one year. A similar agreement was made each year, the last being dated September 1, 1889, the quantity named therein being not less than 360 and not exceeding 410 gallons per day. This contract stipulated that it should be in force for at least one year, and thereafter until one of the parties should give the other three months' notice of his intention to terminate it. About July 1, 1890, A. F. and F. H. Green organized a corporation under the name of the Millbrae Company (the plaintiff herein), and conveyed to it their said business, property, and good-will, they being the principal stockholders therein, and practically owning and carrying on said business through said corporation, and on the 1st of August, 1890, ceased to take milk from defendant Mills under said contract, and thereafter the plaintiff procured from Marin county the milk with which it supplied its customers. Until the formation of the corporation, the business continued to be conducted by A. F. and F. H. Green under the name of the "Millbrae Dairy," and their delivery wagons were so marked, and that name was printed upon their bills and receipts, upon which it was also stated that the milk was "produced on Millbrae farm, San Mateo county." After the organization of the corporation, the name on the wagons and bills was changed to "Millbrae Company," and on the bills it was stated simply "pure country milk, produced from rich pasture, wholesome feed, healthy cows;" without any indication as to the locality except the word "country." On September 1, 1890, the defendant D. O. Mills commenced the business of selling milk from his said dairy in the city of San Francisco, and engaged defendant Taylor as agent for that purpose, and employed defendant Cole to manage the sale and distribution of the milk in the city; and in this business adopted and used upon his wagons and upon his bills the original trade-name, "Millbrae Dairy," but specified upon his bills and advertisements that the milk sold was from the Millbrae dairy, in San Mateo county, and added: "Do not confound it with the Millbrae Company." At the time of the dissolution of the copartnership, a valuation was put upon all the property, and among other items of the city branch of the business, which was taken by A. F. and F. H. Green, was "100 cans' trade, $4,000."

The foregoing facts are not disputed, and are sufficient to present the principal question in the case. There are several specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify certain findings, but these can be more briefly disposed of after deciding the principal question, since if the findings excepted to were framed as appellant suggests they would not change the result. It is insisted by appellant that the "trade-name" is a part of the good-will sold by defendant Mills to Green & Green, and for which they paid a large sum of money; that such name is an important element in such good-will, and that plaintiff has the exclusive right to its use. Appellant is in error as to the facts to which he applies the law, and hence is wrong as to his conclusions. The findings upon this subject are not only supported, but are made clear by the testimony of F. H. Green, who was one of the parties to the contract under which it is claimed the good-will of the business and the right to use the trade-name was sold by defendant Mills. He said: "Prior to that time (referring to his purchase of an interest in 1883) the business had been carried on by D. O. Mills and my father, under the name of the 'Millbrae Dairy.' I think they gave it the name of the Millbrae dairy in 1875 or 1876. In 1883 the business was in the name of the Millbrae dairy. I continued in business with them some three years. In 1886 we entered into an agreement to divide the business up. Mr. Mills took the interest in the country, and my father and myself took the interest here. Since that time my father and myself conducted the business under the name of the Millbrae dairy." It will also be observed that on the day of the dissolution of the partnership the contract was entered into for the sale by Mills to the Greens of the milk produced at Millbrae, and by which the Greens agreed to sell the same in San Francisco, and that defendant Mills has ever since continued the business of keeping cows and producing milk at the same place and under the same name. There was nothing said in the contract about the sale or transfer of the good-will, or of the use of the name under which the business had been conducted. It was not a sale of the entire business with which the name was connected, but a "division" of the business, and the name was equally applicable and equally important to each part. So long as the Greens or their successors continued to sell Millbrae milk, there was no conflict of interest in the use of the name, nor was there any agreement, covenant, or obligation that the Greens should have the right to use it longer than they continued to sell Millbrae milk. On the contrary, the fair and reasonable implication was that the name should only be used in connection with the sale of milk produced by the owner of the ranch and dairy familiarly known by that name, and which name was even more important to be retained by the owner of the ranch than by one whose right to sell the milk depended upon a yearly contract. Nor was this contract terminated by defendant Mills, but plaintiff, for its own advantage, voluntarily terminated it by a three-months notice, under the terms of the contract, and now insists that it may deprive defendant Mills of all use and benefit of the well-established name in disposing of his milk, while using the false name of "Millbrae" for selling the milk of a competing producer.

It is not necessary to review the cases cited by appellant, for the question involved is no longer an open one. In the case of Joseph v. Macowsky, 96 Cal. 521, 19 L. R. A. 53, it was said: "A person who comes into a court of equity for an injunction in a case of this kind must come with clean hands. He cannot be granted relief upon a claim to the exclusive use of a trade-mark which contains a false representation, calculated to deceive the public as to the manufacturer of the article and the place where it is manufactured. Browne, Trade-Marks, §§ 71, 474; Palmer v. Harris, 60 Pa. 156, 100 Am. Dec. 537; Fetridge v. Wells, 13 How. Pr. 385; Hobbs v. Francese, 19 How. Pr. 571; Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, 27 L. ed. 708. In Stegert v. Abbott, 61 Md. 284, 48 Am. Rep. 101, the court said: 'It is a general rule of law in cases of this kind that courts of equity will not interfere by injunction where there is any lack of truth in the plaintiff's case; that is, where there is any misrepresentation in his trade-mark or labels.'" If, at the time the partnership was dissolved, D. O. Mills had sold to his copartners the ranch and dairy, as well as his interest in the business of selling the milk there produced, the property in the trade-name and the exclusive right to use it would have passed to the purchasers, and Mills could not have applied the name to another ranch or dairy and used it in the like business to the injury of the plaintiff. By the division of the partnership property and business, coupled with the contracts for the sale of the same milk, the Greens acquired the right to use the trade-name so long as they sold Millbrae milk; but they could not rightfully use it after they ceased to sell that milk, without wronging both Mills and the public. It does not aid the plaintiff's case that Marin county milk, which it now sells, is as good or even better than Millbrae milk. As was said in a similar case, "the privilege of deceiving the public, even for their own benefit, is not a legitimate subject of commerce." Prince Mfg. Co. v. Prince's Metallic Paint Co. 135 N. Y. 24, 17 L. R. A. 129. For a full discussion of the questions principally involved in the case at bar, see the case last above cited, and also Pepper v. Labrot, 8 Fed. Rep. 29, and Huwer v. Dannenhoffer, 83 N. Y. 499. In Atlantic Mill. Co. v. Robinson, 20 Fed. Rep. 217, it was held that the right to the symbol is inseparable from the right to make and sell the commodity which it has been appropriated to designate. Pierce v. Guillard, 68 Cal. 63, 58 Am. Rep. 1, is entirely consistent with Joseph v. Macowsky, supra, and is against appellant.

It is claimed that the second finding is, in effect, that defendant Mills first used and adopted the name "Millbrae" before his partnership with A. F. Green, and that this is not justified by the evidence. Whether this name was adopted before or after is wholly immaterial. It had certainly been used many years before the dissolution, and was well known. It was the name of a locality, and attached thereto, no matter by whom nor when it was originated. Whether Millbrae farm is or is not shown by the evidence to be "peculiarly" fitted and adapted to the purpose of producing milk, or that it is not shown to produce better milk than other farms or dairies, is also immaterial. The name used to indicate milk produced on that farm had become valuable, and the question here is not one of comparison with other milk or other ranches, but whether defendant Mills shall be deprived of the use of a name that is valuable to him. The finding that "D. O. Mills never sold nor conveyed to A. F. Green and F. H. Green nor to either of them, the good-will of the business of selling milk in the city of San Francisco" is, I think, supported by the evidence. The evidence shows that at the time of the dissolution of the copartnership four milk routes were operated. Those routes were not defined in the evidence. There was no agreement that Mills should not engage in that business in the city. Whatever might be said of the "routes" then operated, there is nothing in the evidence to indicate that he intended to exclude himself from the business of selling milk in the city, unless during the continuance of his contracts with his former partners. Besides, so far as the use of the trade-name is concerned, the good-will of the milk routes is an immaterial factor. It was found by the court that Green & Green "were to take from D. O. Mills all the milk which might be necessary to carry on the said business;" and this, it is said, is not justified by the evidence. The agreement, as we have seen, specified a minimum and maximum quantity, and, while they did not contract not to buy or sell other milk, and the evidence shows that they sometimes did so, yet the finding is substantially true. It was a division of the business, and during the continuance of these contracts they advertised no other milk, and there is no evidence tending to show that it was not usually sufficient to supply their customers. The finding that the use of the word "Millbrae" was a representation to the public that the milk sold was produced at Millbrae farm or dairy is incontrovertibly supported by the evidence, as is also the finding that the use of the same word by the plaintiff after it ceased to sell Millbrae milk was a false representation. The assurance given by plaintiff to its customers that it was selling them Marin county milk could not have been necessary if the use of the word "Millbrae" did not imply that it was selling milk from Millbrae dairy.

It was further alleged in the complaint that defendants Taylor and Mills entered into a scheme which had for its object the going into the business of selling milk in said city, and of obtaining customers by enticing away the customers of the plaintiff; that in pursuance thereof they induced the defendant Cole, who had been in the employment of the plaintiff and its predecessors for fifteen years, and had full knowledge of their milk routes, to leave the plaintiff and enter into their service, and were thus able to impose upon the customers of the plaintiff and sell them milk while such customers believed they were purchasing from plaintiff; that defendants' wagons closely resembled plaintiff's, and had painted on them the words "Millbrae Dairy," and were run under the personal charge of defendant Cole, and by these means, and particularly by using the name "Millbrae," and having the same painted upon their wagons, and having them in charge of defendant Cole, have been drawing away plaintiff's customers, and allege damages in the sum of $500. Upon these issues the court found that no scheme was entered into; that none of plaintiff's customers were imposed upon, or bought milk from defendants when they supposed they were buying from plaintiff; that the wagons used by defendants do not resemble plaintiff's wagons; that none of plaintiff's customers have been drawn away, except by fair and open competition; that none of said customers were misled by the defendants' use of the trade-name "Millbrae," and that plaintiff has not sustained any damage. Appellant claims that none of these findings are supported by the evidence. That defendants sold milk to a very considerable number of the former customers of plaintiff is not disputed. Whether defendants obtained these customers by improper means is a mixed question of law and fact; the means used being a question of fact, but whether such means were improper is a question of law, depending upon the relation of the parties, and their rights and duties towards each other. There is no doubt that plaintiff has sustained loss by the competition of defendants, but whether such loss is a legal injury, entitling the plaintiff to recover damages, is quite another question. The use of the trade-name, so long used by plaintiff and its predecessors, must necessarily aid the defendants in securing custom, but, having the right to use it, plaintiff cannot complain.

The circular used by defendants for advertising their business were headed "Millbrae Dairy, of Millbrae, San Mateo County," and informed the people that they would sell their own milk, and further said, "Do not confound it with the Millbrae Company." We think these findings are fully justified by the evidence, notwithstanding the evidence shows that plaintiff suffered loss in consequence of what defendants did. Some of these findings, taken by themselves, are mixed conclusions of law and fact, and necessarily so. But they must be read in connection with the other findings, showing the relations of the parties and their rights and duties toward each other. Appellant contends that "a person who sells the good-will of a business will be enjoined from again setting up business at such a place and in such a manner as to destroy or diminish the business of which he had sold the good-will; that the sole issue is between D. O. Mills, the vendor of the good-will of a business, and appellant, successor to his vendees." We think that the only good-will that was sold by Mills was the good-will of the routes then operated for the sale of Millbrae milk; that it was not the intention of Mills to shut himself out from them, nor from any part of the city, if his vendees should cease to sell his milk. His vendees might have exacted other conditions, but they did not do so. In the language of F. H. Green, it was a "division of the business" theretofore carried on by the so-called vendor and vendees as partners, and that business was the sale of Millbrae milk. Mills did not sell the good-will of the business of selling any other milk, as no other milk was sold, and his vendees could not divert the place where that business was conducted to the sale of a competing article, and shield themselves from his competition by claiming that the good-will continued, not only as to the place, but as to the place used for selling a different and competing article. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider the cases cited by appellant in support of the proposition that the vendor of the good-will of a business "must do nothing to impair or injure it" (a proposition which certainly requires material qualifications), or those other cases which undertake to specify with more or less particularity what the vendor who again enters upon a similar business may or may not do in furtherance of it.

I think the evidence justifies the findings, and that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: Temple, O.; Searls, O.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Simon PALTROVITCH, Resp't.,

v.

PHENIX INSURANCE CO. of Hartford, Conn., App't.

1. The stipulations of a policy which relate to the procedure merely, after the occurrence of a loss, are to be reasonably and not rigidly construed.
2. By rejecting a certificate of a notary respecting a loss on the ground that there is a nearer notary whose certificate should be given, but without giving his name or address, an insurance company may be regarded as not desiring a further certificate and as waiving a condition requiring the certificate of the nearest notary,—especially where the certificate furnished was kept twenty-three days without objection.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of a Circuit Court for Erie County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Box, Norton & Bushnell, for appellant:

The insertion in the policy of the clause providing for the certificate of the magistrate or notary was made compulsory upon the defendant by chapter 486, Laws of 1886, and, therefore, cannot be considered harsh or unconscionable.

Quinlan v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 188 N. Y. 356.

The failure of the plaintiff to procure the certificate of the magistrate or notary living nearest the place of the fire, after being duly required so to do by defendant, prevents a recovery upon the policies.

O'Neil v. Buffalo F. Ins. Co. 8 N. Y. 123; Inman v. Western F. Ins. Co. 12 Wend. 452; Gilligan v. Commercial F. Ins. Co. 20 Hun, 98, affirmed 87 N. Y. 626; McNally v. Phenix Ins. Co. 187 N. Y. 889; Daniels v. Equitable F. Ins. Co. 50 Conn. 551; Johnson v. Phenix Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 49, 17 Am. Rep. 65; Lane v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. 17 L. R. A. 197, 50 Minn. 227.

The certificate attached to the proofs of loss was not only a nullity, not having been made by the notary living nearest the place of the fire, but it was also superfluous. The policy does not call for such a certificate unless "if required," and no such requisition had been made when the statements of loss were served.

It cannot be claimed that the defendant waived its right to require the production of the certificate required by the terms of the policy, by retaining the certificate attached to the statements of loss for twenty-three days, for the reason that the certificate, which the assured is required to furnish only, "if required," and the statement of loss which he is required to render "if fire occur" are clearly separate and distinct instruments.

McNally v. Phenix Ins. Co. 187 N. Y. 899; Lane v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. and Daniels v. Equitable F. Ins. Co. supra.; Brown v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 53 Hun, 260, affirmed 182 N. Y. 589.

Neither can it be claimed that the examination of the assured under the policies constituted a waiver of defendant's right to insist upon the certificate, for the reasons:

The policies expressly and in terms, reserved to the defendant the right to examine the assured without waiving "any provision or condition" of the policy.

Hill v. London Assur. Corp. 80 N. Y. S. R. 589; Conway v. Phenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 140 N. Y. 79.

A party cannot be held to have waived a forfeiture unless he knew of the facts constituting the forfeiture.

Robertson v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 88 N. Y. 541; Weed v. London & L. F. Ins. Co. 116 N. Y. 106.

Mr. Edward L. Jellinek, with Messrs. Shire & Van Peyma, for appellee:

A liberal and reasonable construction of the stipulations of the contract which prescribe the formal acts on the part of the insured, necessary to the recovery of the loss, is sanctioned and required by the rules of the law.

McNally v. Phenix Ins. Co. 187 N. Y. 898; May, Ins. 3d ed. 217; Hinman v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 86 Wis. 159; McLaughlin v. Washington County Mut. Ins. Co. 23 Wend. 525; Griffey v. New York Cent. Ins. Co. 100 N. Y. 417, 58 Am. Rep. 202; Kratzenstein v. Western Assur. Co. 5 L. R. A. 799, 116 N. Y. 54; Hoffman v. Aetna Ins. Co. 82 N. Y. 405, 88 Am. Dec. 837.

The defendant, if in good faith, and desirous of the nearest notary's certificate, could have apprised the plaintiff of the fact by giving the name and residence of the notary. The appellant did not object to the certificate sent to it because of any defect therein, or of any delinquency of the notary. It was done simply to make a defense to the policy.

Turley v. North American F. Ins. Co. 25 Wend. 374.

The defendant's detention of the proofs of loss and certificate of notary for twenty-three days waived their right to further or more perfect proofs or certificate.

Keeny v. Home Ins. Co. of Columbus, Ohio, 71 N. Y. 896, 27 Am. Rep. 60; Jones v. Howard Ins. Co. of New York, 117 N. Y. 108.

The examination of the plaintiff after the receipt of the proofs of loss was a recognition of the validity of the policies, and the defendant thereby waived even a previous right to insist upon a forfeiture thereof.

Titus v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 81 N. Y. 418;

NOTE.—As to what will constitute a waiver by an insurer of provisions in the policy as to making proofs of loss, see note to German Ins. Co. of Freeport, Ill. v. Gray (Kan.) 8 L. R. A. 70, 25 L. R. A.

Carpenter v. German American Ins. Co. 185 N. Y. 298.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The loss by fire, which the plaintiff seeks to recover, occurred in the city of Buffalo on the 11th day of May, 1891. The insured made out and forwarded his proofs of loss, which reached the defendant company on the 15th of the following June. Accompanying such proofs of loss was a certificate in the substantial form required by the policy, which was signed by A. J. Roehner, a notary public. The policy provides that such a certificate, made by the magistrate or notary "living nearest the place of the fire," shall be furnished by the insured, if required. No such requirement had been made when the proofs of loss were sent, but the certificate was furnished voluntarily, and in advance, to meet the emergency of a possible demand for it. The proofs of loss were kept until the 8th day of July by the company, and then returned to the insured, with a notice that the company required a certificate from the notary "living nearest the place of the fire," and that the certificate furnished would not be accepted as a compliance with the policy. There was no statement that other notaries were found to be living nearer the place of the fire, and stating their names and residences, as good faith, and a moderately fair treatment of the insured, required; but he was left to carry on his own investigations about notaries in his own way, and at his own risk. It turned out that three other notaries lived nearer "the place of the fire," in one sense of the phrase. This company, in its anxiety for its precise and rigid rights, hired a city engineer to measure the distances with a tape, and both by way of the streets, and in an air line over the tops of the houses, and so was able to prove that there were three notaries who boarded and slept a few hundred feet nearer the place of the fire than the one whom the insured supposed to be the nearest. But these later-discovered notaries had their offices and transacted their official business at much greater distances away, and there had their signs, and expected their customers. Where they boarded and slept they had no signs, and there was nothing to indicate their presence and existence; and the plaintiff, unaware of their proximity, and not suspecting the sort of investigation to which he was to be invited, took the nearest one he could find, whose office and notarial sign and residence were at the same place. It is upon this narrow and technical ground, with no pretense of substantial justice in it, that the action of the insured is now defended.

We have recently held—and, I think, very properly—that the stipulations of a policy which relate to the procedure merely, after the occurrence of a loss, are to be reasonably, and not rigidly, construed. McNally v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 187 N. Y. 898. And I think that the phrase, "living nearest the place of the fire," ought not to be confined entirely to the food and sleep of the notary, and should take account of the place where he lives officially, and to which, by some public sign, he invites those who do business with him. Turley v. North American F. Ins. Co. 25 Wend. 874. But, at all events, good faith on the part of the company requires that when they reject one certificate on the ground that there is a nearer notary, whose certificate they require, they should give the name and address of that nearer notary, to enable the insured to comply with their demand, and that if they do not do so a jury will be justified in concluding that they do not in reality require the further certificate for any practical or beneficial purpose, but have waived it as an essential condition, for they either want another notary's certificate, or they do not. If they desire it, they will name him, so that the insured may comply; otherwise, it is clear that they do not want the further certificate, and will be disappointed if they get it, and make the demand solely and only to secure a technical defense. When to that is added the fact that the company kept the certificate sent for twenty-three days, without objection, I think the jury were justified in saying that the demand of a further certificate was not made in good faith, and a different performance of the condition was waived. A suggestion was made to induce a favorable view of the technical point raised. It is said that the evidence justified a suspicion of fraud. None was alleged, except a very exaggerated estimate of the loss, and that the jury corrected by their verdict. It is always easy to say that the company suspects as a reason for a purely technical defense. All parties should have their rights in this court, fairly and fully; but a severely formal defense, resting wholly upon immaterial matters of procedure, ought not to be allowed to work injustice. While we feel bound to enforce these contracts fully and fairly, according to their terms, yet, where those terms respect the modes of proof and procedure after the loss, we shall give them always a reasonable and liberal construction, and not a severe and technical one. In this case we approve of the conclusions reached by the court below.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

William H. ANDERSON, Appt.,

N. Rufus GILL, Exr., etc., of Mary A. Dodge, Deceased.

(.....Md.....)

1. To hold the drawer of a check liable after a collecting bank has surrendered it to the drawee bank and taken for it the latter's check on a third bank, the utmost diligence to present the substituted check for payment must be exercised by the collecting bank.
2. The fact that the loss would have fallen on the depositor if a check held for collection had not been presented

NOTE.—Accepting something besides money from the bank as a discharge of drawer of check.

ANDERSON v. GILL presents a question of much interest and importance. There is little doubt that the practice of taking drafts in payment of checks is quite common and the fact that there are so few cases in which the question of the effect of such action upon the liability of the drawer has been considered speaks well for the stability of the banks or for the conservatism of the legal profession.

There is a case decided in 85 Car. II., which is very much in point. Plaintiff by his agent sold goods to defendant. The agent called on defendant for payment and received a note on the latter's banker giving a receipt in return. Upon presenting the note the banker asked the agent if he would have money or notes and was informed that notes would be taken payable to the person to whom the money was to be transmitted. Before the notes could be collected the banker failed and the court held that the plaintiff had accepted the banker for his debtor by taking the notes and said "there was a negotiation of the matter which discharged the defendant." Vernon v. Boverly, 2 Show. 296.

The cases in which the question has been discussed are quite fully in accord with that decision.

In People v. Cromwell, 102 N. Y. 477, the county treasurer had left money with bankers to pay interest coupons. Plaintiff holding certain coupons presented them for payment and asked for a draft which was given him and which was afterward returned for nonpayment. The court held that the authority of the bank extended only to payment in money and when plaintiff accepted a draft in lieu of money he had acted on his own responsibility and that the county was thereby discharged from liability. In that case the court says that if upon presentation of a check the creditor accepts anything other than legal currency in payment, the debt is discharged. The authority of the depository is simple and limited to the act of making payment and if the creditor goes further and deals with it for any other transaction than that of receiving payment, he does so upon his own responsibility, and must bear the consequence if any of such transaction.

Acceptance by the payee of a certificate of deposit from the bank and permitting the amount to be placed to his credit on the books of the bank, will amount to payment as between former parties to the paper. Hughes v. Kellogg, 8 Neb. 114.

So taking a certification of the check will release the debtor. Minot v. Russ, 16 L. R. A. 510, note. 156 Mass. 458.

If a check is presented for payment and when 35 L. R. A.

sooner than it was necessary where the bank failed before the time for collecting it expired, does not relieve the collecting bank of liability for the loss, if, having presented the check before such failure and accepted the drawee's check on another bank in payment, it delays presenting the latter until it is worthless because of the failure of its drawer.

(June 20, 1894.)

APP<sup>E</sup>AL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount of a check which defendant had drawn in favor of plaintiff's intestate, but which failed of collection because of the fail-the money is tendered the holder for his own convenience declines to receive payment at that time, he takes the risk of the continued solvency of the bank. Simpson v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 44 Cal. 143.

Accepting the credit of a check on a debt due the drawee will amount to a payment of the check. Pratt v. Foote, 9 N. Y. 463.

In Bolton v. Richard, 6 T. R. 129, 1 Esp. 106, the payee of the check did not require the banker to comply with the requirement of the checks but deposited the check with the banker and on future settlements between them treated the banker as his debtor for the amount, and it was held that this released the maker.

But when the check was entered short in the plaintiff's account, the mere fact that on the faith of it the plaintiff was permitted to overdraw his account is not sufficient to discharge the maker. Brown v. Kewley, 2 Bos. & P. 513.

In Fernald v. Bush, 131 Mass. 591, the creditor received a draft or check from the debtor after business hours on December 13. This was seasonably presented to the drawee on the 14th, and the drawee's check on a third bank taken in exchange for it, which was presented on the 15th, and dishonored because of the failure of the intermediate bank. In deciding the case the court said neither the (creditor) nor their agent (the collecting bank) by accepting from the drawee their check in lieu of money, could prolong the liability of the drawer; and by holding that check without presenting it for payment until December 15th, they discharged him from such liability.

In Nebraska Nat. Bank v. Logan, 29 Neb. 273, a check was sent by the drawee in payment of the drawer's check but it was refused and returned and the question did not turn so much on the effect which this check had on the liability of the respective parties as on the question of diligence in the collection of the first check.

And when the case came a second time before the court, it was decided against the drawers because it appeared that they knew of the insolvency of the drawee and instead of presenting the check and collecting the money themselves, they took the risk of its going to a distant point and being returned and collected before the drawee actually stopped payment. 35 Neb. 182.

There is a somewhat analogous class of cases in which the question has arisen between the parties to a bill of exchange as to the effect of taking the check of the drawee upon the liability of the drawer. One of this class is Whitney v. Eason, 99 Mass. 308, 96 Am. Dec. 762, in which the drawer of a draft was held discharged by the taking of the drawee's check on a local bank in exchange which ure of the bank on which it was drawn. Reversed

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edward C. Eichelberger, for appellant:

Instead of demanding the money, which was on deposit to pay said check, as called for by said check—without the consent, knowledge, or agreement of the defendant, and without the authority of any custom authorizing him so to do, the runner took the check of J. J. Nicholson & Sons on the Western National Bank in payment of said check, and surrendered said check of the defendant to said Nicholson & Sons. This was done by the runner, the agent of the plaintiff's testatrix, in direct violation of the duty of the payee of said check, and of the duty of the Old Town Bank, the agent of Mrs. Dodge, in collecting said check.

He (and of course his principal, acting through her agent) ceased to be the agent of Mary A. Dodge and became the agent of J. J. Nicholson & Sons, to collect the check on the Western National Bank.

1 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 247, p. 247; 3 Morse, Banks & Banking, §§ 431, 436.

Except by agreement or usage, a bank has no right to take anything but money in payment of paper it holds for collection. If it takes a check it is agent of the drawer in collecting the check, and not until the money is obtained has it fulfilled its duty as agent of the holder of the paper.

was dishonored for want of funds and no notice of protest or dishonor of the draft was ever given to the drawer of the check.

But in Burkhalter v. Second Nat Bank of Erie, 48 N. Y. 583, it was held that if the check was returned, the draft reclaimed, and protest made and notice given in due time, the drawer would not be discharged.

In Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y. 174, 3 Am. Rep. 690, the payee of a draft received a check from the drawee and neglected to present it for payment until the next day, when it was dishonored, whereas, if it had been presented on the same day upon which it was received it would have been paid. The court said the plaintiffs instead of insisting upon the money received the check of the drawee upon one of the banks in the same city. There was no impropriety in the receipt of the check and as the drawee was entitled to the draft upon payment of it, there is nothing in the case upon which fault could be imputed to the plaintiff in surrender of the draft on receipt of the check. If the check was worthless when given, or became worthless before it could have been with reasonable diligence presented for payment, the loss would have fallen upon the defendants, and they would not have been discharged from their liability, unless the plaintiffs had omitted to notify them in due time of the nonpayment of the bill.

When a check is taken instead of money, by one acting for others, as was done by the plaintiffs, a delay of presentment for a day, or for any time beyond that within which with proper and reasonable diligence it can be presented, is at the peril of the party thus retaining the check and postponing presentment, as between him and the persons in interest, whom he represents.

It was the duty of the plaintiffs to present the check at the bank, at least during the day on which they received it, and obtain either the money or a certificate or cause the same to be protested for nonpayment; and not having done so, they were chargeable with negligence and the consequent loss. By their delay and neglect, unless some evidence in explanation or excuse can be given, they made the check their own and the defendants were discharged.

First Nat. Bank of Meadville v. Fourth Nat Bank of New York, 77 N. Y. 823, 33 Am. Rep. 618, was an action against the collecting agent for negligence and although the court says that the taking of a check or note discharged the drawer in that case, no such question was before the court. And its attempt to reconcile the cases of Turner v. Bank of Fox Lake, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 434, 3 K. yes. 423, and Burkhalter v. Second Nat. Bank of Erie, 48 N. Y. 583, with Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y. 174, 3 Am. Rep. 25 L. R. A.

690, upon the question of what is necessary to hold the drawer, and mistaking the latter case for that purpose, will not be likely to have much effect upon the question.

It will be noticed that instead of taking the broad ground that accepting from the bank something besides money will release the drawer of a check, the court in ANDERSON V. GILL has placed its decision more on the grounds which rule the other class of cases, but it would seem that there is a broad distinction between the two classes and that the reasons, which apply in one case will not necessarily do so in the other. A check on a banker calls for money and if money is not taken when it is presented to the drawee it must be either because some other mode of payment or course of dealing is more convenient to the payee or because it is more advantageous to the bank that money should not be paid. In the former case, i. e., where the payee for his own convenience accepts something besides money for the check, he surely should not be allowed to charge the drawer with loss resulting from such election, and if it is for the convenience of the bank, the very fact that the bank makes the request is so suspicious that it ought to put the payee upon inquiry and incite him to diligence to secure the money, which unless satisfied of the safety of some other means of payment would require him to demand the money at once. On the other hand it would not be a matter of surprise if the drawee of a bill of exchange had not the money in his possession with which to pay it and the giving of a check on his banker is a natural and ordinary means of converting the bill into cash the effectiveness of which can generally be tested in a few hours at most. So that if there is nothing suspicious in the transaction and due diligence is exercised to convert the check into money or notify the drawer of the bill of failure of payment, there can ordinarily be no harm to the drawer in taking the check. The distinction is just here, in case of a draft on a private individual, the presumption is from the ordinary course of business that the assistance of a bank will be required to furnish the money and a check is a proper means of obtaining it, where as a check on a bank means money on presentment and if the bank is open and the money is not realized, it must be because of some new transaction between the payee and the bank which cannot be regarded as part of the drawer's business, so as to make him responsible for its success or failure.

As against the collecting agent, the payee may make the receipt of a check in payment of a draft his own risk. Hazlett v. Commercial Nat. Bank of Philadelphia, 182 Pa. 118.

Smith v. Miller, 48 N. Y. 171, 8 Am. Rep. 690, 52 N. Y. 545; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1601.

What was the duty incumbent upon the plaintiff's testatrix, the payee of said check (acting through her agent), to preserve any rights of the plaintiff's testatrix against the defendant—the maker of the check in this case—after having voluntarily surrendered said check and received the check of Nicholson & Sons instead of taking the money called for by the check, and which money it is conceded in the case was there to pay said check when presented? Clearly the utmost diligence in collecting said check thus wrongfully taken, immediate presentment, presentment as soon as possible by the use of the utmost diligence.

Sutton Bank* (Md.) 23 L. R. A. 178.

While it is true by the lawmerchant, the plaintiff's testatrix would have had the whole of the day after the reception of the check, up to 8 P. M., to present said check, yet the first presentment of the check fixes the rights of the parties.

A second presentment is sometimes attempted to be made in the effort to preserve the rights against the drawer of a check or bill, but is subject to whatever loss has fallen upon the drawer through the action of the holder or payee in consequence of his action at the first presentment.

1 Morse, Banks & Banking, 247.

The contract of the maker of a check with the payee is that the money shall be at the banker's to pay said check when first presented at any time between banking hours to 8 P. M. of the day succeeding its reception, but not that it may be presented once on that day, a check taken in place of the money called for by the check, and then that action ignored, and a second presentment be allowed, irrespective of what loss has been occasioned to the maker by the action of the payee.

Messrs. N. R. Gill & Sons, Rich & Bryan, and William Knower, for appellees:

It is difficult to understand how, upon principle, Mr. Anderson can found any defense on the fact that a conditional or tentative payment was attempted to be made in the first instance by the Nicholson, through their check on the Western Bank.

As that abortive payment was rescinded and the proper unqualified demand made for cash payment within the time during which Anderson had agreed the check would be honored, it is not perceived that he has any legal ground of complaint.

Under such circumstances he is still liable. Turner v. Bank of Fox Lake, 8 Keyes, 426; Fernald v. Bush, 181 Mass. 590; Burkhalter v. Second Nat. Bank of Erie, 43 N. Y. 538; First Nat. Bank of Meadville v. Fourth Nat. Bank of New York, 77 N. Y. 823, 83 Am. Rep. 618; Smith v. Miller, 48 N. Y. 174, 8 Am. Rep. 690.

If the taking of Nicholson's check on the Western Bank had in any way enlarged or extended Anderson's liability, or had caused any of the things necessary to hold him on, the check not to be done, or not to be done in due time, he could have relied upon it as a defense.

2 Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. § 1625; 1 Morse, Banks & Banking, 3d ed. § 247.

Anderson has no right to complain, provided the absolute demand was made for the payment of his check during the time he had agreed it should be good. His liability is fixed by his contract and not by what might have been done by any unusual activity, the necessity for which no one could foresee.

O'Brien v. Smith, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 99, 17 L. ed. 64.

If, instead of suing Anderson on the contract he made when he gave the check, the plaintiff had sued the Old Town Bank in an action on the case for negligence in receiving anything but money before surrendering the check to the Nicholson, or for not having presented the Nicholson check at once, it is probable that we could have recovered.

Although there is authority to the contrary. Russell v. Hankey, 6 T. R. 12.

McSherry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 13th of January, 1892, Anderson, the appellant, drew his check in favor of Mary A. Dodge on J. J. Nicholson & Sons, bankers in the City of Baltimore, for $692.08, and delivered it to the payee the same day. She forthwith deposited it to her credit in her account with the Old Town Bank of the same city, duly indorsed for collection. On the following day the 14th, the Old Town Bank sent the check by its runner to the banking house of Nicholson & Sons, where it was presented for payment shortly before eleven o'clock, A. M., during the usual hours of business. Anderson had to his credit on deposit with Nicholson & Sons at that time $5,000 available for the payment of the check. Instead of getting cash for the check the runner accepted in lieu thereof a check drawn by Nicholson & Sons on the Western National Bank for the precise amount of Anderson's check, and delivered up the latter to Nicholson & Sons.

The banking house of Nicholson & Sons was situated about three blocks distant from the Western National Bank and it would not have required more than from five to ten minutes for the runner to have gone from the one to the other. But in place of doing this and presenting Nicholson & Sons' check to the Western National Bank and getting it cashed or certified, he took it to the Old Town Bank where it remained in the possession of the latter until after Nicholson & Sons failed and closed their doors at 1.30 P. M. the same day. By his failure Anderson lost the $5,000 on deposit to his credit with them. Up to that hour the Western National Bank had ample funds belonging to Nicholson & Sons with which to cash the check given to the Old Town Bank. Shortly before three o'clock, and after the failure of Nicholson & Sons, the Old Town Bank sent the check it had received from Nicholson & Sons in lieu of Anderson's check, to the Western National Bank, and presented it for payment, but it was dishonored; whereupon the runner went with it to the banking house of Nicholson & Sons to surrender it and to demand a return of Anderson's check, but he was unable to gain admittance.

About 5 P. M. of the same day the cashier of the Old Town Bank was allowed to enter, and at his instance a notary took a copy of Anderson's check, and protested the check, of which notice was mailed the same evening to Anderson, and received by him the next day. Subsequently the Old Town Bank replevined the check from the trustees of Nicholson & Sons, and still has it—that case not having been disposed of yet. After the Anderson check had been presented to Nicholson & Sons on the morning of January the 14th, and after the runner of the Old Town Bank had surrendered it and accepted in lieu of it the check on the Western National Bank, two other checks were given by Nicholson & Sons upon the Western National Bank, one for $1,900 to the runner of the Merchants National Bank, and one for $1,800 to the runner of the National Bank of Baltimore, and each of these was presented to the Western National Bank before 1.30 P. M. of the same day, and paid or certified by it.

With this state of facts existing, the executor of Mary A. Dodge, sued Anderson to recover the $692.03 due by him to her when the check was given of January the 18th, 1892; and the inquiry presented by the record is, whether, under the circumstances, Anderson is still liable for that debt. It was held by the court below that he was, and from the judgment against him he has appealed.

As between the parties to a check the drawer remains liable upon it to the holder until the bar of the statute of limitations supervenes and releases him, if availed of, unless the omission or neglect of the holder to present it within a reasonable time after its receipt has resulted in injury or loss to the drawer.

A failure of the bank which is the drawer of the check and which held on deposit a fund to meet it, by which failure that fund is lost, presents the usual, if not the only, case in which delay of the holder in making presentment, or giving notice of dishonor, devolves loss upon him. Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1590.

Speaking generally, what is a reasonable time depends on the facts of each particular case; but it is thoroughly settled that the reasonable time allowed the holder for presenting a check when he receives it in the same place where the bank on which it is drawn is located, is, till the close of banking hours on the next secular day; and if in the meantime the bank fails the loss will fall on the drawer. Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1591; Byles, Bills, *14; Moule v. Brown, 4 Bing. N. C. 266; Boddington v. Schlenker, 4 Barn. & Ad. 752.

Every drawer of a check assumes the risk of the drawee's solvency during that period of time. It is consequently obvious that Anderson would have continued liable had the check been presented on the fourteenth during business hours though after the failure of Nicholson & Son. But it was presented to the drawees before the failure, and would have been paid when presented, had the cash been then demanded; or had the check on the Western National Bank been presented for payment or certification at any time that day before Nicholson & Sons actually suspended and closed their doors, the money would have been obtained. Whilst, therefore, it is apparent that the mere passivity of the holder—her mere failure to present the check on the fourteenth, prior to the suspension of the drawees—would not of itself have discharged the drawer; yet, another element has entered into the case, and the holder having chosen to present the check before there was any obligation on her part to do so, and having, furthermore, chosen, through her agent, to surrender it and to accept the drawee's check instead of money, what then became the degree of diligence which she owed to Anderson in order to still hold him liable? This is the crucial question in the case.

Now, a check on a bank or banker is payable in money, and in nothing else. Morse, Banks & Banking, 2d ed. p. 268.

The drawer having funds to his credit the drawee has a right to assume that the payee will, upon presentation, exact in payment precisely what the check was given for, and that he will not accept, in lieu thereof, something for which it had not been drawn. It is certainly not within his contemplation that the payee should, upon presentation, instead of requiring the cash to be paid, accept at the drawer's risk a check of the drawee upon some other bank or banker. The holder had a right to make immediate demand for payment upon receipt of Anderson's check, though she was not bound to do so. When her agent, the Old Town Bank—the collecting bank being the agent of the holder—Dodge v. Freedman's Sav. & T. Co., 98 U. S. 879, 28 L. ed. 920, did make demand it was only authorized to receive money, Ward v. Smith, 74 U. S. 451, 19 L. ed. 209, and the acceptance by the collecting agent of anything else rendered it as liable to the holder as though it had collected the cash. Fifth Nat. Bank of Pittsburgh v. Ashworth, 128 Pa. 212, 2 L. R. A. 491. The acceptance of Nicholson & Sons' check on the Western National Bank was either payment of Anderson's check or it was not. If it was, as it would be according to the Massachusetts doctrine Duncan v. Kimball, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 87, 18 L. ed. 50, then his liability was extinguished. If it was not a payment, then the holder's collecting agent is responsible to her for having given up the check without payment; and if injury resulted to Anderson by reason of that agent's failure to use due diligence in converting Nicholson & Sons' check into money, then also is Anderson discharged, because the agent's failure to use due diligence is the failure of that agent's principal. But whilst a check drawn bona fide on a banker having funds of the drawer is prima facie payment, if accepted as cash, Woodville v. Reed, 26 Md. 190, still, in the absence of an express agreement, the acceptance of a check of either the debtor or a third party is, in fact, merely conditional payment, that is, satisfaction of the debt, if and when paid, Haines v. Pearce, 41 Md. 221; but the acceptance of such check implies an undertaking of due diligence in presenting it for payment, and if the party from whom it is received sustains loss by want of such diligence, it will be held to operate as actual payment, Kilpatrick v. Home Bldg. & L. Assn., 119 Pa. 80; Middlesex Freeholders v. Thomas, 20 N. J. Eq. 89. What, then, is the degree of diligence required under such conditions?

The rule fixing the close of business hours of the next secular day as a reasonable time within which a check may be presented so as to hold the drawer when drawn on a bank in the same place where it is delivered, has relation only to the contract and liability of the parties to the instrument, and does not apply to a check given by the drawee to the payee, or to the agent of the payee, of the original check, upon its surrender. There is no unbending or inflexible rule governing this latter condition of facts, and in the nature of things there could not well be. What would be due diligence under one condition of facts might be negligence under different circumstances; and all that can be definitely laid down is that each case must in this particular be decided upon its own peculiar facts, though in no instance can the liability of the drawer be extended beyond the period which would ordinarily limit it. The holder of a substituted check taken upon the surrender of the original check to the drawee thereof must use such diligence in presenting it for payment as a prudent man would under like conditions use. This imposes no hardship upon the person who voluntarily accepts the drawee's check instead of cash. If he had ample and abundant time to convert the drawee's check into money and still omits to do so he obviously has not used due diligence, and the results of such negligence should not be visited upon the original drawer who was in no way responsible therefor.

Whether a delay to present a drawee's check till the close of business hours is due diligence cannot be asserted as an invariable rule. In some instances it might be, whilst in others it would manifestly not be. We have said that what is due diligence or a reasonable time within which to make presentment, depends upon the circumstances of each case; and so the authorities hold. This too is by 45 and 46 Vict., chap. 61, § 45—Bills of Exchange Act—the statutory law of England.

Where the facts are undisputed it is a question of law for the court. Bell v. Hagerstown Bank, 7 Gill, 228; Sasser v. Farmers Bank of Maryland, 4 Md. 409; Staylor v. Ball, 24 Md. 184; Woodruff v. Plant, 41 Conn. 844. That a higher degree of diligence is demanded under facts like those before us than that which obtains between the parties to the instrument is obvious, because, as we have said, the drawer of the original check must be held to have contemplated that when presented it would be paid in money only, and the payee and drawee have no right, except at their own peril, to substitute some other mode of settlement which results in injury to the drawer. People v. Cromwell, 102 N. Y. 477.

Had the holder through her agent caused Anderson's check to be certified by Nicholson & Sons the drawer would have been discharged at once. First Nat. Bank of Jersey City v. Leach, 52 N. Y. 350, 11 Am. Rep. 708; Girard Bank v. Bank of Pennsylvania Twp., 89 Pa. 92, 80 Am. Dec. 507; First Nat. Bank of Washington v. Whitman, 94 U. S. 343, 24 L. ed. 329.

The reason for this is, that as soon as the check is certified the funds cease to be under the control of the depositor and pass under the control of the person who procures the certification of the check drawn in his favor. But whilst the transaction before us was different, the drawer was undoubtedly placed in a position of peril by the act of the collecting agent. When Nicholson & Sons gave to the Old Town Bank their check in exchange for Anderson's it is a legitimate inference, founded on the well known and universal custom and course of dealing on the part of banks and bankers, that they charged Anderson's account with the amount of that check and thus reduced the sum to his credit $692.03 below the $5,000 which stood there before his check to Mrs. Dodge had been presented and taken up. He could not probably have checked out at noon on January the 14th the whole $5,000 because his account had, as the necessary result of the act of the Old Town Bank, been reduced the exact amount of his check to Mrs. Dodge, in lieu of which the Old Town Bank had accepted Nicholson & Sons' check on the Western National Bank. His control, therefore, over that much of his deposit might have been as effectually gone as if his check had been certified by Nicholson & Sons. This circumstance, whilst not making Nicholson & Sons' check to the Old Town Bank a payment, unless specially agreed to be taken as such, serves, though adverted to only by way of illustration, to emphasize the necessity the Old Town Bank was under of promptness and diligence in collecting the check on the Western National Bank, or of having it duly certified with a view of both relieving itself from liability to Mrs. Dodge and also of holding Anderson liable as drawer, in the event of a refusal by the Western National Bank to honor Nicholson & Sons' check on it.

We hold, then, that when the payee of a check, or his agent, takes from the drawee, who has ample funds of the drawer, a check of the drawee on some other bank or banker instead of money, he, the payee, or his agent, must use the utmost diligence to present the substituted check for payment; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 605; 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1105; Smith v. Miller, 48 N. Y. 171, 8 Am. Rep. 490, 52 N. Y. 545; East River Bank v. Gedney, 4 E. D. Smith, 552; Merchants Nat. Bank of New York v. Samuel, 20 Fed. Rep. 664; People v. Cromwell supra; Merchants Nat. Bank of Baltimore v. Bank of Commerce of New York, 24 Md. 12; Chitty, Bills, 18th Am. ed. *400.

While the Old Town Bank was not bound to have made demand upon Nicholson & Sons when it was made, still having made it, and, by its own choice, not having received the cash, it cannot, if it has not used due diligence, claim the right to undo what it had done, and by a subsequent demand put itself in the position it would have occupied had it not made the first demand at the time it did make it, or done the act it then did. "If presentment for payment be actually made on the very day the check is drawn and payment tendered, the holder cannot then change his mind and leave the funds at the drawer's risk until the next day. He is allowed until the next day as matter of convenience and accommodation to him, and whilst he need not hurry to make presentment the same day, having once done so, he has fixed the money at his own risk." 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1598, citing Simpson v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 44 Cal. 141.

That Anderson was in fact injured by what was done is manifest, and it is no answer to say he might or would have been equally injured had the holder of the check remained passive until after the failure of Nicholson & Sons. In the one case the injury was the direct result of the payee's negligence after the presentation of Anderson's check to the drawee; in the other, had it occurred, it would have been only incident to a mere permission or lawful inaction or passivity.

The record shows that the runner of the Old Town Bank presented Anderson's check at the counter of Nicholson & Sons about ten forty-five A. M. That Anderson had at that time ample funds to his credit with the drawee for its payment in cash, but that the runner surrendered the check and accepted Nicholson & Sons' check on the Western National Bank in lieu of the cash. This check was not presented to the Western National Bank for nearly four hours after its receipt, though with due diligence it might have been presented either five or ten minutes after it went into the possession of the agent of the Old Town Bank; and if it had been then presented, or even had been presented within two and a half hours after its receipt, it would have been paid.

The record further shows that two other checks for considerable amounts were drawn by Nicholson & Sons on the Western National Bank after the delivery of the one to the runner of the Old Town Bank, and both of these were presented and paid or certified before Nicholson & Sons closed their doors. Had the same diligence been used by the Old Town Bank the check delivered to it would have been paid also. But no such diligence was used, and because it was not the check was dishonored. Anderson was not privy to the transaction, and obviously ought not to be held responsible for the negligence of the payee's own agent. If he should be the Old Town Bank would be discharged from all responsibility, though by its acts, and not by his, the loss would fall on him. He would be held because of its failure to use due diligence, though it was the payee's and not his agent.

Smith v. Miller, supra, was an action for unpaid balance of the price of goods sold by the plaintiffs to the defendants. The defendants set up a defense of payment by a draft drawn by them on James K. Place & Co., of New York, to the order of the plaintiffs. The draft was received by the plaintiffs by mail on the morning of November 19, and was immediately indorsed by the plaintiffs, and at about 1.30 in the afternoon of the same day was presented for payment at the counting house of J. K. Place & Co., the drawee, who were merchants in New York in good standing. In payment of the draft J. K. Place & Co. gave their check on the Manufacturers' National Bank to the order of the plaintiffs for the full amount. At the time the check was received by the plaintiffs J. K. Place & Co. had funds in the bank to meet the check, which would have been paid had it been presented on that day. The check was deposited on the same afternoon in the Citizens Bank for collection and was not presented for payment at the Manufacturers' Bank till 12 M. the next day, on the morning of which day J. K. Place & Co. failed and on that account payment of this check was refused. It was held the plaintiffs could not recover on two grounds, the second of which was their negligence in not presenting the check for payment upon the day they received it, although they had but two hours on that day in which to present it. In the course of its opinion the court said: "But a check is payable instantly; and as between the drawer and payee the later has in analogy to the rules applicable to inland bills of exchange, until the day after the receipt of a check to present it for payment when drawn on a bank in the same place where given and received. But the duty of the plaintiffs to the defendants is not determined by that rule of commercial law. That rule has respect only to the contract liability of the parties to the instrument. When a check is taken instead of money, by one acting for others, as was done by the plaintiffs, a delay of presentment for a day or for any time beyond that within which with proper and reasonable diligence it can be presented, is at the peril of the party thus retaining the check and postponing presentment, as between him and the persons in interest whom he represents.

Two checks drawn later in the day, one for $11,000 and one for $9500, were presented at the bank and certified before 8 o'clock of that day and subsequently paid. The same diligence by the plaintiffs, as was exercised by the holders of these checks, would have obtained the money. . . . By their delay and neglect they . . . made the checks their own and the defendants were discharged."

Merchants' Nat. Bank of New York v. Samuel, supra, was a suit by the indorsee of a draft against the drawers. It was received by the plaintiffs on June 18, 1883, and presented for payment on the same day. Instead of paying cash the drawees gave the plaintiffs a check on their bank in New York, which was accepted and the draft was delivered up to the payee. The check was not presented until June 19, and was then dishonored. Upon refusal plaintiff went to the drawees of the draft and returned the check and received the draft back again, and upon the same day had it protested for nonpayment. Thereafter it instituted this suit. The verdict was for defendants. The court said: "The payment of the draft was to be in cash; and if anything except cash was received and in consequence thereof the drawer of the draft was damnified, then the damages sustained he has a right to be indemnified for by the negligent party. . . . The draft should have been paid in cash; and if the plaintiff chose to receive, instead of cash, the drawee's check, it did so at its own risk, and if any loss followed the plaintiff must bear the same."

Merchants' Nat. Bank of Baltimore v. Bank of Commerce of New York, supra, though not strictly in point throughout is an express decision as to what constitutes negligence on the part of a collecting agent. There the New York Bank transmitted to the Baltimore Bank for collection a draft drawn by Hoffman & Co. on Josiah Lee & Co. It was received on the morning of October 30, 1880, and presented by the runner of the Merchants' Bank to the drawees at 1 P. M. of the same day. Lee & Co. gave the runner a check drawn by them on the Mechanics' Bank, and the runner surrendered the draft, and though the banking house of Lee & Co. and the Mechanics' Bank were in the same block, he took the check to the Merchants' Bank without presenting it for payment. A little before 8 P. M. of the same day the check was presented to the Mechanics' Bank but dishonored and Lee & Co. suspended. The runner of the Merchants' Bank returned the check to Lee & Co. and got back the draft and had it protested. Other checks drawn by Lee & Co. after the one in question, and aggregating $13,000, were presented and paid.

There was evidence tending to show that Lee & Co. were of doubtful credit, and upon this point there was some conflicting evidence. The court instructed the jury that the Bank of Commerce was entitled to recover from the Merchants' Bank provided the jury found that the Merchants' Bank in failing to present the check of Lee & Co. for payment before 8 P. M. was guilty of a want of due care, skill, and diligence in their employment as collectors of the draft, and provided they also found that the check on the Mechanics' Bank would have been paid had it been presented for payment between the hours of 1 and 2 o'clock of that day.

The verdict was for the Bank of Commerce and the judgment entered thereon was affirmed upon appeal. The negligence which made the collecting agent liable to its principal, the Bank of Commerce, was its delay of one hour in presenting Lee & Co's check for payment.

It follows from the views we have expressed that the Old Town Bank, as the appellee's testatrix, failed to use due diligence and skill to collect the check given to it by Nicholson & Sons on the Western National Bank, whereby injury was done to Anderson, and as a consequence, that Anderson was discharged.

This being so, there was error in granting the appellee's prayer and in rejecting the appellant's first prayer. The latter should have been granted, and, as it is decisive of the case, the judgment must be reversed without awarding a new trial.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

Josephine KOFKA, by Next Friend, Appt.,John ROSICKY, Admr., etc., of John Spilinek, Deceased et al.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. Specific performance of a parol contract will be enforced by a court of equity where one party has wholly and the other partly performed it, and its nonfulfilment on the one hand would amount to a fraud on the party who has fully performed it.
- 2. Specific performance is a matter of discretion in a court, which withholds or grants relief according to the circumstances of each particular case, where the general rules and principles governing the court do not furnish any exact measure of justice between the parties.
- 3. Held, that the oral contract in this case possessed the elements of certainty, and the proof establishing it was sufficiently clear and satisfactory.
- 4. A girl about seventeen months old was given by her parents to her uncle and aunt under an agreement that they would adopt her, and rear, nurture, and educate her, and that she was to be as their own child, and at their death to receive or be left all the property which they might own. She lived with them until they died, some ten years afterwards, took their name, did not recognize or know her own father and mother in the true relation, but knew them as, and called them, uncle and aunt, and knew and recognized her uncle and aunt as father and mother. The uncle and aunt died possessed of real estate in the city of Omaha, the title to which they did not, either by deed or will, transfer to the child. Held, that there was such a part performance of the contract by the parties thereto as entitled her to a decree giving her the title to the property by way of specific performance of the contract.

APPPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the District Court for Douglas County in favor of defendants in an action brought to compel specific performance of a contract to convey real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Switzler & McIntosh for appellant.

Messrs. Mahoney, Minahan & Smyth, for appellees:

The contract must be enforced, if at all, as laid. If the court cannot decree the performance of the whole contract, it will not enforce any part of it.

The plaintiff was not adopted by the Spilineks according to statute. Neither was there any attempt to follow the provisions of our code. The law of adoption was not and is not a part of the common law. It is purely statutory.

Where the statute points out the way in which a thing shall be done, that is the way and the only way in which it may be done.

Tecumseh Town Site Case, 3 Neb. 284; Keith v. Tylford, 12 Neb. 273; Shearer v. Weaver, 58 Iowa, 578; Hous v. Bates County, 61 Mo. 391.

A court of equity cannot specifically enforce that part of the contract which imposes upon the Spilineks the duty of legally adopting the plaintiff.

To specifically enforce that part of the contract the court would have to dispense with the regulations ordained by statute touching the adoption of children. This a court of equity will not do, because it has not and never has had the power.

Shearer v. Weaver, supra; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 96, 177; Long v. Hewitt, 44 Iowa, 863; Hous v. Bates County, supra; Schouler, Dom. Rel. 232.

Does the record show anything in that transaction which proves or tends to prove an agreement to adopt? Surely not. Then there was no agreement at the time stated in the petition. If there was an agreement at any other time the contract must be amended and that the plaintiff cannot do. She must recover upon it as laid in the bill or not at all.

Oronk v. Trumble, 66 Ill. 423.

The only testimony tending, even in the remotest degree, to prove the agreement is that of the Kofkas—testimony under the circumstances, owing to their relationship to the child, most unsatisfactory.

Eyre v. Eyre, 19 N. J. Eq. 102; Cooper v. Carlisle, 17 N. J. Eq. 525; Cole v. Potts, 10 N. J. Eq. 67; Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 404.

The whole testimony shows conclusively that the child would have been adopted legally by the Spilineks, would to-day be the heir of all their property, if the Kofkas gave their consent. But they did not, and upon their heads must rest the blame. They cannot complain now and ask a court to do for them, even if it had the power, that which for ten years they persistently refused to do for themselves. They are guilty of laches against which this court will not relieve. Spilinek was, in the language of the authorities, ready, desirous, prompt, and eager at all times to carry out the alleged agreement.

The court will not specifically enforce any contract, whether it be oral or written, until the following elements appear therein, to wit: valuable consideration, certainty as to its subject-matter, its stipulations, its fairness, its parties and the circumstances under which it was made. It must be mutual; it must be perfectly fair, equal, and just in its terms and in its circumstances.

The alleged contract is not certain either in its subject-matter, its purposes, or the circumstances under which it was made.

If the court doubt it must refuse the relief.

What property was she to have? "All their property at the time of their death." What does that mean? If both died together the meaning is clear. But if they should not do so, then the expression is unintelligible. But suppose one were to die ten years after the other. The property she would take at the death of the first might be much, at the death of the last might be nothing. Does the court doubt? If so, the doubt is fatal to her case.

The contract has not been taken out of the statute by part performance. In the case of gifts, possession and valuable improvements, and, let it be remembered, those things must be done in pursuance 25 L. R. A.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

December 8, 1888, the following petition was filed in the district court of Douglas county: "The plaintiff, Josephine Kofka, appears by her next friend James Kofka, and for her cause of action alleges the fact to be that this plaintiff was born in Omaha, Nebraska, on the 16th day of March, 1877. That her father's name is James Kofka, who appears here as her next friend, and her mother's name is Mary Kofka; both of whom were then residing in Omaha, and have ever since here resided. That the parties to this suit are all of Bohemian nationality. That soon after her birth, to wit, in the month of August, 1878, there was living in Omaha, John Spilinek, deceased, and his wife, Anna Spilinek; the latter being a sister of the plaintiff's mother. During said month the said John Spilinek and Anna Spilinek, who never had any children of their own, requested of plaintiff's parents the privilege of taking this plaintiff with them to live with them as their child. The parents of plaintiff having several children, one of whom at that time was only a few weeks old, fully considered the matter, and, having full confidence that plaintiff would receive at the hands of John and Anna Spilinek the care and affection which is due from parents to child, consented to said request but only upon the expressed and well-understood conditions to be hereinafter named; that is to say, James Kofka and Mary Kofka, the parents of the plaintiff, gave up the care, custody, and control of said child, in the said month of August, 1878, on the consideration and agreement, then and there assented to by the said John and Anna Spilinek, that they would legally adopt and receive the said child as their own, would care for her, rear and educate her, and that she should have their fullest and best affection; and at their death she, the plaintiff, should inherit and be left all the property with which they died possessed. Plaintiff further says that she went to live with the said John and Anna Spilinek at the time above mentioned, on the terms aforesaid. That she continued to live uninterruptedly with them until their death, which came to John Spilinek on September 16, 1888, and to Anna Spilinek on September 19, 1888. The plaintiff says that during all of said time she conducted herself towards the said Spilineks as an affectionate and obedient child, and received at their hands all the devotion and love a child should receive from parents. That she had for several years previous to their death assisted her aunt, Anna Spilinek, in the work about the house in the way of washing, making up the beds, house cleaning, going on errands, and generally doing at their request anything within her power. That she has of late years been going to the public schools of the city of Omaha, where she was always enrolled and known as Josephine Spilinek; and in fact she has always gone by that name, and never knew any other until the death of the said John and Anna Spilinek. Plaintiff says the said John and Anna Spilinek always called her their own child, and so treated her, and she was told and given to understand by them that her own father was her uncle and her own mother her aunt, and she knew not the contrary until after September 19, 1888; and she always believed, and in her own mind cannot but believe yet, that the said John and Anna Spilinek were her real father and mother. The plaintiff further says that the said deceased, John Spilinek and Anna Spilinek, often during the last ten years expressed and made known to friends and acquaintances and to the plaintiff's parents their intention to leave this plaintiff all their property at their death, and these promises and declarations on the part of both were made up to and within a few days of and on the very day of their death, and plaintiff says that up to the very time of their death they intended to leave their property to this plaintiff. That the said deceased always intended to fulfill their agreement of adoption by legal proceedings according to the statutes, but all parties concerned were on intimate and friendly terms, and the matter was allowed to go by, all feeling secure; and that, for all intents and purposes, plaintiff was as fully their child as if the formalities had been gone through with, until it was finally prevented by their sudden death as hereinafter mentioned. Plaintiff further says that on the 16th day of September, 1888, the deceased John Spilinek was suddenly overtaken by a loss of control of his mental faculties, and while thus afflicted shot himself dead, and inflicted mortal wounds at the same time upon his said wife. That John Spilinek died within a short time on the same day, but his said wife, Anna, lingered until September 19, 1888, when she died from the effects of said wounds. Plaintiff says there was no marital or family difficulty whatever to induce this conduct on the part of said John Spilinek, but it was wholly caused by despondency, brought on by fancied business embarrassments. Plaintiff says that the deceased John Spilinek died intestate, but, had it not been for his sudden act of suicide, he would have made provision by will for his property to go to his wife during her life, and at her death to this plaintiff, as was his oft-expressed desire and intention up to the very time of his death. Plaintiff alleges that Anna Spilinek, deceased, while in the full and complete control of her mental faculties, and recalling her deceased husband's desire in the premises, as well as their agreement, did on September 17, 1888, make and execute a will in writing, which said will was duly probated and allowed on the 20th day of November, A. D. 1888, by the terms of which all the real and other property she died possessed, subject to two or three small debts, was left to this plaintiff, whom she calls therein 'our adopted child, Josepha Kofka.' The following is a copy of said will: 'Last will of I, Anna Spilinek, of Douglas county and state of Nebraska. Being aware of the uncertainty of life, but of sound mind and memory, do make and declare this to be my last will and testament, in manner following, to wit: I give, devise, and bequeath unto our adopted child, Josepha Kofka, all of mine real estate, money, personal property, and other effects that I may be possessed of or entitled to after my decease, subject, however, to all my legal debts; that is to say, I and my husband owe to Karel Spilinek $150, and to John Barta $50, and to Barbara Spilinek $9.00. I also further declare that out of the above real estate and money $100 be set and given to my father, Frank Radil. Signed this 17th day of September, 1888, at Omaha, Nebraska. Anna Spilinek. Signed in the presence of James Engelthale, Frank Mrwick, Vaclav Benak.' The plaintiff says that the defendant John Rosicky is the duly appointed, qualified, and acting administrator of the estate of the said John Spilinek. That the other defendants named, to wit, Anton Spilinek, Frank Spilinek, Vincent Spilinek, and Albert Spilinek, being of ages, respectively, 53, 51, 49, and 42 years, are brothers of said John Spilinek, deceased. That they are all nonresident aliens, living at Skuhrov, Bohemia, except Anton, and he is a resident and citizen of Nebraska. Plaintiff alleges that the defendant Anton Spilinek claims to be the sole heir at law of the estate of John Spilinek, his brothers being nonresident aliens, and disputed the right of this plaintiff to inherit any property whatever from the estate of the said John Spilinek, and he claims to be the sole heir to the real estate mentioned herein, and maintains that this plaintiff has no rights in the premises. The other brothers are made defendants in this case, and brought into court out of caution, in view of our present law with respect to nonresident aliens. The plaintiff says that at the time of his death the deceased John Spilinek was possessed of the following real estate, situated in the city of Omaha, of the value of about $6,500; that is to say: The east half of lot 4 in block 11, and the east half of the west half of lot 4, in said block 11, S. E. Rogers' addition to Omaha, Nebraska. The defendant Herman Tombrinck claims a mortgage on the property described herein for $600, bearing date May 4, 1887, which appears of record in Douglas county as a lien on said property; but whether the same is genuine or unpaid this plaintiff has no information, and, in order to put said Herman Tombrinck to his proof in the premises, she denies said mortgage is bona fide and valid lien on said property. The plaintiff says that since she and her parents have fully performed the agreement herein mentioned on their part, whereby they yielded the possession of and control over this plaintiff to said deceased parties, and she yielded to them the obedience, services, and devotion of a child for over ten years, and would have continued so to do but for their death, and that by their own acts during their lives she knew no other mother or father save them, and that whereas these decedents fully expected and intended she should inherit their property at their death, plaintiff says it would be a fraud on her and on them to have their agreements in that particular violated. The plaintiff therefore brings her cause before this honorable court, on its equity side, and prays that she may be decreed a specific performance of the contract mentioned herein, and that she be declared to be the lawfully adopted child of the deceased, John and Anna Spilinek, that she may be declared the legal heir to the property described herein, and all other property of said deceased, and to hold the same free from any claim or right the other defendants may have or claim in or to the same, and for such further relief in the premises as the facts in the case may entitle her to."

We copy the allegations of the petition entire, for the reason that it is probably as short and complete a statement of the plaintiff's cause of action as can be made, and fully set forth the same. A demurrer to the petition was filed, argued, and overruled, and the answer, filed by defendants, March 7, 1890, which joined the issues upon which the case was tried and determined, contained two counts, the first of which was as follows: "Now come the said defendants, John Rosicky, Adm., Anton Spilinek, Frank Spilinek, Albert Spilinek, Vincent Spilinek, and, answering for themselves only, deny each and every allegation in the petition filed in said cause except those expressly admitted herein. Defendants admit that plaintiff was born in Omaha, Neb. That her father's name was James Kofka and her mother's name Mary Kofka, and that both of them were residing in Omaha when the said plaintiff was born. That the parties to this suit are of Bohemian nationality; that the said plaintiff lived with the said John Spilinek, deceased, for some years. That in 1878, John Spilinek and his wife, Anna Spilinek, a sister of plaintiff's mother, resided in Omaha. That said John Spilinek and Anna Spilinek never had any children of their own. That plaintiff resided with the said John Spilinek and Anna Spilinek at the time of their death, and that John Spilinek died on September 16, 1888, and Anna Spilinek on the 19th day of September, 1888. That the said plaintiff has of late years attended the public schools of the city of Omaha. That on the 16th day of September, 1888, the deceased John Spilinek was afflicted by a loss of control of his mental faculties, and, while thus afflicted, shot himself dead and inflicted a mortal wound at the same time upon his said wife. That the said Spilinek in a short time died, and his said wife lingered until September 19th, when she died from the effects of said wound. That there was no marital or domestic difficulty whatever to induce this conduct on the part of the said John Spilinek, but was wholly brought on by fancied business embarrassments. The deceased died intestate. That the will, a copy of which is set out in the petition, was signed by Anna Spilinek. That the defendant John Rosicky is the administrator of the estate of said John Spilinek, as alleged in the petition. That the other defendants, Anton Spilinek, Frank Spilinek, Albert Spilinek, and Vincent Spilinek, are brothers of the deceased, as set out in the petition. Said brothers are all nonresidents, except Anton Spilinek, and he is a resident of the state of Nebraska. That said Anton Spilinek claims to be the sole heir-at-law of the estate of John Spilinek, and denies the right of the plaintiff to inherit any property whatever from the estate of the said John Spilinek, and he claims to be the sole heir to the real estate mentioned herein, and maintains that said plaintiff has no right to the premises. That the deceased John Spilinek was possessed of the real estate described in the petition at the time of his death, and that the defendant claims a mortgage upon said premises, as alleged in said petition. Further answering, defendants say that they have no knowledge or belief concerning the date of plaintiff's birth, nor concerning the allegation that she continued to live on uninterruptedly with the said deceased until their death; nor that she conducted herself towards the said deceased as an affectionate and obedient child, and received from the hands of the deceased all the love and devotion that she should receive from her parents; nor that she had for several years previous to the death of the deceased assisted in the work about the house, as alleged in said petition; nor that she was enrolled in the public schools as Josephine Spilinek, and that she was always known by that name, and never knew any other until the death of the deceased; nor that said deceased called her their child." The second count of the answer pleads the statute of frauds. The trial of the case, as regards the rights of plaintiff, was had July 17, 1891, and the issues were determined in favor of defendants, and the action of plaintiff dismissed, and the case brought to this court on appeal by plaintiff.

The evidence in this case discloses that the mother of the plaintiff, Mary Kofka, was the sister of Mrs. Spilinek; that they were living near each other in the city of Omaha, with their husbands, John Kofka and John Spilinek; the Kofkas the happy possessors, at the time (August, 1878) when it is alleged the transaction occurred between them out of which this suit springs, or to which we may refer as its source, of four children, among them the plaintiff, then about seventeen months old. The Spilineks had no children, and it was agreed between the parties that the plaintiff should be taken by the Spilineks, to be reared, educated, and cared for as if she were their own daughter; they stating that any property they might have or own during life should be given to her, or be hers, at their death, and that they would adopt her, and make her their heir. Pursuant to this agreement, the plaintiff was taken to the house of the Spilineks, who at the time of these occurrences were poor, and, as appears from the testimony, living in a shanty in the street. The plaintiff, from this time until the death of the Spilineks,—of whom John Spilinek died September 16, 1888, having on that day shot first his wife and then himself, he dying immediately, and she two or three days later,—lived with the Spilineks, and was taught to and did call them father and mother, and treated them as such, and did not know her own father and mother, although she saw them almost and possibly every day, but accepted them as and considered and called them aunt and uncle, knowing no better; yet she went to the premises where they resided, and played with their other children, thinking they were her cousins, and treating them as such. That she did not know but what the Spilineks were her parents until after their death, when she was so informed by her mother and other parties. The plaintiff was known at school as "Josie" or "Josephine Spilinek," and so wrote her name at all times after she learned to write. In fact there seems to have been a complete loss of her identity, personality, or individuality, as a Kofka, and an assumption of the Spilinek, as much so, apparently, as if her whole being, both mental and physical, had been changed. The evidence further shows that she was a good, obedient, and dutiful child to the Spilineks, and also that they treated her well and affectionately. At all times, in all places, and under all circumstances, Spilinek and his wife treated, looked upon, claimed, and acknowledged the plaintiff as their "child" or "girl." The Kofkas, on their part, never made any claim to her or her services, or attempted to take her from the Spilineks, or by word or deed to inform her that they bore any other relation to her than that of uncle and aunt; and through all this was interwoven, as a part of the life and vitality of the agreement, the proposition that the plaintiff was to have the property. It was always spoken of when the matter was mentioned between them (which was very frequently), and the Spilineks made it a subject of conversation with a number of persons, friends and acquaintances, some of whom were called, and so testified; and in a letter, written by Spilinek, September 12, we find reference made to "my girl," which must be taken to mean the plaintiff, and in the will of Mrs. Spilinek, made just prior to her death, she fully recognized the position and rights of the plaintiff. We are satisfied, after a careful examination, comparison, and analysis of all the testimony in the record, that the contract was one clear and definite in its terms and obligations, and was both made and performed as such with reference to the property rights to accrue or inure to or in favor of plaintiff as made, or with reference to any other portion of it. The Spilineks had acquired some property, a piece of real estate, the title to which is now in controversy in this case, for which, according to the evidence, Spilinek was at one time offered $4,000. There was also an agreement to adopt the plaintiff, or at least so the parties testify; and the parents and Spilineks often conversed about "assigning" her, but it does not seem to have been considered by them as one of the essentials of the compact, and which must necessarily be accomplished, but as something more of a formal nature or character. Nor do we think it was so inseparably connected with the other part of the contract as to carry it along with it, and render it incapable of enforcement, if so capable in any event, provided the agreement to adopt cannot be decreed to be performed, which we think, unquestionably, it cannot be, as in this state the matter of adoption is statutory, and the manner of procedure and terms are all specifically prescribed, and must be followed, and involve a written consent by the parties, a relinquishment by those possessing the rights to and over the child, and an acceptance by the person or persons desiring to acquire such rights, and a decree by the judge of the county court, which introduces an element barring the jurisdiction of a court to decree specific performance in the first instance.

Having reached the conclusion that a contract was entered into, the query now arises, Was it one of which a court of equity can and will decree a specific performance? The property which the plaintiff seeks to recover is real estate, and it is contended that the contract, resting entirely in parol, is within the statute of frauds, and hence cannot be enforced. Courts in the past (whether such action was wise or unwise we will not now stop to discuss) have removed or exempted from the operation of the statute of frauds certain cases in which they have concluded that the hardship forced to be endured by the parties was greater than was warranted by the benefit to be derived from enforcing the rule, and there has gradually arisen classes of cases known as "exceptions from the rule of the statute," and one class embraces what is called "cases of specific performance of parol contracts for the transfer or conveyance of real estate." The agreement in this case did not contain anything by which it can be known whether the transfer of the property to plaintiff was to be effected by will or by deed, and our inquiry in reference to the power of the court to decree performance cannot be confined to either, but must include both. There is a line of authorities emanating from some of our able courts of last resort, most notably those of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, which denies the right to specific performance of a contract similar to the one under which the claim in this case arises, mainly upon the ground that the statute was enacted to cover just such cases, that it will work no hardship to require parties to put all such agreements in writing, and that the testimony of witnesses should not be received, probably several years after the happening of the event, to establish a contract by parol, by which the course of the descent of lands will be changed. These are strong and cogent reasons, and it is not our province to attack or attempt to refute them, as we understand it. They are the underlying principal reasons for the rule as embodied in the statute, but we do not think the rule should be so rigidly adhered to as to accomplish a fraud as against one of the persons affected by the contract to which it is to be applied. It is a matter of discretion in the court, which withholds or grants relief according to the circumstances of each particular case, when the general rules and principles which govern the court will not furnish any exact measure of justice between the parties. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 742; Clarke v. Koenig, 88 Neb. 572.

Van Dyne v. Vreeland, first reported in 11 N. J. Eq. 370, and on a second hearing in 12 N. J. Eq. 142 [Vanduyne v. Vreeland], was a case in which "the father of an infant child made an agreement with an uncle of the infant, at the uncle's request, to this effect: that the uncle should take the infant, and adopt him as his own child, and that he would treat him as his own son, and that the property he should have should be given to the child, so that it should belong to him at the death of the uncle and his wife. The uncle took the child, and had him baptized, and the child assumed his surname, and lived with him twenty-five years. Held, that the child might maintain his bill upon the agreement after such performance." Also: "Where a father makes an agreement in reference to his infant child, from which benefits are to accrue to the child upon his performance of the agreement, after performance the child in his own name may file his bill to enforce the agreement. The party for whose benefit the agreement is to be performed, and especially if any valuable portion of the consideration has been rendered by him, has a legal right to enforce it. It is of no consequence that the promise to fulfill it was not made directly to the person who is entitled to remuneration. It is enough if it was made by some one who had authority to make it on his behalf." And in the text of the opinion it was stated: "In this case, if the agreement which is the ground of the bill is of such a character that it could be enforced by either party if it were in writing, then I think there can be no doubt but that there has been such a part performance in this case by the complainant as will take the agreement out of the operation of the statute. The bill alleges that the agreement had been fully performed by the father of the complainant,—one of the parties by whom it was made,—and by the complainant, upon whom it imposed certain duties and obligations. The facts stated show that the complainant and his father have performed their part of the agreement as fully as such an agreement could be performed. There is nothing more for them to do. The complainant cannot be denied his redress by the mere interposition of the statute. The question is, Is it an agreement of a character which can be enforced in equity?" In the report of the case in volume 12 it was held: "The principles of equity will be applied to new cases as they are presented, and relief will not be withheld merely on the ground that no precedent can be found." And in the opinion the court says: "The agreement was this: Vreeland and his wife were to adopt the boy. He was to be given up to them, and to be under their management and control; and when they died he was to have their property. It is true the agreement does not state whether the property should be secured to the complainant by deed, so that he might enjoy it when they died, or whether it should be left him by will. . . . In this case part performance is set up in avoidance of the statute. I think the answer admits, and the evidence shows, a substantial performance of the agreement on the complainant's part, as well as such part performance on the part of the defendant himself as will take the case out of the operation of the statute. There has been such a performance on both sides as puts the complainant in a situation which is a fraud upon him unless the agreement is now fully performed." This was a case very similar in its facts and incidents to the one at bar, and directly in point.

The case of Van Tine v. Van Tine, (N. J.) 1 L. R. A. 155, is another case decided by the New Jersey court. The case is stated and the rule announced in the first section of the syllabus as follows: "A father gave his child, then only a few months old, to S., his sister, with a mutual understanding that she was to provide for the child, and bring her up as her own. She thereupon took charge of the child, refused to give her up to her father, and had her baptized in her own name, by which the child was always known. The child always lived with S., assisted her with her household duties, called her 'mother,' and was not informed of her parentage until she was eighteen years old. S. often stated that the child was to have all her property, and about fourteen years before her death made a will, bequeathing to the child all her personal property, at which time she owned none but personal estate. But a few months before her death she purchased the land in question. Her death was sudden, and there was nothing to show that she bought the land to prevent that much of the estate going to the child. Held, that the child was entitled to the land, as the agreement of S. to receive her as her own was valid and binding, though not in writing, and had been partially performed." And in the opinion the court said: "The obligations of parties to each other are ascertained as well by what they say as by what they do; admissions often giving the best and truest interpretations to contracts previously entered into, or doings showing what has previously been agreed to be or promised should be done. When Mrs. Stryker, being childless, said to her brother Peter, the father of Jessie, that she would take Jessie, and treat her as her own child, she meant just what she said, both in law and in conscience. She meant that Jessie should have all the benefit of the relation of parent and child. If individuals are ever to be taken at their word and held to it by the courts, surely they should be so taken under such circumstances as are here presented. How can the court say that Mrs. Stryker did not mean just what she said, and how can it say that she did not, by what she said, most fully and distinctly bind herself to perform all the obligations of a parent towards a child towards Jessie? And were not those obligations so made of the same force as she would have been under to a child of her own loins? I cannot see how obligations, so voluntarily assumed by a citizen, so affecting the highest welfare of an infant of the tenderest years, can be regarded as otherwise than the most sacred and binding. There was part performance of the obligation." See also Johnson v. Hubbard, 10 N. J. Eq. 392, 66 Am. Dec. 778, and authorities cited in note on page 784, under the head of "Agreements to Make Particular Disposition of Property by Will. (1) Validity of such agreements, and (2) Mode of enforcement in equity." "It seems to be settled that the payment of the consideration will not, in general, be deemed such a part performance as to relieve a parol contract from the operation of the statute. But the reason for this, viz., that in such a case the repayment of the consideration will place the parties in the same situation they were before, shows that the rule applies to a moneyed consideration. If the consideration for the contract be labor and services, those may sometimes be estimated, and their value liquidated in money, so as measurably to make the promise whole on the promisor's rescission of the contract. But in a case where the services rendered are of such a peculiar character that it is impossible to estimate their value to the promisor by any pecuniary standard, it is out of the power of any court, after the performance of the services, to restore the promise to the situation in which he was before the contract was made, or to compensate him in damages. Such a case is clearly within the rule which governs courts of equity in carrying parol agreements into effect, where possession has been taken of landed property or moneys laid out in improvements upon the land which the testator agreed to devise in consideration of care and maintenance during his life. Rhodes v. Rhodes, 8 Sandf. Ch. 279, 7 L. ed. 852.

In Wright v. Wright (Mich.) 23 L. R. A. 196, a Michigan case, the court held: "Defendant, in his second year, was indentured to deceased until his majority. When he was eight, deceased and his wife, being childless, adopted him under the law then in force, and his name was changed. He gave them his entire services, without pay, till he was over twenty-two, when deceased died. The widow testified that they intended that he should be their heir, that her husband believed that this was effected by the adoption, that defendant thought he was their child till after her husband's death, and that they never talked about paying him for his services. The adoption law was held unconstitutional. Held, that defendant's performance entitled him to the inheritance, by way of specific performance of the oral contract."—and states in the opinion: "In Shahan v. Swan, reported in 48 Ohio St. 25, the supreme court of Ohio expressly recognize the doctrine of these cases. It there said: 'Notwithstanding that it is the established rule in Ohio that the payment of the consideration, even in the personal service of the party seeking relief, does not ordinarily constitute such part performance as will take the case out of the operation of the statute, we do not wish to be understood to hold that cases may not arise where specific performance of a contract in parol may be had on the ground that the consideration had been paid in personal services, not intended to be, and not susceptible of being, measured by a pecuniary standard."

In Missouri, in the case of Sutton v. Hayden, 62 Mo. 101, a case in which one "Mrs. Green made an agreement by which she took in its infancy the child of her brother, upon the understanding that at her death all the property owned by her should go to the child, the child was to come and live with her, be as a daughter to her, and take care of her for the remainder of her life. The child entered upon the performance of her part of the agreement, and throughout the course of Mrs. Green's life rendered the services, and, so far as lay in her power, performed her part of the agreement. Mrs. Green died without having in any way secured the property to the child. . . ." Says the court: "There are things which money cannot buy, a thousand nameless and delicate services and attentions, incapable of being subject of explicit contract, which money, with all its peculiar potency, is powerless to purchase. The law furnishes no standard whereby the value of such services can be estimated, and equity can only make an approximation in that direction by decreeing the specific execution of that contract." See also, Sharkey v. McDermott, 91 Mo. 655, 60 Am. Rep. 270, where it was held: "An agreement by a man and his wife to adopt a child, provide and care well for her, and leave her their property at their death, performed on the part of the child, is enforceable as to the property on their death."

In Brinton v. Van Cott, 8 Utah, 480, it was held as follows: "A verbal contract, whereby plaintiff agrees to live with and take care of an old woman until her death, in consideration of her promise to leave all her property to plaintiff, is taken out of the statute of frauds by the rendition of the services during the lifetime of the woman; and after her death equity will specifically enforce the contract on the theory of part performance, since the services rendered are of a peculiar character, not intended by the parties to be measured by a pecuniary standard. . . . A contract by which an old woman, in apparent good health, and having the expectancy of many years of life, agrees to leave all her property, worth about $5,000, to a sixteen year old girl, in consideration of the latter's promise to live with and take care of her as long as she lived, is not void for want of mutuality and fairness; and after her death the contract will be specifically enforced in favor of the girl, who performed her part of the agreement, though the woman died within three or four months after the execution of the contract." Also: "In this territory the statute of frauds is in full force. 2 Comp. Laws, § 2881. It is therefore incumbent upon the appellant to show by her complaint that she has partly or wholly performed her contract, so as to take it out of the statute of frauds. 'When the consideration of the agreement consists of work, labor, and services personally done and rendered by the plaintiff, if the value of the same can be ascertained with reasonable accuracy in an action at law, and adequately compensated by the recovery of damages, then neither the services themselves nor the payment for them will avail as a part performance of the verbal agreement. But if the services are of such a peculiar character that it is impossible to estimate their value by any pecuniary standard, and it is evident that the parties did not intend to measure them by any such standard, then the plaintiff, after the performance of these services, could not be restored to the situation in which he was before, or be compensated by any recovery of legal damages.' Under these circumstances the rendition of the services is a part performance of a verbal agreement. The act of part performance of a verbal agreement for services must be such that it would be a fraud on the party performing for the other party to refuse to perform his part as agreed between them. Pom. Cont. 114." See also, Korminsky v. Korminsky, 2 Misc. 133; Godine v. Kidd, 64 Hun, 585; Jaffee v. Jacobson, 1 C. C. A. 24, 48 Fed. Rep. 21, 4 U. S. App. 4; McKinnon v. McKinnon, 5 C. C. A. 530, 56 Fed. Rep. 409; Haines v. Haines, 6 Md. 435.

But we will not further quote or cite authorities. We are fully convinced that the weight of authority and reason preponderates in favor of the position that the contract in the case at bar was such a one as a part performance will relieve from the operation of the statute of frauds; that there was a full performance of the contract on the part of the plaintiff, and such a part performance by the Spillineks, as did so take it out of the operation of the statute. We are further satisfied that the child had a right to bring the action to enforce the contract made for it by the parents, and that the proof of the contract was sufficiently clear, definite, satisfactory, and unequivocal to call for its enforcement by a court of equity, in the exercise of its discretion.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, so far as it affected the rights of the plaintiff herein, and decree ordered in this court in favor of appellant that the title to the property described in the petition is in appellant, and be quieted in her, except as against the mortgage liens thereupon prior to the death of the Spillineks.

Judgment accordingly.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Claus HEINBOEKEL, Appt.,

v.

NATIONAL SAVINGS LOAN &amp; BUILDING ASSOCIATION, Resp't.

28 Minn. 340

59 N.W. 1050.

*A nonborrowing member of a mutual building association, who has brought himself within the rules by notice of withdrawal, cannot bring an action and take judgment against the association when, under the statute (Gen. Laws 1891, chap. 131, § 27), as well as in the by-laws of the association, there is no money in the treasury legally applicable to the payment of his claim.

(July 23, 1894.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County denying a motion for a new trial after judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of the withdrawal value of shares which plaintiff owns in the defendant association, and of the withdrawal of which he had given notice. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Holcombe & O'Reilly, for appellant:

A member of a mutual building association who has fully performed all the conditions of the by-laws of the association, and the statute law of the state, relative to his right to withdraw the shares of stock owned by him, cannot be deprived of his right to a judgment against the association for what he may, on the trial, prove to be entitled to receive at its hands.

Mr. J. M. Hawthorne, for respondent:

United States Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Silverman, decided November 8, 1877, 85 Pa. 394, was only allowed to stand unquestioned until the year 1883, when it was criticised and distinguished in Christian's App. 102 Pa. 189.

The effect of the Silverman Case was further impaired in Pennsylvania in National Loan & Homestead Assn. v. Hubley, 34 Phila. Leg. Int. 6, where it was held that a "withdrawing member must show that there are funds on hand for that purpose before he can enforce his demand."

The right to withdraw is not a common-law right. Such right is wholly a creature of the statute and that same statute which gives the stockholders the right to withdraw restricts and limits the fund from which he can withdraw. If it had not been for the statute and the contract entered into by the association, commonly called a by-law, the right to withdraw would not exist at all.

A by-law or rule passed after the stockholder has given notice to withdraw is binding upon him because he is still a member. This is the English rule and it has never been changed in this country.

Pepe v. City & Suburban Permanent Bldg. Soc. L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 311.

By the terms of the agreement, the by-laws, the amount to be paid to a withdrawing stockholder is not due from the corporation to him until they have funds on hand legally applicable thereto. Hence the cause of action has not accrued, and under title 2, chapter 66, General Statutes 1878, the statute of limitation does not begin to run until the cause of action accrues.

Baker v. Kelley, 11 Minn. 480.

Mr. C. E. Hamilton for the Minnesota State League of Local Building Associations.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 4 of article 2 of defendant's by-laws reads as follows: "A shareholder may withdraw at any time upon giving sixty (60) days' notice in writing to the association, when he shall receive the amount of the installments actually paid in by him on such shares, together with the interest thereon, if any, at the rate fixed by the board of directors, standing to the credit of his shares at last preceding adjustment of profits, less all fines and fees, amount paid in on expense account, and a proportional part of the losses, if any, and other charges accrued subsequent to said last preceding adjustment of profits: provided, however, that at no time shall more than one half of the funds in the hands of the trustee be applicable to the demands of withdrawing stockholders without the recorded consent of the directors." Subsequent to the adoption of these by-laws, the same regulation, in substance, was incorporated into the statutes of this state (Gen. Laws 1889, chap. 286, § 27); and by an amendment thereto (Gen. Laws 1891, chap. 181, § 27) it was provided that "not more than one half of the amount received in payment on stock by" a building association "in any one month shall be used to pay withdrawals without the consent of the board of directors." The plaintiff became a member of the defendant association in July, 1889, and the question now presented for determination is plainly stated thus: Can a nonborrowing member of a mutual building association, who has brought himself within the rules by notice of withdrawal, be permitted to bring an action and take judgment against the association when, by reason of the statute and the by-law, there is no money in the treasury legally applicable to the payment of his claim? In United States Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Silverman, 85 Pa. 894, it was determined that he could, the statute under consideration being almost identical in language with section 27, supra, and with defendant's by-law. The same conclusion was reached in the Buffalo (N. Y.) superior court, — Englehardt v. Fifth Ward Permanent Dime Sav. & L. Assn. 5 Misc. 518, — the chief justice dissenting; and Mr. Endlich, in his work on Building Associations (sec. 141-143) coincides. The reasoning of the court in the Silverman Case is that, as the stockholder ceases to be a member of the association after due notice of withdrawal, he may, upon refusal of payment, sue it, and recover judgment, just as any other creditor. The suggestion that the proviso in the statute stands in the way of his becoming a general creditor, and that he must be governed by it, is disposed of by urging that, if this be so, the withdrawing stockholder is in a most unfortunate position, for the association "may never choose to make the necessary provision for payment of the claim, and therefore he can never have process to compel it so to do. It is asked, when will the association have the money, — "in one, six, or ten years, or ever, and will the statute of limitations be suspended in the meantime?" And finally it is said that the design of the statute can be better met by giving the plaintiff judgment, and then, should it seem equitable to the trial court, it may restrain execution, in order that the association may have a reasonable time in which to raise the necessary money. If a stockholder, upon withdrawal became a general creditor of the association, there would be force in the position that he could (because his rights would be those of a general creditor) bring suit immediately, and obtain a judgment. But it is obvious that a stockholder who withdraws from one of these associations cannot properly be regarded as having the rights of the ordinary creditor, and this was admitted by the same learned court in a later case (Christian's App. 103 Pa. 189), in which it was frankly stated that there was manifest error in the Silverman Case in putting withdrawing stockholders in the position of general creditors. The conclusion in the case just mentioned loses potency when we discover that the reasoning is unsound. Again, with respect to the query therein as to the effect of the statute of limitations, it can be observed that in no case can the statute commence to run until the right of action accrues.

In assuming the relation of a member of the association plaintiff contracted with reference to and was to be governed by its by-laws in so far as they were reasonable, and not opposed to our statutory provisions regulating associations of this character. He agreed to abide by the condition of the treasury in case of a withdrawal, and to take his money when funds properly applicable for the purpose were on hand. He was not to be paid until these funds were in the treasury, and, although he could at any time cease to be a member, and terminate his obligation to make monthly payments, the amount to be returned to him did not then become due or payable except in a certain contingency. If not absolutely and immediately due and payable at withdrawal, it is difficult to see how his cause of action was then maintainable. When the debt is due and payable, the right to sue, the right to obtain a judgment, and the right to have execution to enforce collection in the usual and ordinary course of procedure are his. And the fallacy of the reasoning in the Silverman Case is strikingly apparent when we see that a withdrawing member is first squarely placed in the category of ordinary general creditors, and then — evidently in order to prevent the wreck and ruin of such associations — it is said that he may be deprived of the benefit of immediate process to collect his judgment. The collection of a judgment obtained by an ordinary general creditor cannot be postponed and delayed in that way. Again, we see no force in the remark that the corporation may never make provision for the payment of the claim, and therefore it cannot be compelled to pay. Provision for the liquidation of the claims of withdrawing members is not optional with the association, for, as long as withdrawals are pending, it is obliged to set aside one half of its receipts for the purpose of meeting and canceling such claims. Its ability to pay depends upon the fidelity with which remaining members discharge their obligations, and this is what all subscribers agree to when taking shares. Again, when considering the language of the by-law and the statute, as well as the rights and remedies of withdrawing stockholders, it must be remembered that if, upon refusal to pay, because not in funds, a suit may be brought at once, and prosecuted to judgment, even if further proceedings could be stayed by the court, such judgment would, as soon as docketed, become a lien upon all real estate, having priority even over a later judgment obtained by a general creditor. In this way a withdrawing member could not only secure superior rights as against other members, but also over a creditor whose judgment was based upon an independent claim. In addition to this, the association would be seriously crippled and embarrassed, for no sale of its real property could be made so long as the lien remained. The right to withdraw and to receive back what has been paid into the treasury by a member of the association exists solely by virtue of the by-law or the statute. If this right to receive money out of the treasury is made to depend upon its condition, the right is not perfect or absolute until that condition exists. We think the by-law and the statute equally plain, and to mean that, until there is money available for the purpose, no cause of action exists. This is the conclusion of the chief justice, who dissented in the Englehardt Case, and also that reached in the supreme court of Texas in May, 1890 (Texas Homestead Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Kerr), which we have been unable to find reported except in 18 S. W. Rep. 1020. It follows that there must be proper allegations in the complaint and proof upon trial as to the existence of funds out of which payment can properly be made. Of course we have been speaking of a case in which there has been no bad faith upon the part of the association. If it should neglect its duty towards withdrawing members by failing to take proper steps for replenishing its treasury, a proper remedy could be found.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

S. M. LINN et al., Appts.,

v.

BURGESS, etc., OF CHAMBERSBURG.

(.....Pa.....)

1. One seeking to enjoin a municipality from incurring further indebtedness on the ground that it would exceed the constitutional limit has the burden of showing that such would be the fact.
2. A municipality may manufacture and supply electricity for municipal purposes and for the use and benefit of such of its inhabitants as wish to use and are willing to pay for it at reasonable rates.
3. A fee allowed to the master by the trial court will not be reduced by the appellate court in the absence of evidence showing it to be clearly excessive.

(March 28, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Franklin County dismissing a bill brought to enjoin defendant from contracting an indebtedness for an electric light plant which was alleged to be unlawful as beyond the power of the defendant to contract, and also as exceeding the constitutional limit of indebtedness. Affirmed.

The material portions of the master's report were as follows:

"1. It is admitted that all the plaintiffs in this case are taxpayers of the borough of Chambersburg, and that all except Augustus Duncan and Benjamin C. Ross are citizens resident in the said borough.

"2. The defendant in this proceeding is the burgess and town council of the borough of Chambersburg, a municipal corporation incorporated into a borough by Act of March 21, 1808 (Pub. Laws, 879), and by the said act of incorporation the limits and boundaries of the said borough were particularly set forth, and it was enacted: 'That from and after the first Monday in May (1808) the burgess and town council duly elected and their successors shall be one body politic and corporate in law, by the name and style of the burgess and town council of the borough of Chambersburg, and shall have perpetual succession. And the said burgess and town council aforesaid and their successors, shall be capable in law, to have, get, receive, hold, and possess goods and chattels, lands and tenements, rents, liberties, jurisdictions, franchises, and hereditaments, to them and to their successors in fee simple or otherwise, not exceeding the yearly value of five thousand dollars, and also to give, grant, sell, let, and assign the same lands, tenements, hereditaments, and rents, and by the name and style aforesaid they shall be capable in law to sue and be sued, plead and to be impleaded, in any of the courts of law in this commonwealth, in all manner of actions whatsoever, and to have and use one common seal, and the same from time to time at their will to change and alter.' See section 8. Also, 'That it shall and may be lawful for the town council to meet as often as occasion may require, and enact such by-laws, and make such rules, regulations, and ordinances as shall be determined by a majority of them necessary, to promote the peace, good order, benefit, and advantage of said borough, particularly by providing for the regulation of the market, streets, alleys, and highways therein; they shall have power to assess, apportion, and appropriate such taxes as shall be determined by a majority of them necessary for carrying the said rules and ordinances from time to time into complete effect; Provided, that no by-law, rule, or ordinance of the said corporation shall be repugnant to the constitution or laws of the United States or of this commonwealth; Provided also, that no tax shall be laid, in any one year, on the valuation of taxable property exceeding one cent in the dollar, unless some object of general utility shall be thought necessary, in which case a majority of the freeholders of said borough, in writing under their hands, shall approve of and certify the same to the town council, who shall proceed to assess the same accordingly.' See section 6.

NOTE.—The power of a municipal corporation to own and operate electric light plants, which is sustained in the above case, is also recognized in Crawfordsville v. Braden (Ind.) 14 L. R. A. 268, and cases cited in note thereto.

On the question what constitutes an indebtedness within the provisions limiting debts of municipal corporations, see Beard v. Hopkinville (Ky.) 23 L. R. A. 402, and note.

"3. The said borough of Chambersburg has continued to hold and exercise the rights and privileges and perform the duties granted and imposed upon it, as a body politic or municipal corporation, from the date of its incorporation until the present time, under its original charter and the acts of the general assembly of Pennsylvania since passed in relation thereto.

"4. Since the early part of the year 1890, at the date of the filing of the bill in this case, March 23, 1892, and at the present time, the said borough of Chambersburg owns, controls, and operates an electric light plant for the purpose of providing an ample supply of light for its streets, public buildings, and grounds, and a short time prior to the filing of this bill, to wit, about December 7, 1891, the said borough made some additions to the engine, dynamos, and other machinery about the plant, and since that date it has been supplying a number of the inhabitants of the borough with electricity for the purpose of lighting their stores and places of business, and it has charged and received certain fixed charges and prices for the said supply of electricity and light.

"5. The capacity of the said plant as used and operated for street lighting purposes, prior to the additions above referred to, was sufficient for the supply of seventy arc lights of 2000 candle power each, and this entire number of lights was used in lighting the streets and public buildings of the borough.

"6. The additions and improvements made to the plant prior to the filing of the bill in this case and within a short time thereafter, consisted of the following items: Conversion of the single cylinder engine into a compound cylinder, and necessary pulleys and shafting, and the erection of a new stack to the boiler, at a cost of $698; the erection of a commercial circuit, for wires, poles, brackets, insulators, etc., and labor, at a cost of about $200; the purchase of thirty or forty arc lamps, at a cost of from $1,200 to $1,600; the purchase of a fifty arc light dynamo, at a cost of $2,875. These additions and improvements were made by the borough for the purpose of increasing the capacity of the plant so as to be able to supply electricity to the inhabitants of the borough for lighting purposes in their stores and dwellings, at fixed charges and prices, and the said borough has been furnishing and still is supplying the said citizens with electricity for lighting purposes as aforesaid. Prior to March 23, 1892, seven arc lamps were in use by citizens of the borough, and since that date the number has been increased until at least thirty arc lamps of 2000 candle power are now in use by sundry citizens of the said borough, and the same are furnished with electricity by the borough at rates and prices fixed by the burgess and town council of the borough of Chambersburg by ordinance."

The seventh finding sets out the Act of May 20, 1891.

"8. In accordance with the provisions of section 2 of the said Act of May 20, 1891, and in the manner provided by the Act of April 20, 1874, and the amendment thereto passed June 9, 1891, the said borough, on December 7, 1891, at a regular meeting of the burgess and town council of the said borough, signified its desire, by a majority vote of the said town council, to make an increase of indebtedness of the said borough in the sum of $10,000 for the purpose of increasing the electric light plant to furnish the citizens with commercial light and electricity, and to submit to the vote of the qualified electors of the borough the question as to the said increase of indebtedness at the election to be held in February, 1892. And the said burgess and town council of the said borough gave notice to the qualified electors of the said borough, by weekly advertisement in three newspapers published in said borough, for thirty days prior to February 16, 1892, setting forth the action of the said town council, and that an election would be held at the places of holding the municipal elections in said municipality on February 16, 1892, Tuesday, between the hours of 7 A. M. and 7 P. M. of said day, for the purpose of obtaining the assent of the electors thereof to such increase of indebtedness, and the said notice contained a statement of the amount of the last assessed valuation of property, the amount of the then existing debt, the amount and percentage of the proposed increase, and the purpose for which the indebtedness was to be increased, the form of the ballot and method of voting, and the particular places for voting in the several wards.

"9. The said election, as specified in the said notice, was duly held on February 16, 1892, and resulted in favor of the increase of the debt of the said borough in the sum of $10,000, for the purpose specified in the said notice. The return of the said election was duly certified, and with a certified copy of the action of councils and the advertisement, it was made a record of the court of quarter sessions of Franklin county, and a certified copy of the record as aforesaid delivered by the clerk of the said court to the corporate authorities and by them entered upon the minutes of the said corporation.

"10. By virtue of the authority thus conferred upon them the burgess and town council of the said borough proceeded to increase the indebtedness of the said borough in the sum of $10,000, for the purpose of enlarging and extending the electric light plant of the said borough, and passed an ordinance on March 3, 1892, entitled 'An ordinance relating to the supply of incandescent and arc lighting and electricity, by the borough of Chambersburg, Pa.' This ordinance provides for contracts to be entered into by the borough with each individual citizen desiring the use of electricity for lighting purposes in stores, dwellings, churches, fairs, festivals and other places, and prescribes the duties of the borough on the one part and the purchaser or consumer on the other part, and fixes the rates and prices to be charged by the borough for the supply of electricity, by arc and incandescent lights, to these persons and places.

"11. In furtherance of the design and purpose of the burgess and town council of the borough of Chambersburg to increase the capacity and enlarge the electric light plant of the said borough, for the supplying of electricity to its inhabitants for lighting purposes, the said authorities, before the date of the filing of the bill in this case, and after the said election held on February 16, 1892, by letter through the chairman of the committee on electric light, invited proposals from the Thomson-Houston Electric Light Company of Philadelphia, the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company of Pittsburgh, and the Edison Electric Light Company, and received proposals or bids from the first two companies for the furnishing of a dynamo for incandescent lighting, of a capacity of 650 incandescent lamps, and the necessary appliances to operate the same, and the said borough received an incandescent dynamo of the capacity indicated, with appliances, from the Thomson-Houston Company, but have never consummated the purchase or put the same in operation, owing to the filing of the bill in this case. The said borough also entered into a contract with the Taylor Engine Company for the purchase of an engine and boilers, and necessary appliances at a cost of $5,889, for the purpose of supplying additional motive power to meet the increased demand for power in running the commercial lighting. This contract was entered into before the bill in this case was filed, and after February 16, 1892, and without inviting bids for the same or advertising for proposals, but the engine, etc., have never been delivered, on account of the filing of the bill in this case. The said borough, during the same period, advertised for and received bids for the necessary changes in the building and brick stack, but never entered into contract for the same on account of the filing of the bill in this case.

"14. The bonds provided for by the action of the burgess and town council of the borough of Chambersburg and the election of February 16, 1892, for the increase of the indebtedness of the borough in the sum of $10,000, were never issued by the said municipality, the action in reference thereto being delayed by the filing of the bill in this case.

"19. On April 20, 1892, at the date the burgess and town council of the said borough of Chambersburg provided for the issuing of the bonds of the said borough in the sum of $10,000 for the purpose of enlarging the electric light plant, the said burgess and town council passed the following resolution: 'Resolved, That in order to provide for the payment of the interest and principal of said bonds that an annual tax equal to at least eight per centum of the amount of said increased debt be levied and assessed, to be applied exclusively to the payment of the interest and principal of said indebtedness,' and on May 23, 1892, the said burgess and town council fixed the tax levy for the year commencing June 1, 1893, at four mills on the dollar for borough purposes, and five mills on the dollar for the payment of interest and the liquidation of the principal of bonds.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

"1. The proposed increase of indebtedness by the burgess and town council of the borough of Chambersburg in the sum of $10,000, does not increase or cause the entire indebtedness of the said borough to become greater than seven per centum of the assessed value of property within the limits of the said borough.

"2. The Act of May 20, 1891, and the action of the burgess and town council of the borough of Chambersburg, in pursuance thereof, are not in violation of section 7, article 9, of the Constitution of Pennsylvania, and the said section of the constitution does not, in letter, or spirit and meaning, restrain or prohibit the legislation and action above referred to.

"3. The proposed enlargement of the electric light plant of the borough of Chambersburg, as set forth in the findings of facts, for the purpose of manufacturing and furnishing electricity for lighting purposes to all the inhabitants of said borough who may desire to use the same, at fixed and uniform rates and charges established by ordinance of said borough, the said plant to be owned and operated by the said borough, constitutes a public service, of benefit and convenience to all the inhabitants of the said borough. (2)

"4. The legislature of the state of Pennsylvania has authority to confer the power upon municipalities of manufacturing and distributing electricity for the purpose of furnishing light to their inhabitants for private use, and it has conferred such power upon the borough of Chambersburg by Act of May 20, 1891. (3)

"7. The burgess and town council of the borough of Chambersburg have a lawful right to issue the bonds of the borough in the sum of $10,000, for the purpose of raising money wherewith to erect and enlarge the present electric light plant of the said borough, for the purpose of supplying electricity for commercial purposes. (5)

"8. The said burgess and town council of the borough of Chambersburg have a lawful right to enlarge the electric light plant of the said borough, to issue bonds in the sum of $10,000 to provide for the expense incurred.

and to furnish electricity for lighting purposes for private use, and the plaintiffs are not entitled to any relief against said acts of the said municipality. It is therefore recommended that the bill of the said plaintiffs be dismissed at the cost of the said plaintiffs."

The master's fee was fixed at $300.

Exceptions to the master's findings of law and to the fee were dismissed, in the following opinion by STEWART, P. J.:

"The purpose of this bill is to restrain the borough of Chambersburg from engaging in the manufacture of electricity for the supply and use of its citizens.

The effort is made on two distinct grounds: First, that the Act of May 20, 1891, entitled 'An act to authorize any borough now incorporated, or that may hereafter be incorporated, to manufacture electricity for commercial purposes for the use of the inhabitants of said borough, and for this purpose to erect, purchase, or condemn electric light plants,' etc., under which the defendants claim to exercise this right, is unconstitutional, and therefore void.

"Second, that the debt proposed to be incurred by the borough, or which it will necessarily incur, for the purpose aforesaid, will increase the indebtedness of the borough to an amount in excess of the constitutional limit of 7 per cent of the assessed valuation of the taxable property.

"In both contentions the conclusions of the master are adverse to the plaintiffs, and they except thereto.

"The exceptions which relate to the constitutionality of the Act of May 20, 1891, are overruled. It is sufficient to say, in this connection, that our attention has not been called to any exception or prohibition in the constitution with which the act conflicts; and that we know of none.

"Nor can the exceptions to the master's conclusions with respect to the indebtedness of the borough be sustained. It is immaterial whether occupations be regarded as taxable property within the meaning of the constitution, or not, so far as the result here is concerned. Eliminate entirely from the calculation the tax assessed upon occupations, and seven per centum of the assessed valuation of what remains makes a total which exceeds, by several thousand dollars, the debt of the borough at the time referred to.

"But there is no reason why this tax should be eliminated. Indeed there is express authority for including it in the calculation. This very point was raised and decided in the case of Brown's App., 111 Pa. 80, and it now admits of no controversy.

"We have considered the exceptions to the costs taxed, but are unable to see any good reason why the bill as taxed should not be allowed. The master's work was protracted, and he has given it careful study and attention."

Mr. O. C. Bowers, for appellants:

The business of manufacturing electricity for commercial purposes as contemplated by the above recited act of assembly and ordinance, is a private business enterprise; and the act is in violation of the spirit and meaning of section 7 of article 9 of the Constitution of Pennsylvania.

Cooley's Const. Lim. p. 260.

The evils almost necessarily consequent upon the conferring of such powers on municipalities, and the reasons for denying them, are most cogently set out in the opinion of the supreme court of South Carolina, in Mauldin v. Greenville, 8 L. R. A. 296, 33 S. C. 1, which was an action brought to enjoin the city of Greenville from purchasing and operating an electric plant.

"When the construction of railways and canals was first entered upon by an expenditure of public funds to any considerable extent, the states themselves took them in charge, and for a time appropriated large sums and incurred immense debts in enterprises, some of which were of high importance and others of little value, the cost and management of which threatened them at length with financial disaster, bankruptcy, and possible repudiation.

Many of the states, in view of a bitter experience of the evils already developed in undertaking to instruct and control them, amended their constitutions so as to prohibit the state, when again the fever of speculation should prevail, from engaging anew in such undertaking."

In citing Opinion of the Justices, 15 L. R. A. 811, 155 Mass. 593, the Massachusetts court holds that a municipality has no authority to engage in the business of buying and selling wood and coal.

In Spaulding v. Peabody, 10 L. R. A. 397, 153 Mass. 129, it was held that "power in a municipal corporation to construct and maintain works for the manufacture and distribution of gas or electricity for the purpose of lighting its streets cannot be implied as an incident to power expressly granted it to erect and maintain street lamps.

See also Western Sav. Fund Soc. of Philadelphia v. Philadelphia, 81 Pa. 183, 72 Am. Dec. 730.

"Though the legislature first decides that the use is public, the decision is not conclusive. They cannot make that a public purpose which is not so in fact."

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 606; Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 854; Gove v. Epping, 41 N. H. 539; Crowell v. Hopkinton, 45 N. H. 9; Freeland v. Hastings, 10 Allen, 570; People v. Flagg, 46 N. Y. 401; Kelly v. Marshall, 60 Pa. 819.

Mr. J. D. Ludwig, for appellees:

That the act of assembly in question does not violate the letter of article 9, section 7, of the Constitution is at once apparent, and needs no discussion. That it does not violate the spirit of section 7, article 9, of the Constitution, see Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 855.

The presumption is that the legislature has judged correctly of its constitutional powers, and the contrary must be clearly demonstrated before a co-ordinate branch of the government can be called upon to interfere between the people and their immediate representatives.

Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 185, 59 Am. Dec. 759.

The interpretation of a state constitution is entirely different from that applicable to the Constitution of the United States.

Com. v. Hartman, 17 Pa. 118; Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 147, 59 Am. Dec. 759.

In Western Sav. Fund Soc. of Philadelphia v. Philadelphia, 31 Pa. 183, 73 Am. Dec. 780, the right of the city of Philadelphia to supply gas light in their streets and houses is recognized.

The tendency of modern legislation, as well as the decisions of this learned court, are in the direction of increased power of municipal corporations.

Lehigh Water Co's App. 102 Pa. 515.

In Opinion of the Justices, 8 L. R. A. 487, 150 Mass. 593, the house of representatives submitted to the justices of the supreme court of Massachusetts the question whether or not the legislature has the constitutional right to enact laws conferring on cities and towns the power to manufacture gas and electric light for public use, and also for sale to their own citizens.

In the case of Crawfordsville v. Braden, decided by the supreme court of Indiana, 14 L. R. A. 268, 130 Ind. 149, it was held that a city may provide and maintain the necessary plant to generate and supply the electricity needed for electric lights therein.

Smith v. Nashville, 7 L. R. A. 469, 88 Tenn. 464, is also in point as to the principle involved.

The proper authority to determine what should and what should not constitute a public burden is the legislative department of the state, and in determining this question, the legislature cannot be held to any narrow or technical rule.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 599; Kirby v. Shaw, 19 Pa. 258; Com. v. Butler, 99 Pa. 540; Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 85 Pa. 170, 27 Am. Rep. 783; Weister v. Hade, 53 Pa. 474; Hilbish v. Catherman, 64 Pa. 154.

Independent of specific legislative authority it is one of the inherent powers of municipalities to light their streets and public places with electric light and at the same time and in connection therewith to supply electricity to its inhabitants for the lighting of their residences and places of business.

Crawfordsville v. Braden, supra; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 8, A.

Per Curiam:

This bill was brought to restrain the borough of Chambersburg from manufacturing and supplying electricity for the use and benefit of its inhabitants under the provisions of the Act of May 20, 1891 (Pub. Laws. 90). It is grounded mainly on allegations which, in substance, are (1) that said act is unconstitutional, and (2) 36 L. R. A.

that the debt, which would necessarily be incurred by the borough in carrying into effect its proposed undertaking, will increase its indebtedness to an amount in excess of the constitutional limit of seven per centum of the assessed valuation of taxable property within the corporate limits.

As to both of these allegations, the learned master's findings of fact and legal conclusions are in defendant's favor. The first five specifications charge error in overruling the several exceptions to the master's conclusions of law recited therein respectively. For reasons sufficiently stated in the report and in the opinion of the learned president of the common pleas, approving the same, we think there was no error in refusing to sustain either of said exceptions.

The burden was on the plaintiffs to prove that the indebtedness of the borough would be necessarily increased to an amount exceeding the constitutional limit, etc. In that they were unsuccessful.

While the legislative intention may not be as clearly and happily expressed as it might have been, we fail to discover anything in the provisions of the act that is in conflict with the constitution.

The power of the legislature to authorize municipal corporations to supply gas and water for municipal purposes, and for the use and benefit of such of their inhabitants as wish to use and are willing to pay therefor at reasonable rates, has never been seriously questioned. In view of the fact that electricity is so rapidly coming into general use for illuminating streets, public and private buildings, dwellings, etc., why should there be any doubt as to the power to authorize such corporations to manufacture and supply it in like manner as artificial gas has been manufactured and supplied? It is a mistake to assume that municipal corporations should not keep abreast with the progress and improvements of the age.

The subjects of complaint in the remaining specifications are the learned judge's refusal to reduce the master's fee, and the decree dismissing the bill. As to the former he says: "We are unable to see any good reason why the bill as taxed should not be allowed. The master's work was protracted, and he has given it careful study and attention." In the absence of any evidence that would justify us in saying that the fee is clearly excessive, we must assume that the compensation sanctioned by the court was not unreasonable.

The decree dismissing the bill is the logical sequence of the facts and legal conclusions properly drawn therefrom. The questions involved are so well considered and so satisfactorily disposed of by the learned master and court below that further comment is unnecessary.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS

v.

Joseph T. JONES, App't.

(..... W. Va. ....)

1. A person who causes his land to be sold for some purpose of his own, under a judicial proceeding which turns out to be void, and receives and retains the proceeds of sale, cannot afterwards be heard to question its validity. He has made his election.
2. If such person afterwards stands by and sees the purchaser expend large sums in developing oil on the property, he may not afterwards set up such defect in the purchaser's title; he is estopped.
3. Petroleum or mineral oil in place is as much a part of the realty as timber, coal, iron ore, or salt water.
4. It is a part of the inheritance, and an unlawful removal thereof is a disherison of him in remainder, constituting waste, which a court of equity in a proper case will restrain and enjoin.
5. A case in which the remainder created by the will is held to be vested, not contingent, and those in remainder not to be parties to the suit by representation.

(April 4, 1894.)

*Headnotes by HOLZ, J.

NOTE.—Nature of property in mineral oil or gas.
A modern and distinctively American branch of law is that of property in mineral oil or natural gas, while it has come to be a subject of great practical importance. Especially recent is the development of the law in respect to natural gas, although it is in substance an application of the rules established in respect to petroleum.

Natural gas.

The description of property rights in respect to gas is very clearly made in Westmoreland & Cambria Nat. Gas Co. v. DeWitt, 5 L. R. A. 781, 130 Pa. 256. In this case the master said: "Gas is a mineral, and while in situ is a part of the land, and, therefore, possession of the land is possession of the gas." But after quoting this the court said: "This deduction must be made with some qualifications. Gas, it is true, is a mineral, but it is a mineral with peculiar attributes which require the application of precedence arising out of ordinary mineral rights, with much more careful consideration of the principles involved than the mere decision. Water also is a mineral, but the decisions in ordinary cases of mining, etc., have never been as unqualified precedents in regard to flowing or even to percolating water. Water, and oil, and still more strongly, gas, may be classed by themselves, if the analogy be not too fanciful as minerals ferre naturæ." In common with animals and unlike other minerals, they have the power and the tendency to escape without the volition of the owner; their "fugitive and wandering existence within the limits of a particular tract is uncertain," as said by Chief Justice Agnew in Brown v. Vandergrift, 80 Pa. 147, 148. They belong to the owner of the land and are part of it so long as they are on or in it, and are subject to his control; but when they escape and go into other land or come under another's control, the title of the former owner is gone. Possession of the land, therefore, 25 L. R. A.

A PPEAL by defendant Jones from orders of the Circuit Court for Tyler County entered in a suit which had been instituted to establish rights in certain real estate, which enjoined defendant from pumping petroleum from land and appointing special receivers to take charge of the property. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Caldwell & Caldwell, for appellant:

The circuit judge erred in requiring an additional injunction bond in the penalty of only $12,000, instead of at least in the penalty of $70,000.

Two injunction bonds aggregating only $14,000 were insufficient.

Whether natural gas is a "volatile substance" partaking of the nature of petroleum, rock, or carbon oil, was held in Ford v. Buchanan, 111 Pa. 31, to be a question of fact and not of law. In this case the lease was for mining "oil and other valuable volatile substance," and the court said the construction of those words was a mixed question of law and fact in which the court, and necessarily a jury, must have the aid of scientific men, and therefore on a case stating the question whether the words included natural gas, the court refused to decide.

Natural gas is a mineral within the Municipal Act, Rev. Stat. O. chapter 184, section 565, which gives corporations of any county or township power to sell or lease mineral rights under highways. Ontario Nat. Gas Co. v. Gosfield, 18 Ont. App. 626.

Natural gas is as much an article of commerce as iron ore, oil, coal, petroleum, or any other of the like products of the earth. The gas in the earth may not be a commercial commodity, but when brought to the surface and placed in pipes for transportation, must assume that character, as completely as coal in the cars or petroleum in the tanks. State v. Indiana & Ohio Oil, Gas & Min. Co. 6 L. R. A. 579, 2 Inter. Com. Rep. 758, 120 Ind. 575.

The incorporation of a company for the furnishing of natural gas is not authorized by the Pennsylvania Act of 1874, authorizing the incorporation of companies for "the carrying on of any mechanical, mining, quarrying or manufacturing business," nor by the Act of April 20, 1868, (Bright, Purd. 1000, P. 1. 40) including "companies formed for mining coal, and for mining, quarrying, and preparing for market lime, marl, soda, hydraulic cement, and other minerals, with the right of preparing for market the products of their said mines and quarries, and vending the same." The court said: "It is quite impossible for us to regard a gas well as a mine or a quarry, or natural gas a mineral substance to be mined or quarried or prepared for market, within any conceivable meaning to be imputed to the legislature which passed this act. At that time natural gas was unknown as a fuel, but had it been perfectly well known, it would have required far more precise and specific words than these to authorize the formation of gas for supplying it." It is evident that this case is clearly distinguishable from the others holding natural gas to be a mineral, as the language of the statute here involved refers more particularly to mines and quarries than to the mineral nature of the article in question.

The possession of the soil by the owner for the purposes of tillage gives him no possession of gas under the surface, as against parties to whom he has leased the land for gas purposes, and who remain in possession of a well which gives them the sole control of the gas, so far as its utilization is concerned, and the sole possession of which it is capable, apart from the land. *Westmoreland & C. The explosion of nitro-glycerine in a gas well on one's own land is not unlawful interference with the rights of other persons from whose lands the gas is thereby drawn. People's Gas Co. v. Tyner, 16 L. R. A. 443, 31 Ind. 277.

Allowing gas to escape into the open air or go to waste because it is not profitably utilized to flow from a well which has been lawfully drilled, without malice or negligence, in one's own premises, gives no legal ground of complaint to a neighboring owner on the ground that gas is thereby drained from the adjoining lands to the detriment of his well, and the latter has no right to plug the well, or prevent the waste of the gas even at his own expense. Hague v. Wheeler, 23 L. R. A. 141, 157 Pa. 324. The court says that if the owner of the gas well makes such use or waste of the product that it is injurious to the property and the health of others, such use or waste may be restrained or damages recovered therefor; but that, subject to these limitations, his power as owner is absolute, until the legislature shall, in the interest of the public, as consumers, restrict or regulate it by statute.

By filing their petition as assignees of the liens the executor of David Hickman and Mrs. Williamson became parties to the consolidated suits to enforce the liens against the land and the circuit court had jurisdiction over them, although the jurisdiction was not material to the fact. But land and other waters impregnated or combined with mineral substances are minerals; what are rocks, clays, and sand; anything dug from mines or quarries, in fine, all inorganic substances are classed under the general name of minerals. . . . but if the reservation embraces all these things it is as extensive as the grant, and, therefore, void." Therefore, the court presuming that the parties used the word, not as scientists but as business men, governed by ideas of every-day life, did not construe the reservation of "all minerals" as intended to include petroleum, especially as the parties were doubtless unaware of the existence of the oil at the time of the conveyance.

In another case the court says of petroleum: "It is a mineral substance obtained from the earth by the process of mining, and lands from which it is obtained may, with propriety, be called mining lands." Gill v. Weston, 110 Pa. 813.

Petroleum unexpectedly coming up in a salt well which has been rightfully dug by the lessee on land leased for the production of salt, cannot be recovered from the lessee by the lessor in an action for trover. Kier v. Peterson, 41 Pa. 361. It seems to be the opinion of some of the judges in this case, that the oil belongs to the lessee; but in a concurring opinion, one of the judges takes a different view, and agrees to the decision against the plaintiff on the ground that trover is not the proper remedy, because the lessor is out of possession of the land, and has never acquired any right to the possession of the oil which comes rightfully into the possession of the lessee, in operating the salt well, and on which he has expended labor in separating it. This judge suggests that a bill of equity for an account would be the lessor's remedy, and that he ought to be allowed the value of the oil at the moment of its separation from the freehold, which would be obtained by deducting from the present value of the product, the value of the labor which the lessee had been obliged to expend. In his opinion he says: "Petroleum, or, as it is called in the West Indies, Barbadoes tar, is a species of mineral, which, while it exists in its natural deposit in the earth, is included in the very comprehensive idea which the law adjudges to the word 'land.' It is part of the land. It is land."

Oil being a mineral, a bill by a co-tenant for an account concerning it must be brought in the county where the lands lie; under the Pennsylvania Act of April 25, 1860, providing that suit in the county where the lands lie may be brought by a tenant in common of minerals. The fact that oil was unknown as a product from land at the time when this act was passed does not prevent its application. Thompson v. Noble, 3 Pittsb. 201.

Right to drill through coal of another owner.

In several cases a question of great importance has arisen in respect to the right to drill through a layer of coal belonging to another person to reach oil or gas below and the extent and qualifications of this right are yet unsettled. The supreme court of Pennsylvania has decided that the right to drill oil and gas wells through a stratum of coal belonging to another person, to reach oil and gas in a lower stratum belonging to the owner of the surface, is a right which exists at all times, though it must be exercised so as to do no violence to the rights of the owner of the soil. Chartiers Block Coal Co. v. Mellon, 18 L. R. A. 702, 162 Pa. 236. In this case the court refused to grant an injunction on the ground that it might cause more injury than it would prevent. A concurring opinion in the case lays down the broad proposition that the several layers or strata composing the surface crust are, by virtue of their order and arrangement, subject to reciprocal servitudes. The judge wishes to go farther than the majority of the court is willing to do. He is in favor of denying the injunction against boring an oil well through coal of another owner, not merely in the exercise of discretion, but on the ground that the ownership of the coal is subject to an easement of the owner of the surface to bore through for oil or gas. The majority of the court recognizes the ownership of the oil or gas as belonging to the owner of the surface of the land, and that he has a right of access thereto, and says: "The only question is, how that right shall be exercised, by what authority and under what limitations," but adds: "We do not see our way clear to apply the doctrine of the service and way of necessity to the facts of this case. While the rights of the surface owner to reach in some way his underlying strata is conceded, it involves too many questions affecting the rights of property and of injury to underlying strata to be settled by the judiciary. It is a legislative rather than a judicial question." In another place the court remarks: "We find ourselves upon a new road without charter or compass to guide us, and we propose to move slowly." The decision is, in short, merely a denial of an injunction remitting the owner of the coal to a remedy at law, if his rights are violated by boring a well.

To the same effect it was held by the court of common pleas in Robbins v. Guffey, 48 Phila. Leg. Int. 462, that the doctrine of a way of necessity did not apply to the right of the landowner to bore through a stratum of coal belonging to another person for gas or oil; but that right of access to the gas or oil was a new and distinct right, which, in the absence of legislation, the court would not enunciate and define. In this case also, a preliminary injunction against boring an oil well through coal was denied.

Venture Oil Co.*, 48 Fed. Rep. 248, and the alleged danger of the escape of gas, and an explosion of the mine in consequence, was not regarded in the proofs presented as sufficient to justify an injunction, especially as the court said the state courts were at that time trying to define those rights as rules of property under the law of the state.

Nature of interest in leases.

A grant of the exclusive right or privilege of digging and boring for oil and other minerals for a term of years must be treated as a lease for the production of oil and not of the sale of the oil or of the land. Duffield v. Hue, 123 Pa. 94.

The grant of an exclusive privilege of a company on land to bore for oil, with the right to the exclusive use of one acre of land around each well, in consideration of one third of all the oil produced in addition to certain payments, is held to be a grant of an incorporeal hereditament, constituting an estate in the grantee which was divisible by the express terms of the grant, and a sublease of a portion of it was, therefore, held not to constitute a forfeiture. Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. 223.

This case is followed in Union Petroleum Co. v. Bliven Petroleum Co., 72 Pa. 173, holding that the only remedy for disturbance of such a right is an action on the case that ejectment would certainly not lie.

Only a license to enter upon the land for the purpose of oil operations is conferred by an instrument which, in consideration of one dollar, purports to convey the exclusive right of entering upon the lands and erecting buildings and fixtures with the right of way to and from the same, for the purpose of searching for minerals or to bore for oil or other valuable volatile substances, and gather and preserve the same, delivering to the grantor one-tenth part of all the product, with the further stipulation that the grantee or lessee shall commence operations within one year, or as early as practicable thereafter, or forfeit all rights, while the other party retains free use of the premises for tillage except that part actually necessary for the 25 L. R. A. mining operations. Shepherd v. McCalmont Oil Co. 36 Hun. 37.

A contract giving the right to explore for oil in consideration of a cash payment of $100, and of the agreements of the parties including the promise to convey the land for a certain sum, if oil should be found, and giving the exclusive right to sink wells, for each of which $100 per year should be paid for ten years, so long as the well was pumped continuously; with the further provision that buildings and machinery might be removed if oil was not found, does not give any estate in the land, which is enforceable by ejectment, but only a license. Dark v. Johnston, 55 Pa. 164, 33 Am. Dec. 722.

So a lease of premises for the purpose and with the exclusive right of drilling for oil, giving the right for one year or so long as gas or oil is produced in paying quantities, is not strictly a lease but a license coupled with a conditional grant, conveying the grantor's interest in the gas well conditioned that gas or oil is found in paying quantities. Herrington v. Wood, 6 Ohio C. Ct. Rep. 286.

Since a lease for the purpose of drilling for oil gives no interest in the land except the right of possession for the purpose of operating for oil, the consideration being a share of the product, a delay for eleven years after completing an unsuccessful test well was regarded by the court as an abandonment of the lease, where, during the time, the value of the territory for oil purposes had increased. Barnhart v. Lockwood, 152 Pa. 82. The court held that an oil lease was not a grant of property in the oil, but merely a grant of possession for the purpose of searching for and procuring oil.

An agreement giving only the right to work land for oil, the lessee to have three fourths of what is brought to the surface, gives no estate either in the land or the minerals; while he has a right to part of the oil brought to the surface, he has no property to the oil in situ. Thompson's App. 101 Pa. 225.

Even if a lease of land merely for the purpose of oil operations is not to be regarded as constituting a corporeal tenement, it is otherwise with a lease of all the lessor's right, title, interest, and claim in and to all the land described. Chicago & A. Oil & Min. Co. v. United States Petroleum Co. 57 Pa. 82.

These are not the subjects of absolute property, and being therefore jura naturæ capable of a qualified ownership only, they belong to him who first appropriates them.

The defendant Jones could legally appropriate the gas, oil, and water percolating through the land; animals fera naturæ and such like, without committing "waste."

The appointment of receivers is a severe measure not to be adopted except in an urgent and strong case, is always reluctantly made, and a court of equity, in such a case as the one at bar, should not have departed from its "ordinary course of administering justice" at least until a final hearing of the case.

Beverley v. Brooke, 4 Gratt. 209; 28 Am. & that a lease of land for oil purposes gave merely a license and not an estate in the land, in other and later cases this statement is limited or modified. Thus, the exclusive right to operate for oil on premises for a period of twenty years is held to be an estate for years for mining purposes and not a mere license, so that the lessee is entitled to notice of partition proceedings between the owners of the fee. Duke v. Hague, 107 Pa. 57.

And the right to the exclusive possession of the land for obtaining oil, with actual possession of a considerable part, if not of the whole of the premises, is held in Kitchen v. Smith, 101 Pa. 452, to be "not a mere license" so as to preclude a levy for taxes on the personal property of the lessee which was on the premises, and, therefore his payment of the taxes to protect his property is not voluntary but entitles him to recover therefor from the lessor.

In the case of Brown v. Beecher, 120 Pa. 590, in respect to a contract leasing lands for a term of years, with the use and exclusive right and privilege, during that period, of digging or boring for oil and other minerals at a fixed rent or royalty reserved out of the production, the court said that there could be no doubt that it conveyed an interest in the land, and was in this respect distinguished from a license. The interest, however, was held to be a chattel interest.

"As oil is not less part of the reality than timber or coal, and not less valuable, there is no reason why it should not also come within the protecting and supervising powers of the court. Stoughton's App. 88 Pa. 198." On this ground it is held that the guardian of an infant has no power to make an oil lease, without approval of the court, of the infant's property, because the oil is part of the reality, and a so-called lease is, in effect, "the grant of part of the corpus of the estate, and not of a mere corporeal right." The court says also, that "not infrequently the oil forms by far the most valuable part of the estate, and to permit the guardian to dispose of it at will, and without security, would often lead to consequences disastrous to the wards."

An oil lease for ninety-nine years, or so much of that time as oil can be produced in paying quantities, is held to be a chattel interest which may constitute partnership assets as to third parties though the title is not recorded in the partnership name, and, therefore, a levy or sale thereof for partnership deed gives a title superior to that of an assignee, of the interest of one of the partners. Chamberlain v. Dow, 16 W. N. C. 532.

In Brown v. Beecher, 120 Pa. 590, it was again held that an oil lease was partnership assets, such that the sale thereof to satisfy a judgment against the partnership would transfer title as against the sale of his interest, by one partner.

A claim in trespass for disturbance of the exclusive right of a lessee to bore for oil may be sustained under the Pennsylvania Procedure Act of May 25, 1887, abolishing the distinctions between trespass and case. Duffield v. Rosenzweig, 144 Pa. 527.

A leasehold estate subject to the special lien of mechanics, materialmen, and laborers, under the Pennsylvania Act of April 8, 1868, giving such liens on leasehold estates, and not a freehold estate, is created by the lease of land for twenty years, or as long as the said parties of the second part use it for the purposes of producing oil or minerals or gas, at the election of the lessee. McElwaine v. Brown (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 789.

The Pennsylvania Act of April 27, 1855, in respect to the leasehold mortgages of any colliery, mining land, manufactory, or other premises, giving them the force and effect of real estate mortgages, is held applicable to a mortgage of a leasehold of oil land, notwithstanding the fact that the petroleum was not discovered until after the act was passed. Gill v. Weston, 110 Pa. 313.

A covenant in an oil lease to prosecute the business of producing oil with due diligence, is a covenant running with the land and binding upon the assignee of the lease. Bradford Oil Co. v. Blair, 113 Pa. 33, 57 Am. Rep. 442.

The taking of oil by a lessee under a lease of the corporeal tenement with an added exclusive right to bore for and take oil is not waste, but a rightful exercise of his rights. Chicago & A. Oil & Min. Co. v. United States Petroleum Co. 57 Pa. 33.

A lease of a certain tract of land for gas purposes, providing that no wells shall be drilled within 300 feet of certain buildings, is as much of a lease of that part of the territory as of any other part subject to the provision as to locating wells upon it, and the lessee is entitled to an injunction against the drilling of a gas well within these limits by any other person. *Westmoreland & C. Messrs. J. A. Hutchison, T. I. Stealey, and J. H. McCoy for appellees.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These two appeals are both to interlocutory orders entered in one case by the circuit court of Tyler county,—the one overruling defendant's motion to dissolve an injunction which had been awarded against him, enjoining him from pumping and removing petroleum from the land in controversy; the other appointing special receivers to take charge of the property. But the appeal and supersedeas to the order of injunction of July 13, 1898, was dismissed in this court by the appellant. Sixteen grounds of error are assigned, but there is no reason for considering them separately. Some of them relate to important questions of practice, but are not grounds for reversing the orders complained of. The case has not reached a final hearing on the merits; nor is any evidence in, except such as is documentary, and some ex parte affidavits. Still, in this immature state of the case, the important questions for decision must arise out of the facts, as in all other cases, and these are to be gathered from the record as it now stands; but, as far as may be, they will be understood to be taken provisionally.

The facts thus ascertained from the pleadings and evidence, as far as may be necessary for the present purpose, are as follows:

David Hickman, of Tyler county, W. Va., the father or grandfather of the principal plaintiffs below, died in the year 1863, leaving his last will and testament, which was duly proved, and admitted to record in Tyler county. The seventh clause—the only one bearing on this controversy—is as follows: "I give and bequeath to my daughter Eliza Williamson, the wife of Dr. William S. Williamson, for life, the shares I own in the Thomas Jones land, adjoining Sistersville,

... with the power to her to dispose of the same by will amongst her sisters or sisters' children, as she may think proper, and in the event of her death without a will, the said shares ... shall revert to her sisters in equal proportions." By the eighth clause he gives to his daughter Eliza Williamson a legacy of $400, and he appointed Mrs. Williamson and Christian Engle the executors. The latter alone qualified. By a codicil he so modified the seventh clause as to constitute Christian Engle trustee, to whom he devised said lands (including also 100 acres not in any way here involved) for the sole use of his said daughter for life, but the devise in all other respects to remain as provided for in the seventh clause.

The history of the shares in the Thomas Jones land thus owned and devised for life to his daughter by David Hickman is, so far as it is necessary for our purpose, as follows: Robert Greer and wife by deed dated 21st April, 1832, conveyed to Thomas Jones a tract of about 205 acres, which is here called the "tract of 165 acres," treated for this purpose as including the adjoining tract of 54 poles. Between the defendant in this suit, Joseph T. Jones, and the family of Thomas Jones, the former owner of the land, no relationship existed or appears. It is a mere coincidence of names, without bearing or significance. In the year 1849 (about the 22d day of February) Thomas Jones departed this life intestate, seised and possessed of the tracts of 165 acres and of 54 poles, then regarded as of little value, now in the center of what is called and known as the "Sistersville Oil Field," with twenty-six producing wells on this tract, put down and operated by defendant Joseph T. Jones, claiming the same by purchase as hereafter mentioned. Thomas Jones left surviving him as his heirs at law ten children,—six sons, namely, Lewis, John H., Thomas, David, Joel, and Milton; and four daughters, namely, Martha, Sarah, Elizabeth, and Emeline. This land was not partitioned among the Jones heirs. Lewis Jones had bought the interest of John H. Jones, Thomas Jones, and Emeline Jones, and also claimed to be the owner of the undivided share of his brother David Jones. David Hickman was indorser for Lewis Jones on a negotiable note, which Hickman had to pay; and Lewis Jones, to secure the payment thereof, by trust deed dated December 15, 1853, conveyed to R. Hickman and Thomas J. Stealey, trustees, these five undivided shares. On the 12th of March, 1855, the trustees sold four of these interests to David Hickman, the trust creditor, and conveyed the same to him by deed of that date, which was admitted to record in May, 1855. The trustees did not sell the David Jones interest, as it had been previously sold and conveyed under a decree to John Wharry. In September, 1854, Milton Jones conveyed his share to Absolom George. Martha Jones had married John Massey. On the 25th day of March, 1861, Martha Massey and John, her husband, Absolom George, and John Wharry sold and conveyed these three undivided shares to David Hickman. This deed was recorded on the 25th day of April, 1861. Thus it appears that at the time of his death, in 1863, David Hickman owned seven undivided tenth parts of the Thomas Jones land. These are the shares mentioned in the seventh clause of his will. On the 1st day of July, 1857, the administrators of James Peden, deceased, instituted a suit in equity in the circuit court of Tyler county against Lewis Jones, curator of the estate of Thomas Jones, deceased, and the children and other heirs-at-law of Thomas Jones, deceased, on a claim for $41.09. On ——— day of February, 1859, Joshua Russell instituted a suit in equity against the curator of the estate and the heirs-at-law of Thomas Jones, to enforce payment of the balance of $32.63, due on a note from decedent to Russell. On the 23d day of September, 1862, these two suits were consolidated, and a sale was decreed of the tract of land of 165 acres and the tract of 54 poles to pay these debts, which had been proved before, and on July 28, 1862, been reported by the commissioner to whom the cause had been referred, viz. to Joshua Russell, $51.94, amounting to $99.61; to Peden's administrator $83.10, amounting to $130.21; Samuel

Davis, $35.70. A. D. Soper was appointed special commissioner to make the sale. None of these claims were liens on any of the interests bought by David Hickman, or affected them in any way, they having been sold and conveyed to him and his vendors before either of these suits was brought; but he was a pendente lite purchaser of the one tenth which was sold and conveyed to him by Martha Massey (née Jones) and her husband by deed of March 25, 1861. David Hickman was not a party to the suit. He was a bona fide purchaser for value, or grantee of such purchaser, as to six tenths, with his deeds duly entered of record before the institution of the suits. He was a pendente lite purchaser as to one tenth. Soper, the commissioner to sell, died, and this decree remained unexecuted. On the 10th day of June, 1864, Peden's administrators, by James M. Stephenson, their attorney, assigned their decree to the estate of David Hickman, and the two other creditors by decree also assigned their decrees. The three are alike, and one will show for all. The one from Peden's administrators reads as follows:

"Exhibit C. John O. Peden and David Peden, Adm'rs of James Peden, dec'd, vs. Lewis Jones, Curator of the Estate of Thomas Jones, dec'd, and Daniel Reynolds. In Chancery in the Circuit Court of Tyler County.

A decree at the September term, 1862, in favor of the complainant against the defendant, for	$ 41 00
Interest thereon from the 25th day of August, 1843, to the 10th day of June, 1864.	39 03
Costs at law	7 50
Costs in chancery	42 50
	$130 21

"June 10th, 1864. Received from Christian Engle, executor of David Hickman, deceased, one hundred and thirty dollars and twenty-one cents, the debt, interest, and costs, above stated; and the benefit of the decree aforesaid is hereby transferred to the estate of the said Hickman, the executor being authorized to enforce the said decree for the benefit of the said estate in any manner he may think proper, but without cost to the complainants. J. M. Stevenson, Attorney for Plaintiffs."

On the 10th day of October, 1868, the court entered in the cause the following decree: "Decree. And at another day, to wit, at a circuit court held for the said county of Tyler, on the 10th day of October in the year 1868, in the above-named causes, one in favor of Joshua Russell for $51.94 and interest, and one in favor of the administrators of James Peden for $83.10, and interest, and $35.75, to Samuel Davis, has been assigned to and paid by the executor of David Hickman since the date of the decree; and it also appearing by the said decree that two tracts of land owned by Thomas Jones, deceased, were decreed to be sold for the payment of the said debts, unless otherwise paid, and it also appearing that the said David Hickman, at his death, was the owner of seven undivided tenth parts of said land, and the executor of said Hickman not desiring the sale of the parts of said land owned by the said estate, but only that part of said land not owned by the estate of said David Hickman, deceased: It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the commissioner heretofore appointed to make sale of said lands sell the outstanding interest in order to the payment of their portion of the debts aforesaid, the said debts being the debts of Thomas Jones, deceased, and a lien on the whole of said land."

From October, 1868, to December 23, 1881, no orders were entered in these two consolidated causes save orders of continuance. In the mean time Eliza Williamson purchased the outstanding one tenth, being the share of Joel Jones, from his children who conveyed the same to her by deed dated the 19th day of January, 1870, and on the 6th day of December, 1872, she bought from the children of Elizabeth Kester, deceased (née Jones), her one tenth share, which was conveyed to her by deed of the last-named date; and on the ——— day of December, 1887, she bought at a tax sale the remaining outstanding share in the name of Thomas Jones' estate, which the clerk of the county court conveyed to her by deed dated April 1, 1890. On the ——— day of ———, 1886, Eliza Williamson, who had become sui juris by the death of her husband, brought a suit in equity against C. Engle as executor and trustee under the will of David Hickman, asking for the will to be executed by, among other things, directing her legacy of $400 to be paid to her, and that the trusts be carried out in regard to the Thomas Jones land, etc. On the 18th day of October, 1886, defendant Engle filed his answer, which resulted in the entry of the final decree in the cause.

"Exhibit D. At a circuit court continued and held for the county of Pleasants, at the court-house thereof, on the 18th day of October, 1886, the following decree was entered: 'Eliza Williamson, Complainant, vs. C. Engle, Trustee, etc., and Others, Defendants. In Chancery. This day came the defendant Christian Engle, trustee for Eliza Williamson, and executor of David Hickman, deceased, and tendered in open court his separate answer to complainant's bill, together with Exhibits A, and B, C, D, E, and F, to said answer, and asked that the same be filed, which is accordingly done, whereupon the complainant, by her counsel, agrees to abide by and perform the arrangement and agreement entered into between herself and Christian Engle as executor of David Hickman, dec'd, in relation to the liens against the Thomas Jones lands, as alleged and shown by the answer of said Christian Engle, and the exhibits therewith filed in this cause, and to accept the said liens against said Jones land, which are mentioned and fully recited in said answer of said Engle, and the Exhibits D, E, and F, therewith filed, and amounting on the 25th day of June, 1864, in all to the sum of $285.52, with interest thereon from said 25th day of June, 1864, in full of the balance of $265.52 (and the interest thereon accrued and accruing from June 25, 1864), of the bequest of $400 to her by her father David Hickman, deceased, which she alleges in her bill to be due to her on account of said bequest; and that said Thomas Jones lands may be sold in the chancery suits of Peden's administrators and Joshua Russell, pending in the circuit court of Tyler county, under the decree of sale made therein as stated in said answer of said Engle, for the payment of said liens and the interest thereon accrued and accruing. And the complainant further agrees that this cause be dismissed at her cost, but no docket fee to be taxed therein. To which proposition and agreement by the complainant the defendant C. Engle by his counsel accedes and agrees. It is therefore ordered that the foregoing agreement of complainant and defendant C. Engle, executor, etc., be entered up as the decree of this court in this cause; that said Jones land be sold under the decree in said two chancery suits in Tyler circuit court for the payment of said liens and interest thereon for the use and benefit of said Eliza Williamson as aforesaid; and that this cause be, and the same is hereby, dismissed at the cost of complainant, Eliza Williamson, less the docket fee as aforesaid. D. D. Johnson, Attorney for Complainant. B. Engle, Attorney for Defendant Engle, Trustee, etc." "A copy from the minutes. Attest: J. L. Knight, Clerk Circuit Court, Pleasants Co., W. Va."

On the 26th day of December, 1881, in the cause of Peden's Administrator, etc., v. Lewis Jones, Curator of the Estate of Thomas Jones, Deceased, etc., C. Engle, executor of David Hickman, and Eliza Williamson, by Ben. Engle, her attorney, filed their petition, giving a history of the case, the assignments of the sums decreed therein, a history of the Jones land, the disposition of the seven tenths by David Hickman, the testator, Eliza Williamson's purchase of two of the three outstanding tenths; that since the death of her husband the land had been of no profit, but a burden to her. They pray that they may be made parties defendant in the Peden suit; that the Thomas Jones land may be sold for the payment of the liens so held by Engle, executor, etc., to pay Eliza Williamson the amount she is entitled to by reason of the interest held by her in said lands in her own right; that the decree of September 28, 1862, and of October, 1868, may be set aside, and a decree entered appointing a new commissioner to make sale of the lands on such terms as the court may deem most advantageous to the parties in interest, to Eliza Williamson as devisee and as owner in her own right, etc. Thereupon the court, without making any new parties, entered the following decree: "And at another day, to wit, at a circuit court held for the said county of Tyler, on the 26th day of December, in the year 1881: Joshua Russell, Complainant, vs. Lewis Jones, Curator of the Estate of Thomas Jones, Deceased, and Others. In Chancery. John O. Peden, et alia, Adm's of James Peden, Deceased, Complainants. vs. Lewis Jones, Curator of the Estate of Thomas Jones, Deceased, and Daniel Reynolds, Defendants. In Chancery. This day Christian Engle, executor of the last will and testament, with the codicils thereto annexed, of David Hickman, deceased, and Eliza Williamson, in her own right, presented their joint petition in writing in open court, praying to be made parties defendants to the above two causes, which were, by an order of this court made therein at the September term thereof in 1862, consolidated and heard together, which petition is now ordered to be filed, which is accordingly done. And this cause came on again this 26th day of December, 1881, to be further heard upon the bill, proceedings, orders, and decrees formerly had and made herein, and the said petition of C. Engle and Eliza Williamson, filed as aforesaid, and was argued by counsel for said petitioners. And it appearing to the court that the land owned and held by Thomas Jones, deceased, in his lifetime, in fee simple, consisting of two tracts,—one of one hundred and sixty-five acres, particularly described in the deed from Robert Grier and wife to said Thomas Jones, a copy of which is filed as Exhibit A, and made part of said petition; and the other tract containing fifty-four (54) poles, more particularly described in a deed from Samuel Corbitt and wife to Thomas Jones, a copy of which is also filed as Exhibit B to said petition,—was subject to and decreed to be sold to pay certain liens in said causes set forth, in which order and decree A. D. Soper was appointed to make sale of said lands, who departed this life without having executed said order of sale. And it appearing also from said petition that C. Engle, executor of David Hickman, deceased, holds said liens as set forth in said causes, in favor of Joshua Russell and Peden, administrators, together with a lien in favor of Samuel Davis, amounting to the sum of $35.70, by assignment thereof, and that as trustee under the will of said David Hickman, deceased, he holds seven undivided shares or interests of one tenth each in said land, and that Eliza Williamson holds in her own right two undivided shares or interests of one tenth each in said land; and it also appearing that said lands cannot well be partitioned, and that the interest of the parties will be promoted by a sale of the entire two tracts in one body; and it also further appearing to the court that the interests held by C. Engle, as trustee as aforesaid, are for the use and benefit for life of said Eliza Williamson, by virtue of a provision in the will and codicils thereto of the said David Hickman, deceased: It is therefore adjudged, ordered, and decreed that Benjamin Engle be and is hereby appointed a special commissioner to make sale of said land, as particularly described in Exhibits A and B, filed with said petition in the bill and proceedings of, and the decrees and orders heretofore made in, said two causes, who is hereby directed to give notice by publication in some one or more newspapers published in Tyler county for four consecutive weeks of the time, terms, and place of sale, which shall be made at the front door of the court-house of Tyler county, on some court day, upon the following terms, to wit: One third of the purchase money to be paid cash in hand, and the residue thereof to be paid in three equal installments, to become due and payable respectively in eight, sixteen, and twenty-four months from the day of sale, with legal interest, to be paid semiannually, on each and all of said deferred payments from the day of sale. And said commissioner is hereby directed to require the purchaser to give bonds with approved security for said deferred payments, to become due and payable as aforesaid, with interest to be paid semiannually, as hereinbefore provided; and the said commissioner is hereby further directed to retain a lien upon the said real estate to secure the payment of the deferred installments of purchase money therefor, and the interest thereon; and said commissioner will report his proceedings under this order to this court at a future term thereof."

On the 14th day of April, 1892, the court modified the decree of December 26, 1881, authorizing and empowering the commissioner, Benjamin Engle, to sell the undivided seven-tenths interests held by C. Engle as trustee under the will of David Hickman, and the undivided two tenths then held by Eliza Williamson in her own right in said real estate either at public auction or at private sale, and may sell said seven tenths and two tenths together; and the undivided one-tenth interest in said two tracts yet outstanding is to be sold at public auction, but in all other respects the commissioner is to be governed by the terms and conditions of former decrees of sale. No bond was required by these decrees to be executed by Commissioner Engle before acting, but he gave and filed a bond in the penalty of $2,000 on March 15, 1890, conditioned according to law. The causes were continued from time to time until the decree of December 12, 1891, confirming the sale. On that day Commissioner B. Engle returned and caused to be filed his report of sale. He reports that on the 10th day of December, 1891, in front of the court-house door of Tyler county, in pursuance of the decrees of sale, he sold at public auction the two tracts of land in the bill and proceedings mentioned; that J. C. Tennent, being the highest and best bidder, became the purchaser thereof at the price of $4,000,—$2,000 paid cash in hand, and three bonds for $666.66 each, interest from date, payable semiannually, and due in 8, 16, and 24 months, without personal security, but a lien retained on the land. This sale, there being no objection thereto, was confirmed by decree of December 12, 1891. Out of the cash payment the commissioner was decreed and directed to pay to C. Engle, executor of the last will and testament of David Hickman, deceased, the sum of $265.52, the amount of charges or liens held by him as such executor, with interest on said sum from the 26th day of June, 1864, to December 12, 1891; to pay three tenths of the residue to Eliza Williamson, and the remaining seven tenths of Christian Engle, trustee under the will, to be by him invested at interest for the benefit of Eliza Williamson for life; that the commissioner, after having first given bond with security in the penalty of $2,000, withdraw and collect the sale bonds as they fall due, and pay proceeds as directed above. And he was directed to execute and deliver a deed to the purchaser, retaining a lien for the deferred installment. On motion of the purchaser, he had leave to sue out a writ of possession. Up to that time Mrs. Williamson held the land in possession. Before receiving any money under the decree, Christian Engle, as trustee, was required to execute and file in the papers a bond in the penalty of $2,500, with good security, conditioned according to law, and the causes were ordered to be dropped from the docket.

Benjamin Engle, as commissioner, conveyed the lands to Tennent, the purchaser, by deed dated the 4th day of February, 1892, retaining a vendor's lien for the deferred installments, which have since been paid. In making this purchase, James C. Tennent acted as the agent of defendant Joseph T. Jones, who paid all the purchase money, and to whom Tennent conveyed the land by deed dated 8th February, 1892. Defendant Jones took possession, bored 23 fine producing oil wells, at a cost of about $6,000 each. He produced from June, 1892, when the first well was completed, until September 21, 1893, about 403,681 barrels of oil, received for oil sold during that time about $189,580.90, and that drilling and operating had been at a cost of about $225,000.

David Hickman left six daughters, who were entitled to take under the seventh clause of his will: (1) The plaintiff Eliza Williamson, whose husband, Dr. Williamson, has died since the death of David Hickman. (2) Laura Weirich, who died in 1868, without issue surviving her, leaving a will, in which she gave to her sister Mary Hickman a part, and to her husband, Dr. Israel Weirich, the residue of her interest in her father's estate, and appointed her brother, David Hickman, her executor. Dr. Weirich died intestate in 1887, without issue, etc. (3) Caroline Stealey, who died in 1880, intestate, leaving as her children and heirs-at-law David H., Nancy Engle, wife of Benjamin Engle, Kate, Eliza, and Nellie; the last being under 21 years of age. (4) Mary Hickman intermarried with William Arthurs, and in 1890 died, leaving three infant children her heirs-at-law, viz., Mary, John, and David. (5) Mercy P. Wells is living; also (6) Rosalie Stealey. Eliza Williamson conveyed her interest to William H. Gillespie by deed dated 22d June, 1893. Mrs. Wells and husband sold and conveyed her interest to W. H. Gillespie by deed dated June 28, 1893, and Rosalie Stealey sold and conveyed her interest to Gillespie, whatever such interest may be, and Gillespie qualified as guardian of the infant children of Mary Arthurs.

The bill of injunction was brought on July 13, 1893, by Eliza Williamson and W. H. Gillespie, assignee of Eliza Williamson; Mary P. Wells, and Rosalie Stealey, and Gillespie as their assignee; David Arthurs, May Arthurs, and John Arthurs, infants, by Gillespie, their next friend; David H. Stealey, Eliza Stealey, Kate Stealey, and Nellie Stealey, the latter a minor, by Thomas J. Stealey, her next friend, plaintiffs, against Joseph T. Jones, J. C. Tennent, Nannie Engle, Christian Engle, executor of the last will and testament of David Hickman, deceased, and Christian Engle, as trustee under said will; the Eureka Pipe-Line Company, a corporation created by the laws of West Virginia, and the W. L. Melton Pipe Lines, a corporation created by the laws of the state of Pennsylvania,—and charges in substance that defendant Joseph T. Jones has no valid title to these oil lands; that it was the property of defendants; that they were committing irreparable injury to and waste of the inheritance in cutting and removing the standing timber, and taking the petroleum or mineral oil, which constituted its chief value. They pray that the defendants answer fully; that they may be required to file an account showing the amount of oil taken, sold, and removed from the premises; that an account thereof may be taken before one of the commissioners of the court; that the deed from Engle, commissioner, to Tennent, and from Tennent to J. T. Jones, may be set aside; that the court will direct the payment of the rents, issues, and profits due Eliza Williamson to be made to her, and her interest to William H. Gillespie, etc.; that the court will enjoin and restrain the defendants from further operating for oil or producing the same or removing the same or selling it, etc., and for general relief. The injunction was granted without notice restraining the pipeline companies from paying over or delivering to defendant J. T. Jones and J. C. Tennent, or either of them, any of the proceeds of the sales of oil produced from the Jones tract of 165 acres, etc., until further order.

On motion, on notice, two special receivers were appointed on the 25th day of August, 1893. On the 25th day of September, 1893, plaintiffs filed notice of motion for order of reference, and defendant Joseph T. Jones filed two notices,—one of motion to dissolve the injunction, the other to increase the penalty of the injunction bond,—and the time for hearing these three motions was fixed for the 17th of October; and on first Monday in October, 1893, defendant Jones filed his demurrer, also his separate answer, duly sworn to, to complainants' bill, and certain exhibits. The Eureka Pipe-Line Company filed their answer on the 17th day of October, 1893, exhibiting the state of defendant Jones' oil and oil account from wells on the Jones land. On the 14th day of November, 1893, the judge entered the following order:

"Decree. Eliza Williamson et al. vs. Joseph T. Jones and Others. In chancery. This 17th day of October, 1893, at Ritchie Courthouse, W. Va., before the judge of the circuit court of Tyler county, came the parties by their attorneys, and the motion of the plaintiffs for an order of reference herein was heard upon the duly certified copy of the will of Laura Weirich, deceased, and the answer of the defendant Joseph T. Jones, which was filed at October rules, 1893, in the Tyler county circuit court clerk's office (to which the plaintiffs replied generally), the affidavits of Fannie E. Anderson, J. S. Pierpont, A. H. Ong, and F. D. Young, and two affidavits of J. B. Thomas (to the consideration of which affidavits the plaintiffs objected), upon the demurrer of said Jones herein, and upon all the affidavits, pleadings, and papers heretofore read; and said motion was argued by counsel, and taken under advisement by the judge. Thereupon the motion of the said defendant Joseph T. Jones for a dissolution of the injunction herein, and also his motion for the court to require an increase of the amount of injunction bond in the event that the court refused to dissolve the injunction, were heard upon said affidavits read at the hearing of the motion for the appointment of a special receiver herein (to the reading and consideration of said affidavits the plaintiffs excepted), and upon the other papers and pleadings then read, the said answer and replication thereto, the affidavit of J. T. Jones of October 16, 1893, and the affidavit of John A. Taylor (to which two last-named affidavits the plaintiffs objected); and said motions of said Jones were argued by counsel, and taken under advisement by the judge. And now at this day, to wit, on the 14th day of November, 1893, the undersigned being fully advised as to what order and decree to make herein, it is adjudged, ordered, decreed, and pronounced that the motion of complainants to refer this cause to a commissioner at this time be and the same is hereby overruled. And as to the motions of the defendant J. T. Jones to dissolve wholly the injunction heretofore granted herein, and, in case that should be refused, then to dissolve said injunction as to three tenths of the land in dispute, the court doth overrule said motions, and each of them; the court being of opinion not to read on the hearings of said motions ex parte affidavits taken without notice, where objections are made to the reading thereof. And as to the motion of J. T. Jones to require from the plaintiffs an increase in the amount of the injunction bond, it seems to the court that said motion ought to be sustained. Therefore it is ordered and decreed that the complainants, or some of them, or some one for them, do within a reasonable time execute before the clerk of the circuit court of Tyler county, West Virginia, an additional injunction bond herein in the penalty of twelve thousand dollars, with security to be approved by said clerk, conditioned as the law directs in such cases."

We are met at the threshold by the contention on the part of defendant Jones that, no matter who may be the rightful owner of the land, petroleum,—mineral oil,—so far from being a part of the inheritance, something of which waste can be committed, is only capable of the qualified ownership of belonging to him who first appropriates it, no matter where it may be situated. Whatever the earlier decisions in other states may have been, it has never been so held in this state; and the authorities now very generally—universally, as far as I have examined them—hold petroleum to be a mineral, and as much a part of the realty as timber, coal, or iron ore, except that in proper cases its mobility as a subterranean liquid must be taken into consideration, as in the case of salt water, etc. The courts of the state of Pennsylvania have had many cases, some involving property rights of great value, in which the point arose, and have examined the question thoroughly, considered it with great care with reference to its being property where it is found, and its character and nature as property in general. "Oil is a mineral, and, being a mineral, is part of the realty. Punk v. Haldeman (1866) 53 Pa. 229, 249. In this it is like coal, or any other natural product, which in situ forms part of the land. It may become, by severance, personalty, or there may be a right to use or take it, originating in custom or prescription; as the right of a life tenant to work open mines, or to use timber for repairing buildings or fences on a farm, or for firebote. Nevertheless, whenever conveyance is made of it, whether that conveyance be called a lease or deed, it is, in effect, the grant of a part of the corpus of the estate, and not of a mere incorporeal right. Not infrequently the oil forms by far the most valuable part of an estate." Stoughton's App. (1878) 88 Pa. 198, 201; Westmoreland & C. Nat. Gas Co. v. De Witt, 130 Pa. 285, 5 L. R. A. 731; Hagus v. Wheeler, 157 Pa. 324, 23 L. R. A. 141. As to ownership in situ of subterranean waters, see Collins v. Chartiers Valley Gas Co. (1890) 131 Pa. 143, 6 L. R. A. 280; as to ownership by different ones of the surface, coal, iron ore, oil, gas, etc., see Chartiers Block Coal Co. v. Mellon (1893) 152 Pa. 286, 293, 18 L. R. A. 703; Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 528, 64 Am. Dec. 721,—where there is a full note on the subject. "Where percolating water is found, it belongs to the realty where it is found." Chesmore v. Richards, 7 H. L. Cas. 349. In Findlay v. Smith (1818) 6 Munf. 184, 8 Am. Dec. 733, subterranean salt water is treated as part of the inheritance of which waste could be committed. And for a like or a stronger reason should rock oil be so regarded. Hail v. Reed, 15 B. Mon. 479. I do not understand the case of Wood County Petroleum Co. v. West Virginia Transp. Co., 28 W. Va. 210, 57 Am. Rep. 659, to lay down a different doctrine, even as to natural gas, so long as it is confined in the strata where it is found. It is only when it escapes out of the possession of the owner that the right of property is gone. This follows as an inevitable result of its fugitive nature. In that case the lease was for carbon oil at a fixed royalty, and the gas escaped with it, and thus ceased to be a part of the realty, and this was shown to be a natural and inevitable incident to the sinking of all oil wells in that region, as verified by an experience of twenty years; and, while the grant was for the specific purpose of mining and removing carbon oil, still the lease necessarily included the gas which came up with the oil as an inevitable concomitant; that it was essential that the well should be kept open in order to pump the oil, and the gas necessarily from its nature, and by its own force, issued from it. And the court held, under the circumstances of that case, that the lessee could, in any proper manner that he might choose, appropriate and use this escaped, wild gas without accounting therefor. As to oil coming up in a salt well, see Kier v. Peterson (1861) 41 Pa. 357. In the case in 28 W. Va. 210, 57 Am. Rep. 659, cited above, the court evidently regarded the oil as part of the realty, if not the gas also, as long as it remained in the earth, and subject to the owner's control, whether such owner be lessor or lessee; but from its nature the title of such owner is gone when the gas escapes into the land of another, and comes under his control. See Gould, Waters, 2d ed. § 291; People's Gas Co. v. Tyner, 181 Ind. 277, 16 L. R. A. 443, 81 Am. St. Rep. 453, and cases cited in the note. We take for granted, therefore, that petroleum in place, among the strata of the earth, where it belongs, is a part of the inheritance, and to take it unlawfully would be lasting damage to the disherison of him in remainder.

Defendant Joseph T. Jones admits that he has taken the oil from the land in controversy in large quantities; is still taking it, as he claims he has a right to do; and he justifies by setting up his purchase at the judicial sale already set forth. The plaintiffs claim as life tenants and tenants in remainder under the will of David Hickman, and that defendant Jones has no title; that he is doing irremediable mischief, going to the destruction of the substance of the estate by the cutting down of the timber and the extraction and sale of the oil. This is a sufficient ground for injunction, and it is no answer to say that the title to the premises is in litigation. See Erhardt v. Boaro, 118 U. S. 589, 28 L. ed. 1117. If an action of ejectment were pending to recover possession of the land in controversy, the court, under such circumstances, could require the sheriff or other officer to take possession of the land. See Code, chap. 92, § 5. So an injunction may be awarded to protect any plaintiff in a suit for specific property, pending either at law or in equity, against injury from the sale, removal, or concealment of such property. Code, chap. 183, § 1. This, in a proper case, leads to the appointment of a receiver, or managing receiver, as was attempted in this case. Here the bill alleges waste, spoliation of the inheritance, by severing and selling a part of the corpus; prays an injunction against future waste, and an account and satisfaction for that already committed. So that the main question is, what title to the land in controversy did defendants Tennent and Jones get by virtue of the purchase at the judicial sale? And while the title to this property with 28 producing oil wells on it was being litigated, it was eminently proper for a court of equity to take hold of it in a proper way, hereinafter indicated. I take for granted that under the will of David Hickman the plaintiff Eliza Williamson took a life estate in the undivided seven tenths of the land in controversy, and her sisters and her sisters' children (representing as a class a deceased sister), at the death of the testator, the remainder in fee, and that such remainder was not contingent, but vested; for "it is not the uncertainty of ever taking effect in possession that makes the remainder contingent, for to that every remainder for life (or in tail) is and must be liable, as the remaindermen may die, or die without issue, before the death of the tenant for life. The present capacity of taking effect in possession, if the possession were to become vacant, and not the certainty that the possession will become vacant before the estate limited in remainder determines, universally distinguishes a vested remainder from one that is contingent." Fearn, Remainders (Butler's ed.), 215, 216. "It is now clearly settled, after considerable doubt and hesitation, that the existence of a power of appointment will not prevent estates limited to take effect in default of the exercise of the power from vesting, if they are such as, apart from the existence of the power, would be vested estates." Challis, Real Prop. 57; Fearn, Remainders, p. 225, § 9. "Such estates are said to be vested but liable to be divested by an exercise of the power." See Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 397, and under section 401 and notes, page 401, and note 2, page 389. By the Code of West Virginia (see chapter 71) any estate may be made to commence in future by deed, in like manner as by will. No words of limitation are now necessary to create or pass a fee simple. Fee tails may still be created, but they are docked by the statute, and converted into estates in fee simple. But the word "heirs" is still constantly used as a word of limitation. But if the estate is given by deed or will to any one for life expressly, and after his death to his heirs or heirs of his body, the conveyance is construed to vest an estate for life only in such person, and a remainder in fee simple in his heirs or heirs of his body. A contingent remainder can no longer fail for want of a particular estate to support it, and the alienation of the particular estate, or the union of such estate with the inheritance by purchase or descent, no longer operates by merger or otherwise to defeat, impair, or otherwise affect such contingent remainder, so that trustees to preserve contingent remainders are no longer in any contingency necessary, as it cannot be destroyed by forfeiture, surrender, merger, or wrongful alienation; but it may be sold by proceeding in equity under the statute. See Code, ed. 1891, p. 635, chap. 71, §§ 20 et seq. The suit is in the name of the owner of the particular estate, but all persons then living, who are contingently interested, must be made parties defendant in person. Such living persons cannot be made parties by representation.

Were the debts decreed in the chancery suits of Peden and Russell, under which the land was sold, extinguished by the payment made by and assignment made to Christian Engle as executor? It is contended that it was the duty of the executor to pay off these decrees, because the first clause of the will reads as follows: "I desire that, as soon after my death as possible, that all my debts be paid by my executor, both legal and equitable, including all, if any there are, that I might be in honor bound to pay." I do not regard the Peden and Russell decrees against the estate of John Jones as properly falling within the debts thus mentioned, for they were not debts for which the testator was in any sense liable as principal or surety, in law or in equity; and the payment thereof as his debt could not have been contemplated or intended by him. Still the payment was made by the executor with the funds of the estate, and the assignment was taken to him as executor, for the evident purpose of removing a cloud from the title to this 165 acres, seven tenths of which had been devised by the testator. The decree was for the sale of the whole tract, and such a sale to a stranger would have at least clouded the title of these devisees; and, although Hickman was not a party to the suit, a sale under the decree might have had, in ways that need not be considered, the effect of embarrassing, if not defeating, the title to a part or all of the seven-tenths interest of the testator. The assignment was evidently taken in the interest of the devisees, and for their protection and benefit, as far as was necessary, as he was their trustee under the will, as well as the executor; and, as far as necessary would be construed as inuring to their benefit. But it did not ipso facto operate as an extinguishment of the incumbrances. There were obvious reasons why it should be kept alive, for it was a lien on the three tenths undivided, which the testator did not own or claim; and, as a practical way out of the trouble, it might have been prudent to have enforced the decree by a sale of the land, but for some good reason no doubt the executor saw fit to pursue a different course.

It is claimed by plaintiffs that the attorneys-at-law had no right or authority to make these assignments. It is true, no authority expressly appears, but they were made nearly thirty years ago, and are now to be taken as adopted and ratified by the receipt of the money paid by the executor. However that may be, they set up no claim, and strangers cannot now do so for a wholly foreign purpose.

On the 10th day of October, 1863, the executor had the decree of that date entered, whereby he made it appear to the satisfaction of the court that as executor of Hickman he had paid and taken an assignment of the sums decreed against the land by decree of September 23, 1863, and for the payment of which it had been decreed to be sold, unless otherwise paid; that David Hickman, his testator, at his death was the owner of seven undivided tenth parts of said land; that he, the executor, did not desire a sale of the parts of said land owned by the estate of David Hickman, deceased. After this recital the court adjudged and decreed that the commissioner hereinbefore appointed to make sale of said lands sell the outstanding interests, in order to pay their portion of the debts aforesaid, being the debts of Thomas Jones, deceased, and a lien on the whole of said land. What was the effect of this decree? Whatever other effect it may have had, there was and is no reason why it should not have had the effect to free the seven tenths from the incumbrance, and withdraw it from the operation of the previous decree of sale, as it was evidently intended to do. Whether it left three tenths of the land called "outstanding" to be sold to pay three tenths of the sums decreed need not be considered, further than to say that it could only be done after giving the defendants, the heirs of Thomas Jones, deceased, who as such were the respective owners of the three tenths, an opportunity in some way to be heard, which was not done in this case.

The next decree was entered on the 26th day of December, 1881, on the petition filed of C. Engle, executor and trustee under the will of David Hickman and Eliza Williamson, by B. Engle, attorney, and this again was modified by the decree of April 14, 1882. It is claimed that these decrees were void, because the decree pronounced on the 23d day of September, 1862, was final; "that the latter is a decree disposing of the whole subject, deciding all questions in controversy, ascertaining the rights of all parties, and awarding the costs" (Harvey v. Branson, 1 Leigh, 108); "that no further action of the court in the cause is necessary to give completely the relief contemplated by the court" (Cocks v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. (Va.) 20; "nothing further than those measures or proceedings which are necessary for the execution of the decree which has been pronounced, and which are properly to be regarded as adopted, not in, but beyond, the cause, and as founded on the decree itself or mandate of the court, without respect to the relief to which the party was previously entitled upon the merits of his case." See full discussion of the subject in Cora v. Strickler, 24 W. Va. 689. See also Mower v. Fletcher, 114 U. S. 127, 29 L. ed. 117. It is certainly not a final decree in the sense of putting the cause to an end and the parties out of court, for the land remained to be sold, the sale to be reported and passed upon; but it would now be an appealable decree, as it requires money to be paid and real estate to be sold. See Code, chap. 185, § 1. Whatever we may call it, and whatever the power to make it as against the heirs of Thomas Jones, deceased, it was made, appointing the commissioner Soper to sell three tenths of the tract of land. It was still standing unexecuted. The commissioner was dead, and now Mrs. Williamson, a pendente lite purchaser of the three tenths, by a writing signed with her name asked the court to appoint a new commissioner, and cause it to be sold, which was done, with her approval, and she received the proceeds of the sale. Having thus made her election, she is estopped; and although, as matter of law, both she and the purchaser may be taken to have known the proceeding to have been void or voidable, yet, she having once made her choice to treat it as valid, he had a right to take her at her word, and act accordingly. If the matter complained of was wrong, it had its origin with her, and it is now too late for her to take advantage of it.

We have already seen that the sisters of Mrs. Williamson, as a class, took under the will of their father, David Hickman, a vested remainder in the seven tenths of the land in controversy, subject to the life estate of Mrs. Williamson, and to her power of appointment among them by her will; and that the decree as against their interest in the land had been entered of record in the cause as released or discharged, and it was adjudged that no sale thereof should take place. Their interest being vested, and not contingent, they could not be made parties to any judicial proceeding by representation. Their sister, the life tenant, did not so represent them as to their remainder as to bind them. Baylor v. De-jornette, 18 Gratt. 164; Faulkner v. Davis, 18 35 L. R. A.

Gratt. 683, 98 Am. Dec. 698. They can only be bound after they have had an opportunity to be heard. They were not parties to the suit, nor to the petition filed by Engle, the executor, and Mrs. Williamson. They had no notice thereof, and are not bound by any of the proceedings or decrees under which defendants Tennent and Joseph T. Jones acquired title. All such proceedings, as to them, were void. They had nothing to do with setting on foot the judicial proceeding which led to the sale. They received none of the purchase money. They were not in possession, as remaindermen. They had nothing to do with delivering the possession to Jones in performance of his contract of purchase; and, as to their standing by and seeing, without complaint or protest, Jones, the purchaser, expend so large a sum in developing the oil, it is a new fact as to them, alleged in the answer to repel and avoid the equity of their bill; and, even if provable by affidavit, taken without notice, and I treat them as in and read it, it is not made to appear otherwise than as an inference to be drawn from the fact that they were residents of the county; and, if they had known it, Jones, the operator, was their co-owner of the inheritance to the extent of an undivided three-tenths part, with the right as tenant of the whole of it during the life of Mrs. Williamson; and therefore he had, as against them, the right to drill wells into the oil strata of the inheritance, and take his share of the oil, provided always that he does not take more than his share. See MacSwiney, Mines, p. 110, chap. 6. But he is not entitled to appropriate more than his share of the product. This refers to his share of the net product after deducting all expenses incident to the working. I should think that a co-owner, who has expended so large a sum, entirely at his own risk, but with the knowledge of the other co-owners, in so hazardous an enterprise as developing oil in an unexplored field, ought not to do more than account to them for their proportion of a customary royalty, proper and fair under all the circumstances. See Id. p. 112, and cases.

As to the jurisdiction of a court of equity there can be no question. (1) Because it is, as to seven tenths undivided part, a trust property, vested by the testator in the defendant Christian Engle, trustee, to hold for Mrs. Williamson for life, who is still living, with power to her to dispose of the same by will among her sisters or sisters' children, as she may think proper; and, in the event of her death without a will, the said shares to revert to her sisters in equal proportions. How is a court of law, restricted as it still is to such common-law machinery as it has in this state, to take hold of and properly conduct such business? And if the common-law methods have been to some extent advanced and improved, the jurisdiction of courts of equity in such cases has not been superseded or taken away by statute. (2) Because a court of equity, with its power to enjoin waste, appoint receivers and managers, take accounts, etc., is the forum peculiarly appropriate for the remaindermen in such cases; and, if the remainders were in any sense contingent, as they are claimed to be on behalf of defendant, within the meaning of the rule that permits them to be regarded as parties to a cause by representation; and although a trustee is no longer necessary in any case in this state to preserve contingent remainders, still it was the duty of the trustee in this case and cases like it to see that waste of the inheritance to the disherison of those who might be entitled by way of contingent remainder was restrained, and the waste already committed accounted for, and the property of those ultimately to be entitled was protected and preserved. But, as to Mrs. Williamson, the case, in my view, is wholly different. She was the owner in fee of the undivided three-tenths part, and of the life estate in the remaining seven tenths. She came into court, by her attorney, as such owner, and as the owner of part of the incumbrance, and, with the executor, asked that the land be sold. The decree of sale was pronounced at her instance. The sale was made at a full, fair price,—$4,000. In her petition, signed with her name, she set forth that she was, under the devise from her father, the owner for life of seven tenths and of two tenths in fee; that Christian Engle had power and authority to enforce the decrees for the benefit of David Hickman's estate, praying that a new commissioner be appointed to make sale of the land. As to these facts, showing her interest, thus represented by her, they were material, and seem to have been true. The purchaser, we must presume, relied upon the facts stated in the petition, and thereby, to that extent, was induced to buy. The land seems to have been sold for the purpose, among others, of making partition, and of converting it into money, so that Mrs. Williamson might get the interest for life on seven tenths of the proceeds and three tenths of the proceeds out and out. Having gone thus far, she must have intended that the purchaser should act upon it as a valid sale. The purchasers had no superior knowledge on the subject. The value of the property could only be determined by the drill at great risk, and with great cost and expense. She did not except to the sale, but it was confirmed, and the land conveyed, and possession delivered, with her consent. After taking out the sum of $265.52, with interest, three tenths of the residue was directed to be paid to her, and the residue—seven tenths—her trustee was ordered to put at interest for her benefit for life. The cause was ended, and dropped from the docket.

So far as the sale of the interest of Mrs. Williamson is concerned, it matters but little whether the sale be held to be valid or void; and, whether the judicial proceeding be called void or voidable, she is estopped by her conduct from calling it in question, or in any way impeaching its validity—First. By her conduct in inducing such void judicial proceedings to be had, and the sale thereunder to be made; by receiving and keeping the purchase money; causing her possession to be turned over to the purchaser, and a deed to be made to him purporting to convey to him her interest. Second. By standing by and seeing the purchaser put down twenty-three oil wells, at an outlay of about $140,000, without opening her mouth against the validity of his title during a period of fourteen months, without discovering any new fact except the one the purchaser's drill had brought to light. Now she asks that he be treated as a trespasser and spoliator, and that the property and the oil produced be taken from him, and turned over to her fresh vendee, who seems to have felt some interest in the result of the experiment. In one of the affidavits read on the hearing of the motion for the appointment of a receiver it is stated that Mrs. Williamson said, among other things, in the course of a conversation, that "she was sorry that the suit had been brought; and I infer from that and other things that her conduct was induced to enable her sisters, as she supposed, to assert their right, rather than for any purpose of her own." But we must, for this purpose, take the facts as they are shown to be by the pleadings and the unquestioned exhibits filed therewith. Mrs. Williamson thus showed that on second thought it would be inequitable for her, as to her own interest, at that stage of the transaction, and under such circumstances, to take advantage of such defect in the purchaser's title; and she expressed her thought in the language of feeling, and in this second thought of hers she stated correctly the equitable doctrine on the subject, deciding the case against herself, and, as we may infer, not against her sisters. A party who causes his land to be sold under a void judicial proceeding for some purpose of his own, and afterwards receives and retains the proceeds of the sale, is not permitted to impeach its validity; and if he afterwards stands by and sees the purchaser expend in good faith large sums in developing oil on the property, he may not then set up such defect in the proceedings. In the one case the court has made the sale as his agent. He has acquiesced and ratified it by causing the possession to be turned over, and the land to be conveyed, and purchase money to be paid. In the other he has received the proceeds of sale, and stood by and seen large sums expended on the faith of the ownership thus acquired from him. "The principle of estoppel thus applied has its foundation in a wise and salutary policy. It is a means of repose. It promotes fair dealing. It cannot be made an instrument of wrong or oppression, and it often gives triumph to right and justice where nothing else known to our jurisprudence can by its operation secure these ends. Like the statute of limitations, it is a conservator, and without it society could not well go on." Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U. S. 415, 420, 26 L. ed. 187, 188; Gallagher v. Cadwell, 145 U. S. 368, 36 L. ed. 738; Sherman v. McKeon, 88 N. Y. 266; Ferguson v. Landram, 5 Bush, 230, 96 Am. Dec. 350.

The application of the principle does not depend upon any supposed distinction between a void and voidable sale. "The receipt of the money with the knowledge that the purchaser is paying upon the understanding that he is purchasing a good title touches the conscience, and therefore binds the right of the party in the one case as well as in the other." Smith v. Warden, 19 Pa. 429. It starts with the fact of a defect in the purchaser's title, which has led to the course of conduct which creates the estoppel; but it is the nature and effect of the conduct itself which calls for the application of the doctrine. See Freeman, Void Judicial Sales, 8d ed. p. 87, § 50, and cases cited, among them Spragg v. Shriver, 25 Pa. 282, 64 Am. Dec. 696; Maple v. Kussart, 58 Pa. 349, 91 Am. Dec. 214; Southard v. Perry, 21 Iowa, 488, 39 Am. Dec. 587; Deford v. Mercer, 24 Iowa, 118, 92 Am. Dec. 460; Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. p. 638, chap. 21, §§ 453 et seq.; 2 Herman, Estoppel, p. 1195; Desell v. Odell, 8 Hill, 215, 38 Am. Dec. 628, notes.

Mrs. Williamson now claims that her attorney had no authority to sign her name to the petition which was filed praying the court to decree a sale of the land, and that the court had no jurisdiction to pronounce the decree; but, as the case now stands, it must be taken that he did have such authority, for there is no evidence of any kind to the contrary, and the allegation is expressly denied; and, as we have already seen, having accepted the benefits of the decree, she cannot now be heard to question the jurisdiction of the court to render it. See Ellis v. White, 61 Iowa, 644; Wandling v. Straw, 25 W. Va. 692, 703. And her signing the petition is taken as relieving the case of any question under the statute of frauds, so far as it may be considered as involved; for in this case Mrs. Williamson, by her petition asking a sale, invested the court with apparent authority to make the sale. When reported as sold, she saw fit to have it confirmed; treated it as a valid sale, causing her actual possession to be turned over to the purchaser, and a deed to be made. The purchaser paid the $4,000 purchase money into court on the faith of such apparent power to sell, thus treated as real. The money was in part paid out to her, and she still retains it. Besides that, she stood by, and saw him expend large sums in the hazardous enterprise of developing oil, which, being successful, increased its value an hundredfold. As to estoppel in pais in regard to land, in view of the statute of frauds, see Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. pp. 665, 712; 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 1113; Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 578, 25 L. ed. 618; 2 Herman, Estoppel, § 1074; 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 22; Browne, Stat. Fr. 4th ed. 457a; Brookhaven Trustees v. Smith, 118 N. Y. 634, 7 L. R. A. 755. Upon the subject generally, see the following English cases: Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & El. 469; Cairncross v. Lorimer, 8 Macq. H. L. Cas. 829; Carr v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 10 C. P. 307; Duchess of Kingston's Case, 9th Am. from 9th Eng. ed. 3 Smith, Lead. Cas. 1998.

There remain to be considered some questions of practice, which, owing to their liability to work serious mischief in a class of cases like this, call for some comment, as defendants protest against it most earnestly. I mean the granting of the injunction without notice. The statute (chap. 183, § 3) 25 L. R. A.

says: "Any court or judge may require that reasonable notice shall be given to the adverse party, or his attorney at law or in fact of the time and place of moving for it, before the injunction is awarded, if in the opinion of the court or judge it be proper that such notice should be given." The very general practice is to require notice, especially where the plaintiff seeks to enjoin and restrain such operations as from their nature are liable to entail serious loss in being unexpectedly stopped; such as collieries, furnaces, oil wells, and works of a like kind. In this instance constant working seems to be necessary to keep control of the accompanying salt water. Such practice is so exceptional in that class of cases that I take it for granted that some good reason for its adoption must in this case have been made to appear, as that the mere act of giving notice might have been of itself productive of some of the mischief apprehended. In such cases the courts, on a proper showing, award injunctions without notice. See 1 Foster, Fed. Pr. § 231. In this case, if notice had been given, it is highly probable that it would have resulted in a temporary order for the occasion, satisfactory to both parties; and, if to nothing else, would surely have led to the requirement of an injunction bond in a greater penalty than $2,000, which is another ground of complaint. After the defendant appeared and moved for it, an additional bond in the penalty of $12,000 was required, and, I suppose, given, although this record does not show the fact. The order requiring an additional bond should have fixed a time within which it should be given, and, if not given within such time, that after the expiration thereof the injunction should stand dissolved until such bond be given; or some order of like effect that would enforce the giving of the new or additional bond, on pain of having the injunction dissolved. See Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co. 17 W. Va. 396, 407.

The defendant also assigns as ground of error the refusal of the circuit court judge in vacation, on the hearing of his motions to dissolve the injunction, to read on his behalf certain ex parte affidavits taken without notice, to the reading of which plaintiffs objected. On a motion to dissolve, on filing the answer, the common practice in this state has been to read affidavits taken without notice in support of the equity of the bill, and counter affidavits taken in like manner in support of the denials of the answer; but where the answer sets up new matter to repel or avoid the equity of the bill the court may very properly require that plaintiff shall have an opportunity to be present when such affidavits are taken, otherwise he may be taken by surprise. On this matter, however, the court below must have a considerable latitude of discretion, in order to give a fair hearing on the motion to dissolve, and may require the affidavits in general to be taken on notice. But these affidavits are regarded as read on this hearing, and they do not call for any modification of the present conclusion reached.

This brings us to the important practical question, What order ought the court to have made on the hearing of defendant's motions to dissolve the injunction? It should have dealt with the case as though the rights of the parties should be finally held to be such as they have been herein shown provisionally to be,—that is to say, defendant Joseph T. Jones should be regarded as the owner in fee of three undivided tenth parts of the land in controversy, and of the freehold in the residue during the life of the plaintiff Eliza Williamson, with a vested remainder in fee simple to the sisters, etc., of Eliza Williamson in the said remaining seven undivided tenth parts, according to and under the will of David Hickman, deceased; that defendant Jones is rightfully in possession according to his rights and the rights of his co-owners in the inheritance, with the right to extract and sell the oil, provided he does not take more than his share, as it appears that he has already occupied the whole property with oil wells to about its full profitable capacity. Such shares might be three tenths of the net proceeds,—that is, after deducting all expenses incident to the working, and making a proper allowance, if any, for what he may be entitled to as the owner of said life estate formerly owned by Eliza Williamson; but until the final hearing let defendant Jones be charged with seven tenths of the customary royalty in the Sistersville oil field before it was developed, say one eighth of the oil produced, as such customary royalty, delivered into the pipe line; and the order of the 25th day of August, 1893, should be modified accordingly,—that is to say, instead of causing all the product of the wells or the proceeds of its sale to go into the hands of the special receivers, cause them to take control of seven tenths of said royalty, to be sold, etc., and proceeds held to await the final decree of the court, so as to leave to defendant Jones as far as possible, consistently with the right of his co-owners, full possession and control of what has been provisionally determined to be his own; he being shown to be solvent and responsible, and an energetic, experienced, and skillful oil operator; and it being to the interest of all that the wells be kept in operation under skillful and prudent management. And the cause is remanded, with directions to the Circuit Court of Tyler County to so modify its orders in the cause as to make them conform to and carry out, as near as may be, the views herein expressed, and directions here given, until this cause shall be finally heard.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

NOBLE & WARE, Appts.,
v.

S. M. MITCHELL.

(.....Ala.....)

1. A statute making one acting for an unlicensed foreign company, corporation, association, or partnership transacting insurance business in the state personally liable for the amount of the policy and imposing a penalty upon him inseparable and valid, so far as it applies to the agents of corporations.

2. Compliance with the terms of the policy as to proofs of loss and time for bringing suit is not necessary to authorize re-

NOTE.—Restrictions on insurance by unincorporated associations or individuals: "Lloyds" associations.

The business of insurance is so generally conducted by corporations that the question of the right of unincorporated associations or individuals to make contracts as insurers has been but little raised. In the main case, NOBLE v. MITCHELL, the court considers the association by which the insurance was made to be in fact a corporation, and decides the case on that basis. The question suggested therein as to the constitutionality of a statute which should exclude citizens of other states from carrying on, either as individuals or unincorporated associations, the business of insurance without also restricting citizens of the state in the same way is therefore not decided, but the decision could hardly be doubtful.

The unconstitutionality of discriminations against citizens of other states is illustrated in numerous particulars in the note to Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 14 L. R. A. 579, and the authorities there presented seem to be conclusive against the validity of any statute which should discriminate between citizens of the state and those of other states in respect to the privilege of carrying on insurance business, either as individuals or as unincorporated associations of individuals.

A guaranty and accident Lloyds association, although unincorporated, was ousted from doing business in Ohio by the decision in State v. Ackerman, 24 L. R. A. 298, 51 Ohio St. —, but this was done on the theory that the association was attempting to act as a corporation contrary to the statutes of the state. The Ohio statutes made it unlawful for any "company, corporation, or association," whether organized in the state or elsewhere, to carry on the business of insurance without complying with the statutory provisions, and as the court regarded the character of this Lloyds association as such that it was within the purview of the statute authorizing an action in quo warranto "against an association of persons who act as a corporation" without being legally incorporated, no discussion of the question of discrimination against partnerships or associations, which were not in fact assuming to act as a corporation, was made.

In Illinois it was held in Greene v. People (Ill.) May 18, 1889, that an association of persons who, without becoming incorporated, engaged in the business of insurance and attempted to limit their individual liability to the amount they contribute, and assume to give perpetuity to the business by assignability of membership certificates, is acting as a corporation and may be ousted from such usurpation of a franchise by a proceeding in quo warranto. This association is not shown in the report to have been organized in any other state, but in other respects, so far as the facts appear, it would seem to be almost identical with the Lloyds association involved in the Ohio case of State v. Ackerman, supra. The nature of the association is substantially the same in both cases, even if the same association is not actually involved in both cases.

covery under a statute making an agent acting for an unlicensed foreign company personally liable for the amount of loss.

3. The fact that insurance solicitors placed a risk through brokers in another state without knowing what company took it will not relieve them from liability under the provisions of a statute authorizing recovery of the loss from persons who act as agents of unlicensed foreign companies.

4. An unwarranted statement by counsel in argument as to the effect of evidence in the case will not cause reversal, if it was made with reference to an immaterial issue in the case.

(December 21, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Montgomery County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to render defendants liable upon a policy of insurance procured through them of a company which was not licensed to do business in the state. Affirmed.

The action was to recover $1,000. The complaint alleged that plaintiff received from the defendants, who were engaged in a general insurance business in the city of Montgomery, an insurance policy purporting to have been issued by the Fairmount Insurance Association of Philadelphia, Pa., the policy contracting to insure plaintiff, a merchant, from loss by fire of his goods, wares, and merchandise to the amount of $1,000. Shortly after the receipt of the policy, plaintiff forwarded to the defendants a draft for the premium, and that during the period covered by the policy, the insured property was destroyed. That the Fairmount Insurance Association is a corporation not incorporated under the laws of Alabama, and had procured no license to do business in that state during the time covered by the policy. Defendants demurred: First, because it did not appear that defendants at any time acted as agents for the Fairmount Insurance Association. Second, it did not appear that defendants were in any manner parties to the policy. Third, it did not appear that defendants acted as agents for the Fairmount Insurance Company in respect to the policy sued on. Fourth, it did not appear that defendants, or either of them, had undertaken or promised to pay to the plaintiff the amount of the policy. The demurrer was overruled.

The evidence tended to show that plaintiff authorized defendants to procure $1,000 of

In the case of STATE v. STONE (Mo.) post, 243, the statutes of Missouri made the business of insurance unlawful until the "individual, association of individuals, or corporation" has been duly authorized by the insurance department. There was no discrimination against individuals of other states. This was also the case of what is called a Lloyds association composed of about 100 members, whose method of doing business is described with much detail in State v. Ackerman, 24 L. R. A. 236, 51 Ohio St. —.

The Missouri statute is clearly comprehensive enough to include an unincorporated association in its provisions. But in several state such associations have been held to be outside of the scope of the statutes regulating insurance.

Thus in Georgia, where the statutes by its terms was explicitly made to regulate insurance companies "incorporated by the laws of this or any other state or foreign country," it was held in the case of Fort v. State (Ga.) 23 L. R. A. 88, that a guaranty and accident Lloyds association, being a voluntary unincorporated association consisting of 100 natural persons, had a right to do business in the state unaffected by such statute. At least the provision making it an offense to act as agent for a foreign corporation did not apply to an agency for this association. But the court says: "It is safe to assume that the legislature overlooked the possibility that an unincorporated association would undertake to do insurance business."

Similar to this decision is that in Com. v. Reinohl, post 247, in which the supreme court of Pennsylvania decides that the words "insurance company" in the Pennsylvania statutes regulating the business of insurance and making it a misdemeanor to act as agent of any unauthorized insurance company of any other state or government, have no application to a guaranty and accident Lloyds association.

The Pennsylvania and Georgia cases assume that the Lloyds association involved is to be considered a voluntary or unincorporated association, and do not discuss its character in this respect.

A Michigan statute declaring that "it should not be lawful to act as agent for any company, association, or individual not incorporated in this state" was mentioned in the case of Clay Fire & Marine 25 L. R. A.

Ins. Co. v. Huron Salt & Lumber Mfg. Co., 31 Mich. 348, and the court says: "The law applies to operations within the state and against the representatives of foreign incorporated and unincorporated interests and of domestic unincorporated ones," —but it does not appear that any question about unincorporated associations was actually involved in the case.

In Union Ins. Co. v. Smart, 60 N. H. 453, insurance by an unincorporated company of another state was held to be within the prohibition of the New Hampshire statute, but as there was an express provision that the insurance should be valid, although prohibited, it was held that the premium note was also valid. No question in this case as to the constitutionality of the statute or of any provision discriminating against nonresident individuals was raised or decided.

The question whether or not individuals can be prohibited from engaging in insurance business and the whole business confined to corporations is one that has been raised in at least one case. In Com. v. VROOMAN, post, 250, rev'g 3 Pa. Dist. Rep. 340, the supreme court of Pennsylvania against the dissent of three judges decides that a statute prohibiting insurance against fire or lightning by unincorporated persons, associations, or partnerships is not an unconstitutional abridgment of the right of citizens to make contracts, although no discrimination is made against nonresidents or citizens of other states. The case of Arrott v. Walker, 118 Pa. 249, held a broker's contract for insurance void under such a statute, but without touching the question of the constitutionality of the statute.

It is clear that in the absence of any statutory restrictions the business of insuring may be carried on by individuals. The constitutionality of a statute prohibiting such business by individuals and giving it entirely to corporations, which has been upheld against strong dissent in the single case in which it appears to have been questioned (see Com. v. Vrooman, supra), is by no means free from difficulty and is subject to substantially the same reasons for and against it that apply to statutes prohibiting private banking, as to which see State v. Scougal (S. Dak.) 15 L. R. A. 477, and note.

insurance on his goods; that he received a policy through the mail from them issued by the Fairmount Insurance Association, and forwarded to defendants a check for the premium; that the association was not licensed to do business in the state. Defendant's testimony tended to show that they secured for plaintiff a policy in the New Haven Security Company, and that shortly after the receipt of the policy plaintiff sent them through the mail a check for the premium; that when the New Haven company was informed of the issuance of the policy it instructed defendants to cancel it, which instruction was obeyed, and thereupon, at plaintiff's request, they undertook to place the insurance with some other company. That they notified plaintiff that they could not get insurance at Montgomery, but would endeavor to do so in Chicago.

The trial court, among other things, charged the court as follows:

"The plaintiff sued to recover of the defendants 1,000, because he says that the defendants were agents of the Fairmount Insurance Company, a foreign corporation, who did business in this state without having first procured a license as the law requires. Now, a foreign corporation, and any corporation not incorporated under the laws of this state is a foreign corporation within the meaning of this section of the statutes, which requires, before it does business in the state, to procure a license from the auditor of the state; otherwise, its contracts are illegal and void, if the parties seek to take advantage of it; and in addition to that a penalty is imposed upon any person who acts as agent of said company. Now, this agency may arise in either one of two ways. One is where the person acting as agent is such in point of fact, under the rules which usually constitute one person the agent of another. The other way in which he can become an agent is by doing either one of the acts which the statute, imposing a penalty for, says if he does he becomes liable as an agent. Now, this statute says if the defendant transmits a policy of insurance, or a premium of insurance, that he is an agent, although in point of fact he has no connection with the company. So the question under this complaint here for you to decide is whether the defendants in this case transmitted to the plaintiff a policy of insurance of the Fairmount Association of Philadelphia. That is what the plaintiff alleges defendants did. Now, is that true? You are to decide that question in the light of all the evidence, as persons of common sense, using your everyday experience, and see what the evidence establishes. Now, does it establish the proposition that the defendants transmitted to this plaintiff a policy of insurance of the Fairmount Association, or for the Fairmount Association? If they did this, then they are liable therefor for loss, if any was sustained. Further, you must decide as to the amount of loss (and there is no controversy that this store was burned), and that the amount of injury resulting was as much as $1,000. Plaintiff cannot recover more than a thousand dollars, but anything under that. Now, what would constitute a transmitting of the policy by the defendants to the plaintiff? Now, under this statute, I instruct you that if you find from the testimony, and are reasonably satisfied that it is true, that the defendants received of the plaintiff $32.50, and that he requested them to place insurance for him, and they sent the money to brokers in Chicago for the purpose of having such brokers effect insurance for the plaintiff, and such brokers did effect insurance in the Fairmount Company, and the Fairmount Company sent a policy of insurance directly to the plaintiff, or sent it to the brokers in Chicago and they sent it to the plaintiff, or it was transmitted to the defendants here, and they sent it to the plaintiff, that would be a transmitting of the policy of insurance by the defendants, because the defendants could not escape liability under this statute by sending a premium of insurance to Chicago brokers there, and having those brokers procure insurance and transmit the policy to the plaintiff, although they did not know at the time they sent the money, and did not give directions as to what company the insurance should be placed at. This is a new statute, so far as enforcing it is concerned, and I was inclined to think that it was necessary that the defendants should be placed in the same position as if the company itself were sued, and that the plaintiff would have to make proof of loss and bring suit in the time specified. I have examined it more carefully, in connection with some other cases, and my conclusion is that it is not necessary, and that when the defendants violated the statute by becoming the agents of a foreign insurance company without license to do business in this state, that it was a duty devolving upon them to pay the amount of loss sustained by the plaintiff, and that loss is the amount of the policy, and that it is not necessary for the plaintiff to make proof of it in order to recover against the defendant. This is my charge. So what I have stated to you, I give you as the law of the case. If you find from the testimony, and are reasonably satisfied with its truth, that the defendants received $32.50, and that they were to procure insurance for the plaintiff, and they, in pursuance thereof, sent the money to brokers in Chicago with directions to effect insurance, and the brokers did effect insurance and transmit the policy, either directly or indirectly, to the plaintiff, or to the defendants here, and the policy went into the hands of the plaintiff, that that would be a transmitting of the policy within the meaning of this statute."

The theory of the case held by defendants is shown by the following requests to charge which were all refused: (1) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendants were not the agents of the Fairmount Insurance Company, and that they never received a premium as such agents, and they never remitted any such premium to said company, or to any one with directions to procure a policy in said company, then the plaintiff cannot recover." (2) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the premium received by the defendants was the premium on another and different policy, and that it was sent to Chicago, at the request of plaintiff, to brokers, to be invested in insurance by them, and if they further believe from the evidence that said brokers secured the policy of the Fairmount Insurance Company without the knowledge, direction, or consent of said defendants that it would be invested in a policy in that particular company, then the jury must find for defendants." (8) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff requested the defendants to send $32.50 to brokers in Chicago to pay a premium on a policy of insurance; and if they further believe from the evidence that the defendants gave no instructions to said brokers as to the company in which they should procure the policy; and if they further believe that said premium was invested in payment of a premium to the Fairmount Insurance Company on the policy in evidence, and that such payment was made without authority or direction from defendants; and if the jury further believe from the evidence that said policy in evidence was never received by defendants, or delivered by them or their direction,—then the plaintiff cannot recover, and the verdict must be for defendants." (9) "The fact that the defendants transmitted $32.50 to Elsworth & Co., Chicago brokers, being the amount necessary to procure an insurance policy, does not, without more, make the defendants the agents of the Fairmount Insurance Association of Philadelphia, unless the jury believe from the evidence that the premium of insurance was remitted, either by themselves or by another with their knowledge and consent, to the Fairmount Insurance Company to procure the policy of insurance offered in evidence. The jury are not authorized to hold, without more, that the defendants are the agents of the Fairmount Insurance Association of Philadelphia."

Messrs. A. A. Wiley and J. M. Chilton for appellants.

Mr. Charles Wilkerson for appellee.

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was instituted by appellee to recover a loss covered by a policy of fire insurance, and arose under section 1206 of the Code of 1886. It is contended by the defendants that the act is unconstitutional, and that this is apparent when section 1206 is considered and construed in connection with sections 1205 and 1207. These three sections are as follows: Section 1205: "Any person, who solicits insurance on behalf of an insurance company, not incorporated by the laws of this state, or who, other than for himself, takes or transmits an application for insurance, a premium of insurance, or a policy of insurance to or from such company, or in any way gives notice that he will receive or transmit the same, or receives or delivers a policy of insurance of such company, or who inspects any risk, or makes or forwards a diagram of any building, or does any other thing in the making of a contract of insurance, for or with such company, other than for himself, or examines into, adjusts, or aids in examining into or adjusting any loss for such company, whether such acts are done at the instance of such company, or any broker, or other person, shall be held to be the agent of the company for which the act is done, and such company held to be doing business in this state." Section 1206: "Any person, acting as agent of any foreign insurance company which has not received the license from the auditor provided for, or shall so act after its expiration, is liable personally to the holder of any policy of insurance in respect to which he so acted as agent, for any loss covered by it; and shall forfeit, for each offense, the sum of five hundred dollars, to be sued for in the circuit court where the delinquency occurs, by the solicitor, in the name of the state, and paid into the state treasury, less twenty per cent retained by the solicitor for his services." Section 1207: "The term 'insurance company,' as used in this article, includes every company, corporation, association, or partnership, organized for the purpose of transacting the business of insurance."

The Virginia statute, construed in the case of Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357, provided "that no insurance company, not incorporated under the laws of the state, should carry on its business within the state without previously obtaining a license for that purpose," etc. This statute was construed as applicable to foreign corporations, and it was held to be constitutional. Section 1205 of the Code is: "Any person, who solicits insurance on behalf of an insurance company not incorporated by the laws of this state," etc. If section 1205 of the Code, supra, stood alone, we could put no other construction upon the words, "an insurance company not incorporated by the laws of this state," than as having reference only to foreign corporations; and so, if necessary to sustain the constitutionality of section 1206, supra, we would hold that the term "foreign insurance company," as there used, referred only to foreign corporations, resting this construction upon the principle that, when a statute is assailed upon constitutional grounds, it is the duty of the court to adopt, if the statute will admit of it, such a construction as will bring it within the constitutional power of the legislature (Wilburn v. McCauley, 68 Ala. 486), but, when construed in pari passu with sections 1201 and 1205, and other provisions appearing in the same article of the Code as section 1207, it would appear that such was clearly the legislative intention. It is well settled that the legislature of the state has authority to exclude foreign corporations altogether, and may impose any restrictions it may deem proper as a condition upon which foreign corporations may do business in the state. Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 181, 19 L. ed. 360; Ware v. Hamilton, Brown Shoe Co. 92 Ala. 149; Nelms v. Edinburg American Land Mortg. Co. Id. 160, 161. It is contended, however, that by section 1207 of the Code, supra, these provisions of the law are made to include "associations" and "partnerships," as well as "corporations," and in this respect discriminate against citizens of another state who may compose such "partnerships," and in this respect is violative of the constitutional provision which declares that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." U. S. Const. art. 4, § 2. We construe section 1207 as amendatory of the sections to which it refers, so as to substitute the words "corporation, association, or partnership," for the words "insurance company." Thus construed, section 1205, supra, would read as follows: "Any person who solicits insurance on behalf of a corporation, association, or partnership not incorporated by the laws of this state," etc.; and section 1206, supra, would read: "Any person acting as agent of any foreign corporation, association, or partnership which has," etc. By holding that section 1207 is amendatory of the other sections referred to in the manner declared, sections 1205 and 1206 are separable in their provisions, and, so far as they are made to apply to and are enforced against "foreign corporations," they do not contravene any provision of the state constitution or the Constitution of the United States. Paul v. Virginia, supra; Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S. 678, 80 L. ed. 760; South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Morris, 65 Ala. 193; McCreary v. State, 78 Ala. 480; Powell v. State, 69 Ala. 10; Vines v. State, 67 Ala. 73.

The construction of the statute is one of difficulty, and the one given to it is not altogether satisfactory; but we are of opinion the language used in section 1207, considered in connection with other sections to which it refers, admits of the interpretation given to it, and when the statute is attacked upon constitutional grounds it is our duty to avoid such a construction, if it can be done consistently, as will defeat the entire legislation of the state upon questions embraced in these statutes relating to insurance companies.

We are of opinion that plaintiff was not required, in order to maintain his action under section 1206, supra, to comply with the provision of the policy, in the matter of making proof of the loss and forwarding the same to the insurance company within sixty days, or the other provision that no suit should be begun within ninety days, and like provisions contained in the policy, which the policy required to be complied with before the institution of a suit against the company itself. The right of action is given against the agent who acts as such for a foreign insurance company which has not received a license from the auditor. It is the acting as agent for such a company that constitutes the "offense" which is the foundation of the suit. The recovery is limited to the loss sustained covered by the policy. The amount which may be recovered does not affect the right of action. It is the "offense" which forfeits to the state $500, and not the failure to observe the stipulations contained in the policy of insurance. We think there was some evidence tending to show the Fairmount Association of Philadelphia was a foreign corporation. It is fully proven that the policy was procured through brokers living in Chicago, and that it was sent to plaintiff by mail. The policy itself bears on its face evidence tending to show it was chartered under the laws of Pennsylvania. Its heading is, "The Fairmount Insurance Association of Philadelphia, Pa." The proofs of loss were to be "received at the office of the association in Philadelphia, state of Penn." Other provisions were subject to the orders of the "directors, . . . pursuant to its charter and by-laws, and the laws of the state of Pennsylvania." It was "signed by its president and attested by its secretary at the city of Philadelphia, Penn."

It is further contended by the defendant that there is no evidence to show they acted as agents for the Fairmount Insurance Association. We do not think this contention maintainable. Stated broadly and favorably for the defendants, the facts are that the defendants themselves had no correspondence whatever with the insurance company, had no information that the Fairmount Association Insurance Company had issued to plaintiff a policy, and did not in fact know there was such an insurance company in existence. We give the defendant the benefit of this extreme statement of the facts. On the other hand, the plaintiff received and held through some agency an insurance contract in this insurance company. He had no correspondence with the insurance company, and had no transaction with any other person, directly or indirectly, than the defendants in the procurement of the policy. The defendants solicited from the plaintiff an order to place an insurance risk, and the plaintiff authorized them to place a risk for $1,000 in some good company on his stock of goods. Not being able to place the risk in Montgomery, the defendants requested an insurance broker in Chicago generally to place the risk. This broker had the policy in question executed and forwarded to the plaintiff. The plaintiff had no notice or information of the correspondence between the defendants and the Chicago broker, or of that of the Chicago broker with the insurance company. The plaintiff sent his check, payable to the defendants, to pay the premium on a policy. The policy bears date of September 25, 1890, and the check for the premium bears date October 13, 1890. This check was cashed to the defendants upon presentation to the drawee, and, as they testify, the proceeds were remitted by them to the broker in Chicago. The first policy obtained was canceled before the application was made to the Fairmount Association Insurance Company, and necessarily before the latter policy was received by plaintiff. When defendants received and retained plaintiff's check for the premium, they knew, necessarily, that the money received by them could not be applied to the canceled policy, and when they remitted the premium to Chicago, they knew it was not for a policy already canceled by them. Certainly, the facts of the defendants, if believed by the jury, are sufficient to constitute them agents within the sweeping provisions of section 1205 of the Code, supra. The acts of the Legislature of 1879 (page 26) and of 1884 (sections 16, 17, pp. 19, 20), codified as section 1205, supra, fixed a penalty, and by the latter act, in addition to the penalty, a personal liability upon any person who did any of the acts therein specified for such an insurance company, and we do not doubt that it was the intention of the legislature to subject such a person or agent to the liabilities provided in section 1206, under which the present action was brought. The construction given to the statute by the court, in its instructions to the jury, accords with these conclusions. The charges requested by the defendants were properly refused. The propositions of law contained in them either asserted a contrary doctrine, or were abstract, or argumentative and misleading.

The bill of exceptions states that, in the concluding argument of plaintiff's counsel to the jury, he stated "that the evidence showed that defendants had taken $32.50 from plaintiff and insured him in an insolvent company." The defendants objected to this statement of counsel, and moved the court to exclude it from the jury. This question is presented in a somewhat different form from that heretofore considered. It will be seen that the statement is "that the evidence showed," etc. This was not the assertion of a fact as being within the knowledge of counsel, outside of and without reference to the evidence. Where counsel honestly differ as to the facts in evidence, or are honestly mistaken as to correct inference from proven facts, there is not that transgression of the limits of legitimate argument which will cause a reversal of the case. While we think the statement was not warranted by the evidence, and its tendency may have been to prejudice the defendants before the jury, the fact itself, whether true or false, could have no material bearing on the issue. The real issues were whether the company was a foreign corporation doing an insurance business without a license, and whether the defendants acted as agents within the provisions of the statute. The solvency or insolvency of the corporation could exert no influence on these issues, and the verdict should have been the same in either event. Cross v. State, 68 Ala. 476; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr, 91 Ala. 548. Affirmed.

Percy STONE, App't.,

(118 Mo. 388.)

1. Provisions of a statute imposing a penalty upon one who acts as insurance agent for a principal who has not required a certificate of permission to transact business should not be disregarded so far as they are made to apply to agents of individuals, because the statutes requiring a certificate and regulating the procedure for procuring it apply only to "companies" if such statutes are made by subsequent ones applicable to individuals and all their essential provisions can be complied with by individuals.
2. A penal statute should not be construed strictly for the mere purpose of defeating it when its intent is plain.
3. Persons seeking to transact insurance business may be subjected by the state to reasonable regulations.

Burgess, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit begun upon an information based upon an affidavit made on April 25, 1893, by C. P. Ellerbe, the then superintendent of the insurance department of the state of Missouri, in which information the defendant is charged with the violation of the second clause of section 5916, Rev. Stat. 1889, by representing, as agent, certain individuals, and writing for them a policy of insurance, by the terms of which they agreed to indemnify one Emmitt Thoroughman against accident, before said individuals had procured a license to do business in Missouri. The defendant was arrested upon a warrant, was arraigned and pleaded not guilty, and upon the hearing of the evidence was fined $10 and costs. After a motion for a new trial was overruled, and also a motion in arrest, defendant brings the case here by appeal.

The evidence showed that the parties whom defendant represented in procuring this insurance were 100 in number, residing in the state of New York, who were conducting insurance upon the manner of the ancient Lloyds; that they individually signed a power of attorney authorizing certain parties to write insurance for them individually, and that each policy written was in case of loss to be a charge against them individually, and not jointly, in a sum equal to one-hundredth of the amount of the liability incurred. By the terms of the agreement each individual agrees to deposit with an advisory committee the sum of $1,000, which is to be held for the individual account of such subscriber, and which is to be credited or debited, in case of gain or loss, as an individual account. The "insurance" to be effected for and on behalf of each of the individual subscribers hereto shall be in charge of certain parties "as attorneys in fact of each subscriber hereto." "The attorneys shall keep separate accounts for each of the subscribers to this agreement, and each subscriber shall at all times have access to his individual account." An advisory committee is provided for, who "shall cause to be made up, on the 31st of December in each year, all the accounts of the several subscribers hereto."

"The several subscribers, in case the year's business was profitable, are then to receive such part of the profits credited to their individual accounts as the advisory committee shall determine, and are to receive a certificate for the balance. In case the accounts show that there has been a loss, then each subscriber is to make his individual account good. Any subscriber may withdraw by giving thirty days' notice, and the advisory committee may, if it is deemed advisable, compel the attorneys to cease acting for any particular individual. In certain conditions a member may assign his individual holding and liability to any other individual, if approved by the advisory committee. Neither of the subscribers shall be made jointly liable with the others, or with either of the others, but each subscriber shall only be made severally and separately liable to the amount authorized by him individually in the power of attorney given by him to the attorneys above mentioned; nor shall any joint liability be created on behalf of the subscribers hereto, in any manner arising out of the business to be carried on under this agreement, but only a several liability on behalf of each individual subscriber. No policy, however, shall be issued on behalf of any individual subscriber hereto, unless each of the individual subscribers insures for a like amount on said policy." There is no limit upon the liability of the several members. His whole property is liable for the payment of any liability incurred by him. The contract also provides that each one of the insurers, "in consideration of the premises and of the execution of this agreement by the others, does hereby severally agree, for himself individually, to and with the others, and with each of them, that he and his representatives and assigns will faithfully abide by and carry out his obligations and covenants hereunder." The policy written provides that "each of the subscribers hereto, as a separate underwriter, does for himself, and not one for the other, hereby insure (subject to the conditions herein) E. B. Thoroughman," etc. It further provides that in case of suit brought for loss under the policy it is to be begun against only one of the underwriters at one time a final decision to be decisive of such claim against each of the underwriters. "Each of the present subscribers, as a separate underwriter, binds himself severally, and not jointly, with any other for the true performance of the premises for the amount expressed to be insured by him."

Section 5916, Rev. Stat. 1889, under which defendant was prosecuted and convicted, reads as follows: "Any person or persons who in this state shall act as agent or solicitor for any individual, association of individuals or corporation engaged in the transaction of insurance business, without such person or persons first having obtained from the superintendent of the insurance department of this state the certificate authorizing him to act as such agent or solicitor, as required by section 5910, Rev. Stat. of this state, or shall act as agent or solicitor for any individual, association of individuals or corporation engaged in the insurance business before such individual, association of individuals or corporation shall have been duly authorized or licensed by the superintendent of the insurance department of this state to transact business in this state, or after such license has been suspended, revoked, or has expired, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined not less than ten, nor more than one hundred dollars for each offense, or imprisonment in the county or city jail for not less than ten days, nor more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment." The specific charge against defendant is that he did willfully and unlawfully act as agent and solicitor for certain individuals (whose names are set out) in inducing and procuring one Emmitt Thoroughman to enter into a contract of accident insurance with said individuals before said individuals were duly authorized or licensed to do business of insurance. It is conceded by counsel for defendant that he was an insurance agent, and that he was acting as such at the time charged in the information, as that term is used and defined by section 5916, Rev. Stat., supra.

It may be conceded, as is contended by counsel for defendant, that the office of insurance superintendent is one created by statute, and that he can only grant a license to such persons as the statute designates, and a license issued by him to any other would be null and void. People v. Davis, 45 Barb. 494; State v. Hill, 53 N. J. L. 826; McGee v. Beall, 68 Miss. 455. And that, as a general thing, "association of individuals," as used in our statute, is synonymous with corporations, or applies to joint-stock companies having a capital stock divided into shares, and governed by articles of association which describe their objects, and in which the members assume the liability of partners to the creditors of the company, is also well settled law. Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 504. But the word "company" sometimes includes individuals as well as corporations (Chicago Dock Canal Co. v. Garrity, 115 Ill. 155), depending on the sense in which it is used, and the intent of the lawmaking power. The use of the word "company" in section 5910, Rev. Stat. 1889, which provides that "no company shall transact in this state any insurance business unless it shall first procure from the superintendent of insurance department of this state a certificate stating that the requirements of the insurance laws of the state have been complied with, authorizing it to do business," we have no doubt was simply because the business of insurance in this state is almost all done by incorporated companies. It should be read in connection with the following section, and as including both companies and associations of individuals. The letter of the section must yield to the evident intent of the legislature as deduced from the whole act in regard to insurance taken together, giving due consideration to the object of the act, and the fact that it is intended to regulate the entire system of insurance within the state. Perry County v. Jefferson County, 94 Ill. 214; St. Louis, J. & O. R. Co. v. Trustees Institute for the Blind, 48 Ill. 808. Section 5793, Rev. Stat. 1889, provides that "the insurance department shall be charged with the execution of all laws now in force, or which may be hereafter enacted, in relation to insurance and insurance companies doing business in this state." Section 5801 provides that it shall be the duty of the superintendent of the insurance department "to file in his office and safely keep all books and papers required by law to be filed therein, to issue certificates of authority to transact business in this state to any companies who have fully complied with the laws of this state in the organization of insurance companies, and the transaction of the business of insurance," etc. Section 5803 makes it his duty to furnish to every insurance company doing business in this state blanks on which to make its annual report, while section 5805 provides for an examination by the commissioner of an insurance company incorporated or doing business in this state, and section 5807 provides for the payment of certain fees to be paid by such insurance companies. The whole of article 2, chapter 89, Rev. Stat. 1889, in regard to life and accident insurance, uses the words "company" or "corporation," and in no place does it make use of the word "individual;" and, if taken by itself, it must be conceded that the various provisions herein contained relate to incorporated companies doing an insurance business in this state, and not to individuals or an unincorporated association of individuals. The first section of article 5 of the same chapter, being section 5910 of the Revised Statutes of 1889, is an old section brought down from the Revised Statutes of 1879, and, standing alone, it also relates to and contemplates incorporated companies, and not individuals or an unincorporated association of individuals. But the next section, as amended and carried into the Revised Statutes of 1889, provides that "no individual or association of individuals, under any style or name, shall be permitted to do the business mentioned in this chapter within the state of Missouri unless he or they shall first fully comply with all the provisions of the law of this state governing the law of insurance." This section in express terms makes the provisions of article 2 applicable to an individual or an association of individuals doing an insurance business. The argument that section 5916, upon which this information is founded, should be disregarded, so far as it applies to a person or an unincorporated association of persons, because the law points out no method by which a person or such an association can procure a certificate to do business, is not well taken. The argument is based upon a false assumption, for according to section 5911 an individual or such an association of individuals may, and indeed must, first comply with the laws governing the business of insurance, meaning, in case of life and accident insurance, the provisions of article 2. It is true that some of the provisions of that article can have no application to an individual doing insurance business, as, for instance, those relating to the organization of insurance corporations; and in other instances designated officers of the insurance corporations are required to do certain things. All these things can be done by the individual or the association of individuals proposing to do an insurance business. There is no difficulty whatever in this respect, and the individual or association proposing to do an insurance business can make the required deposits, and do the other things necessary to procure a certificate to do such business.

The evident intent of the legislature, as shown by the sections of the statute quoted, was to regulate and systematize the business of insurance in this state, and that it was never its purpose to require strict observance of its statutory behests by corporations and companies doing business in this state, and to require nothing whatever of individuals engaged in the same business. On the contrary, it is manifest that the intent was to require of them the same compliance with the law that is required of corporations and companies; and if we are correct in this position, while conceding that the offense with which the defendant is charged is penal in its nature, and that in such case a strict construction of the statute is required, as is held in Com. v. Carroll, 8 Mass. 490; State v. Brady, 9 Humph. 74; Hamuel v. State, 5 Mo. 260; and Bishop, Statutory Crimes, § 220,—yet it is not proper or reasonable to construe it strictly for the mere purpose of defeating it when the intent is plain as in this case. Whether the state has a right to say to an individual or a company of individuals, other than a corporation, that they or it cannot engage in two or more kinds of business, is unnecessary to pass upon in this case, as there is no such question involved in this controversy; nor is the right of the citizen abridged by requiring of him the same duties, and the compliance with the provisions of the statute that are required of a company, composed, as they are, of individuals, engaged in the same business. If, then, we are correct in our position in construing the statute as including and meaning individuals, there is no apparent reason why defendant could not have obtained from and why the insurance commissioner could not have issued to him a valid certificate, under sections 5910 and 5911 of the statute, if defendant had shown to him that those whom he represents had complied with the law in regard to insurance companies doing business in this state.

A further contention on the part of defendant is that the state has no right to regulate the business of insurance as conducted by individuals. That the state may impose conditions on corporations doing business in this state that it cannot impose on an individual is well settled, because they are creatures of the law, and have no power or authority to transact any kind of business save and except that authorized by their charters and the statutes under which they are organized. Boone, Corp. § 83; Home Ins. Co. of New York v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 445, 22 L. ed. 365; Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. of New York, 94 U. S. 535, 24 L. ed. 148; American Union Exp. Co. v. St. Joseph, 66 Mo. 675, 27 Am. Rep. 382; Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, p. 281.

But, while this is true, it is also true that the state has, by virtue of its sovereign power, the right to regulate all trades, callings, and professions, but it cannot discriminate between citizens of equal standing and merit. There is no pretense that there is any discrimination in the case at bar between citizens of this or any other state. That the state also has the power to require corporations, companies, and individuals who propose to engage in the insurance business to make deposit with the insurance commissioners of a reasonable amount of money or securities to secure their policy holders against loss, seems but reasonable and just. We do not contend that it would have the right to exact a deposit of exorbitant or unreasonable amounts, the effect of which would be to prevent individuals, as well as companies, from engaging in such business. But the statute in this regard we think not unreasonable, and could have no such an effect. As has been said, section 5911 expressly includes individuals, and subjects them to the same provisions as companies and corporations. Section 5916, under which defendant was convicted, prohibits any one from acting as agent or solicitor for any individual, association of individuals, or corporation in the transaction of insurance business, without such person or persons having first obtained from the superintendent of the insurance department a certificate authorizing him to act as such agent or solicitor, or before such individual, association of individuals, or corporation shall have been duly authorized and licensed by the superintendent of the insurance department to transact business in this state. A violation of this section by the agent or solicitor subjects the offender, upon conviction, to a fine, imprisonment in the county jail, or both. In a recent opinion delivered by the supreme court of Kansas (State v. Phipps, 50 Kan. 609, 18 L. R. A. 657, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 299), the court says: "It is probable that at this writing every state in the Union has passed laws upon this subject, until it may be said that the right of state regulation of the business of insurance is universally recognized and upheld. . . . The state has power to regulate and control, and to provide penalties for the transgression of its regulating and controlling statutes. If the theory of counsel for appellants ever ripens into authoritative judicial decision, the power of the state to regulate and control the business of insurance within its limits is gone." In Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357, the statute of Virginia required that every insurance company not incorporated by that state should, as a condition of carrying on its business there, deposit securities with the state treasurer and obtain a license, and another statute made it a criminal offense for a person to act in Virginia as agent for an insurance company not incorporated by Virginia without such license. Paul, the defendant, acted as agent without a license, and was convicted and fined. The case therefore arose out of an attempt on the part of Virginia to enforce its penal laws for the regulation of the business of insurance within its borders. The court held that such a statute violated no provision of the constitution of the United States, and affirmed the judgment of conviction. To a like effect are Ducat v. Chicago, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972; Liverpool & L. L. & F. Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 566, 19 L. ed. 1029. To allow the defendant to carry on the business of an insurance agent under the circumstances as developed in this case, without complying with the law in regard to insurance, would be simply licensing him, and those whom he represents, to evade the law, while companies and corporations engaged in the same business have complied therewith. If he, and those whom he represents, desire to engage in such business, they should comply with the law, and, while deriving benefits from such business, bear the burdens imposed upon it by statute.

"Gentlemen of the Jury: The defendant in this case, Augustus F. Reinöhl, is charged in the indictment with having unlawfully transacted business within the commonwealth of Pennsylvania as the agent of the Guarantee and Accident Lloyds, New York, an insurance company of the state of New York, without a certificate of authority, as required by the laws of the state of Pennsylvania, and without such authority of law did negotiate contracts of insurance, as agent of the said Guarantee and Accident Lloyds, New York, an insurance company of the state of New York, with Benjamin E. Radcliff and others, and did issue or cause to be issued to said Benjamin E. Radcliff, within the county of Lancaster and state of Pennsylvania, a policy of insurance for five thousand dollars, dated June 5th, 1893, in said Guarantee and Accident Lloyds, New York, and to others within the county of Lancaster and state of Pennsylvania.

"The defendant is indicted under the 47th section of an Act of Assembly passed the 1st day of May, 1876, which reads as follows:

"Any person transacting business within this commonwealth, as the agent of an insurance company of any other state or government, without a certificate of authority, as required by the act to which this is a supplement, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be sentenced to pay a fine of five hundred dollars."

"[The evidence offered before you on the part of the commonwealth is uncontradicted. The defense made here by the defendant is that this insurance company is not an incorporated company, and, therefore, does not come within the purview of the act of assembly which I have just read. I charge you that is not necessary. The act of assembly does not say it should be an incorporated company, and, therefore, if you believe this testimony, which is uncontradicted, your verdict should be in favor of the commonwealth, if guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted]. If we are wrong in our judgment in this matter, the counsel for the defendant may make a motion in arrest of judgment which can be heard by the court in full bench. It is a new question, and the counsel are desirous of having the question passed upon by the supreme court. The question of fact is for you."

The Commonwealth asked the court to charge the jury:

"The uncontradicted evidence shows that the defendant, A. F. Reinöhl, did, on or about June 1st, 1893, within the jurisdiction of this court, unlawfully transact business within the commonwealth of Pennsylvania as the agent of the Guarantee and Accident Lloyds, New York, an insurance company in the state of New York, without a certificate of authority, as required by the laws of the state of Pennsylvania, and then and there, without such authority of law, did negotiate contracts of insurance, as agent of the said Guarantee and Accident Lloyds, New York, an insurance company of the state of New York, with Benjamin E. Radcliff, and did issue to him a policy of insurance in said company, and the verdict of the jury must be, guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted." Affirmed.

The defendant asked the court to charge the jury as follows:

1. "That the testimony of the commonwealth has failed to show that the defendant was acting as the agent of an insurance company of any other state or government without a certificate of authority, as required by the act, to which the Act of May 1, 1876, is a supplement, and that the commonwealth has utterly failed to show that the policy upon which this complaint is based was issued by a company or corporation either of this or any other state, and that the verdict of the jury should be a verdict of not guilty." Refused.

2. "That the 47th section of Act of May 1, 1876, entitled a supplement to 'an act to establish an insurance department, approved April 4, 1873, providing for the incorporation and regulation of insurance companies and relating to insurance agents and brokers, and to foreign insurance companies,' which section reads as follows: 'Any person transacting business within this commonwealth as the agent of an insurance company of any other state or government without a certificate of authority, as required by the act to which this is a supplement, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be sentenced to pay a fine of $500, is unconstitutional and contrary to section 1, article 1, of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of Pennsylvania,' which declares that 'all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain inherent and inalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, of acquiring possession and protecting property and reputation, and pursuing their own happiness.'" Refused.

3. "That section 47 of Act of May 1, 1876, as fully recited in foregoing point is unconstitutional and in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no state 'shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens in the United States, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws,' and also in violation of article 4, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which ordains 'the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states.'" Refused.

"The verdict was 'guilty' and sentence was formally passed thereon and on special allocatur an appeal to the supreme court was taken.

"The defendant assigned as error the portion of the charge included in brackets and in refusing to affirm defendant's points for charge and in admitting on behalf of the commonwealth as evidence Policy No. 86,257 of the Guarantee and Accident Lloyds of New York issued to Benjamin E. Radcliff."

Messrs. R. C. Reinisch and F. Carroll Brewster, for appellant:

The Act of May 1, 1876 (Pub. Laws, 53) did not contemplate the case of an association of individuals issuing a policy—but only related to incorporated companies.

No evidence was produced to show that the Guarantee and Accident Lloyds was an insurance company.

On the contrary the policy admitted in evidence shows that it was issued by individuals.

The subscriber is merely a separate underwriter. The insurance is by a number but the contract is that of the individual.

The conviction under the indictment is in violation of the Constitution of the United States. The defendant acted as agent of individuals and no law can punish him for exercising that right.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no question involved in the present contention except the question whether the defendant is liable to indictment and conviction under the forty-seventh section of the Act of May 1, 1876, Pub. Laws, 53. That section reads as follows: "Sec. 47. Any person transacting business within this commonwealth as the agent of an insurance company of any other state or government, without a certificate of authority, as required by the act to which this is a supplement, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be sentenced to pay a fine of five hundred dollars, but this section shall not be held to prevent the insurance commissioner from pursuing the remedies provided in the act aforesaid." The remainder of the section is unimportant. The defendant's contention on the trial was that he is not "the agent of an insurance company of any other state or government," within the meaning of the section, and that the commonwealth had entirely failed to prove that the policy upon which the complaint was based was issued by a company or corporation of this or any other state. The policy in question was undoubtedly a policy executed by 100 individual persons, and contracting for individual liability of all. The point is made in argument that, although the word "company" is used in the act, it must be held to mean "corporation" only, upon the plain reading of the act, and we think this proposition is entirely correct. The Act of 1876 is a supplement to the Act of April 4, 1873 (Pub. Laws, 20), entitled "An act to establish an insurance department," and is itself entitled as follows: "A supplement to an act entitled 'An act to establish an insurance department,' approved the fourth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, providing for the incorporation and regulation of insurance companies, and relating to insurance agents and brokers and to foreign insurance companies." The first section of the act provides "that any ten or more persons, citizens of this commonwealth, may associate in accordance with the provisions of this act and form an incorporated company for any of the following purposes," enumerating four different purposes. The second section provides that the persons associating themselves together shall do so "by articles of agreement in writing for the purpose of forming an insurance company, which agreement shall specify the name by which the corporation shall be known," etc. Then follow numerous provisions regulating the details of the organization and government of companies formed under the act, including joint-stock companies, and in which the companies formed are constantly described or referred to as "incorporated under this act." Section 34 provides that "companies incorporated under this act must be organized upon the joint stock or the mutual plan, and the power to insure upon both plans shall not exist in the corporation except temporarily," etc. Section 35: "If any corporation created under this act does not commence to issue policies within one year from the date of its letters-patent, its corporate powers and existence shall cease." Section 39: "The charters for incorporations named in this act may be perpetual or limited in time," etc. Section 40: "That no fire, marine, or fire and marine, insurance company, incorporated by any other state or government shall be authorized to transact business in this state unless," etc. Section 42: "That every insurance company of this state, incorporated or organized after" April 4, 1873, "which has failed to file with the insurance commissioner a certified copy of its charter, shall file such copy within ninety days," etc.; "and every company hereafter organized shall file a copy of its charter with the commissioner within ninety days from the date of said charter," etc. The forty-third and forty-fourth sections describe the organizations as "companies," evidently meaning "corporations;" as, for instance, in the forty-fourth, the words occur "with the agents of any insurance company not incorporated in this commonwealth." The forty-sixth section imposes a penalty upon persons transacting business as insurance brokers without a certificate of authority as aforesaid. Then comes the forty-seventh section, which imposes penalties upon persons acting as agents for insurance companies of any other state or government. It is perfectly clear that the word "companies" is here used, as it is throughout the act, as the equivalent of the word "corporations." They are indiscriminately and constantly employed as synonyms in all the sections of the act in which they appear; and as this view is consistent with the subject of the legislation as described in the title, and in the chief enacting section,—the first,—which authorizes only the formation of incorporated companies, we do not feel at liberty to diverge from that construction in considering the forty-seventh section. Moreover, the offense with which the defendant is charged is the transaction of business within this commonwealth as the agent of a foreign insurance company, without having obtained a certificate of authority, as required by the Act of 1873. The eleventh section of that act is the one which prohibits the transaction of business by agents until they have procured from the insurance commissioner a certificate that the company they represent has complied with the requirements of the Act of 1873. A reading of that section convinces us that the companies referred to in the eleventh, as also in the tenth, section are incorporated companies. The eleventh section refers to the tenth in designating the kind of companies which shall obtain certificates, and those companies are described in the tenth section,—“any insurance company of another state or foreign government.” It can scarcely be considered that this description was intended to include any other than regularly incorporated companies. Whatever may be the other responsibilities of the defendant for acting without a certificate, we are of opinion that he is not amenable to the penal consequences of the forty-seventh section of the Act of 1876, and therefore the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and it is ordered that the defendant go without day.

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions for Philadelphia County in favor of defendant upon an indictment charging him with unlawfully issuing a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the special verdict which was found by the jury as follows:

The defendant acting for himself and as attorney-in-fact for J. K. Cuming, R. H. Foerderer, B. J. Woodward, C. A. Furbush, and J. Gibson McIlvain did sign and issue on the 12th day of March, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and ninety-four (1894), a certain policy of insurance and contract of guaranty against loss by fire in the sum of one thousand dollars on the household furniture of James G. Kimball, located and being in the county of Philadelphia and state of Pennsylvania, without authority expressly conferred by a charter of incorporation given according to law April 12, 1894.

corporation given according to law, is constitutional.

In England where underwriting is a science the great bulk of the business of insurance is carried on by companies, most of which are incorporated.

1 Biddle, Ins. p. 80; Porter, Ins. 361.

The act made the business of insurance in Pennsylvania a franchise.

A franchise is "a right, privilege, or power, of public concern, which ought not to be exercised by private individuals at their mere will and pleasure, but should be reserved for public control and administration, either by the government directly, or by public agents acting under such conditions and regulations as the government may impose in the public interest and for the public security."

California v. Central Pac. R. Co. 127 U. S. 40, 32 L. ed. 157.

In that case the supreme judicial authority of the land placed the ultimate right of declaring what shall and what shall not be deemed a franchise in the hands of the legislature.

Rights which at common law may have been held with perfect propriety by the individual in the more complex order of the state and of society, are to-day reserved to the commonwealth.

If incorporation carries with it advantages to the incorporators, and presumably some to the public, why may not the state declare that a business of universal concern shall be conducted only under the restrictions and with the advantages to the public which result from the obligations of companies chartered by the commonwealth?

Burdick v. People, 24 L. R. A. 152, 149 Ill. 600, declared a law to be constitutional forbidding persons from selling railroad and steamboat tickets unless they had certificates of authority from the companies issuing them, and except that the person offering the ticket for sale had bought it from a certified agent with a bona fide intention of traveling upon the same.

Upon the authority of Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. p. 435, and other authorities the court held that the disposition of property might be limited and regulated when the interests of the public so required, and the phrase "due process of law" means "in the due course of legal proceedings according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights."

The Act of 1870 is not a valid exercise of the police power of the legislature.

Blackstone in his Commentaries, Vol. 4, p. 162, defines the police power to include: "The due regulation and domestic order of the kingdom; whereby the individuals of the state, like members of a well-governed family, are bound to conform their general behaviour to the rules of propriety, good neighborhood, good manners, and to be decent, industrious, and inoffensive in their respective stations."

Cooley says (Const. Lim. 6th ed. 704): "The police of a state, in a comprehensive sense, embraces its system of internal regulation, by which the state seeks not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offenses against the state, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizens with citizens those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights, and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own so far as it is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of rights by others."

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 661, 31 L. ed. 210, said: It does not at all follow that every statute enacted ostensibly for the promotion of these ends is to be accepted as a legitimate exertion of the police powers of the state.

If any liberty or franchise is expressly protected by any constitutional provision it cannot be destroyed by any valid exercise by the legislature or the executive of the police power.

In State v. Loomis, 21 L. R. A. 789, 115 Mo. 307, it was held that a statute prohibiting mining or manufacturing concerns from issuing for the payment of wages any order or other evidence of indebtedness payable otherwise than in lawful money of the United States, unless the same is negotiable and redeemable without discount in cash or in supplies at the option of the holder, is void as depriving persons of liberty without due process of law.

In Godcharles v. Wigeman, 113 Pa. 437, it was held by this court: The first, second, third, and fourth sections of the Act of June 29, 1891, are utterly unconstitutional and void, inasmuch as by them an attempt has been made by the legislature to do what, in this country, cannot be done; that is, prevent persons who are sui juris from making their own contracts.

In State v. Goodwill, 6 L. R. A. 621, 33 W. Va. 179, it was held that an act prohibiting the payment by miners and manufacturers of their employés in orders, or other paper, unless redeemable in thirty days in lawful money, was unconstitutional.

In State v. Fire Creek Coal & Coke Co. 6 L. R. A. 359, 83 W. Va. 188, an act prohibiting miners and manufacturers from selling merchandise and supplies to employes at a greater per cent of profit than they sold at to others, was held void as class legislation, and an unjust interference with private contracts and business.

In Re Kuback, 9 L. R. A. 482, 85 Cal. 274, an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, making it a misdemeanor for a contractor to employ any person to work more than eight hours a day or to employ Chinese labor, was held not a valid exercise of the police power, and unconstitutional and void.

In Millett v. People, 117 Ill. 294, 57 Am. Rep. 869, a law requiring mine owners to keep scales and pay their miners by weight was held void, the court deciding that there was nothing in the business of mining which disqualified parties engaging in it from contracting as they might deem proper in regard to it.

See also People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636.

In Com. v. Perry, 14 L. R. A. 825, 155 Mass. 122, a law forbidding the withholding of wages to cover imperfections of weaving was held unconstitutional.

In Ramsey v. People, 17 L. R. A. 853, 142 Ill. 280, a law requiring the operators and owners of coal mines, where the miner was paid on the basis of coal mined by him, to weigh the coal screened on cars before it was stored, and to complete the compensation upon the weight of unscreened coal, was held unconstitutional.

In Fraser v. People, 16 L. R. A. 492, 141 Ill. 171, an act declaring that it should be unlawful for any person, corporation, etc., engaged in any mining or manufacturing business in the state to engage in, or to be interested, directly or indirectly, in keeping a truck store, for the furnishing of supplies to his, its, or their employes whilst so engaged in mining or manufacturing, was held unconstitutional.

The business of fire insurance is hardly one "affected by a public interest," within the meaning of the elevator cases of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 528, 36 L. ed. 250; People v. Budd, 5 L. R. A. 559, 117 N. Y. 1; Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 25 L. ed. 496; Prentice, Pol. Powers, 42; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 744.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case raises a question of constitutional law that does not seem to have been decided by the courts of this state. The facts are that in 1870 the legislature passed and the governor approved an act entitled "An act to prevent the issue of unauthorized policies of insurance." Section first made it unlawful for any person, partnership, or association, to issue any policy of insurance against fire without authority to do so expressly conferred by a charter of incorporation given according to law; and declared all policies issued without such authority to be void. The second section made it a misdemeanor to issue a policy of insurance against loss by fire without the authority required by the first section. The special verdict rendered in this case finds that the defendant did violate the Act of 1870 by making and issuing for himself and others a policy against loss by fire in the year 1894, without having obtained a charter of incorporation authorizing the making of such insurance.

Upon this verdict the learned judge of the court below entered a judgment in favor of the defendant, holding that the Act of 1870 was void because in violation of the Constitution of the United States and of this state. The commonwealth appeals. A single question is thus presented, viz.: Does the Act of 1870 violate the Constitution of either the United States or this state? The learned judge held that the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States was infringed by the Act of 1870. This amendment declares that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor deny to any within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The purpose and effect of this amendment have been discussed and declared by the United States courts in many cases, and there ought to be no doubt upon the subject at this time. It was aimed at discriminations made or attempted by the laws of any of the states against persons upon whom the laws of the United States conferred the rights and privileges of citizenship. Such discriminations whether directed against persons of a particular race or color resident within the state, or against persons resident in other states, are forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment. But the proper exercise of the police power by the several states is not within the intent or the letter of the amendment. Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 82 L. ed. 253. On the other hand its purpose was declared in the Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall, 36, 21 L. ed. 894, to be to protect "against the hostile legislation of the states, and privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States as distinguished from the privileges and immunities of citizens of the states." The Act of 1870 strikes at no privilege of citizenship of the United States as distinguished from the privileges of citizenship of Pennsylvania. It does not attempt to draw a line between citizens of this state and citizens of other states. It is therefore in no sense a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and this branch of the discussion may be properly dropped at this point, and our attention confined to the other, viz.: Is the Act of 1870 a violation of the first section of the bill of rights in the constitution of this state? That section affirms that "all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain inherent and inalienable rights among which are those of . . . acquiring, possessing and protecting property and reputation." The methods by which this right to acquire property is asserted and exercised are, however, and have been since organized government began among men, subject to regulation by law. The power of government thus brought into service is known as the police power. If the Act of 1870 is a valid exercise of the police power then no constitutional right is invaded, but the mode in which the right guaranteed by the first section of the bill of rights may be exercised consistently with the best good of the greatest number is regulated and prescribed. The general character of the police power is well understood although neither the textbooks nor decided cases have yet given us an adequate definition of it. Little more has been attempted by the courts of this country than to determine that a particular subject does or does not fall within the range of this power. An illustration is afforded by Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989, in which this language was used: "However difficult it may be to render a satisfactory definition of it (the police power) there seems to be no doubt that it does extend to the protection of the lives, health, and property of the citizens, and to the preservation of good order and the public morals." Blackstone in his Commentaries, vol. 4, p. 162, describes this power as the power of "public police and economy," by which the internal regulation and good order of the state is secured, and individual citizens, like the members of a well-ordered family, are made to conform their conduct to the rules of propriety, good neighborhood and good manners. It is therefore a power inherent in all forms of government. Its exercise may be limited by the frame or constitution of a particular government, but its natural limitations, in the absence of a written constitution, are found in the situation and necessities of the state, and these must be judged of in the first instance by the government itself. It corresponds to the right of self preservation in the individual. When the dangers that threaten the state come from without, the right of self preservation is exercised in gathering armies and the means of public defence. When the dangers arise within the state, self preservation requires their suppression. This is accomplished by the exercise of the police power which deals with all forms of disorder, and provides for the public welfare, and the protection of citizens against the violence and the fraudulent conduct of each other. Now the question whether any particular subject is so related to the public good as to justify the exercise of this power in its control, is one for the determination, in the first instance, of the lawmaking branch of the government. In disposing of it the legislature is subject to no limitations except such as the constitution of the state may impose. Within the lines set by constitutional provisions the power of the legislature is practically absolute; but if it is alleged that a given police regulation violates the fundamental law a question is raised for the determination of the courts whose duty it is to apply the constitutional tests and adjudge the law to be void if it is in conflict with them. In this case we are to apply the first section of the bill of rights to the Act of 1870 in order to determine whether it can be enforced. If the act denies the inherent and inalienable right of the citizen to acquire, possess, and protect property, which is asserted by this section of the bill of rights, then the judgment of the court below was right and this appeal should be dismissed; but if this right is not denied, and the effect of the Act of 1870 is merely to regulate its exercise, then the judgment should be reversed and the defendant should suffer the penalty of the law he has disregarded. Before entering upon this question three preliminary observations should be made: First, we must remember that the legal presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of the act because it expresses the judgment of the legislative branch of the government upon that question. The legislature has considered the question and passed upon it and this makes a prima facie case in favor of the law. We observe in the next place, that this question is to be considered upon the state of the law as it is when the question is raised. Since 1870 the constitution of the state has been remodeled and many of its new provisions have been enforced by suitable legislation. Our question is not, therefore, whether the Act of 1870 was valid under the constitution as it then stood, but whether it was valid when its provisions were invoked against the defendant in 1894. Our third observation is that the question is not controlled by common-law maxims. The police power must necessarily enlarge its range as business expands and society develops. The proper office of statutes is to remedy the defects and modify the operation of common-law rules to meet changed conditions in society and increased volume and improved methods in business. We come now to inquire whether the business of insurance against loss by fire is at the present time a proper subject for the exercise of the police power of the state. In examining this question it is important to know something about the magnitude of the business. The report of the insurance commissioner, appointed under the laws of the state, covering the transactions of the year 1892, shows that risks were written in Pennsylvania during that year as follows:

By Stock Companies of Pennsylvania
amounting to.....	$ 296,584,028
By Stock Companies of other states	412,480,251
By U. S. Branches Foreign Companies	248,407,450
By Mutual Companies of Pennsylvania	137,328,820
	$1,084,800,544

—making the enormous total of one billion and nearly eighty-five millions of dollars.

The losses paid in the same year as shown by the same report amounted to nearly seven and one quarter millions of dollars. The total capital employed in the business of fire insurance in this state during the year was nearly two hundred sixteen and one half millions of dollars. The premiums paid by the insured fell a little short of twelve millions of dollars.

Let us consider next the nature of the business. It is not like the sale of commodities for a present equivalent in value, but it is the purchase of indemnity against the risk of loss by fire that may happen at any time, and may not happen at all. The conditions necessary to the business of insurance are: a, the existence of a known danger to which all property owners are exposed, and against which they cannot effectually protect themselves; b, the strong probability that loss from this danger will fall upon but few of those who are exposed to it; c, the certainty that when the loss happens it will fall so heavily on those to whom it comes as to make pecuniary indemnity a matter of great importance; d, some knowledge of the relative value of the property annually destroyed by fire to serve as a basis for calculating the risk assumed by the insurer, and the amount of premium required to enable the insurer to meet losses and expenses and secure a fair return for the capital employed. In view of the magnitude and the nature of the insurance business it is apparent that the public is largely interested in all that relates to it. The security of policy holders requires, first, permanency in the custodian of the funds gathered from them, and on which their indemnity in case of loss depends; second, an honest and competent administration of these funds; third, restraint against the division of the profits of the business whenever such division would injuriously affect the security of policy holders. How are these safeguards to be obtained? There is but one way in which they can be obtained and that is by means of general laws regulating the insurance business. Corporations derive their existence from the state, and hold their franchises subject to legislative control. They are subject to the visitatorial power of the commonwealth, and they may be, and are in fact, required to lay open before the several departments of state government, and before the public, the character and extent of their business, the profits realized, the dividends declared, and the investments made. The legality and business value of the methods, the economy, and financial strength of the management, and the value of the security provided for the holders of policies in any given company, are therefore subjects upon which the proper state officers may be thoroughly informed, and which the public may investigate at will. Private individuals are not subject to the same visitatorial power. They cannot ordinarily be compelled to disclose their business methods, their financial condition, or the character of their investments. They cannot be restricted in the use of either their capital or their profits as corporations may be. Those who deal with them must trust more to their personal integrity than the common experience shows to be safe. The state can compel a fair measure of fidelity in the management of these vast sums, and provide for the safety of the insured when, and only when, the business is in the hands of corporations.

In the next place it is important to consider what may be described as the trend of modern legislation on this subject. The states of the Union have severally entered upon legislation regulating insurance. In each an insurance department of the state government has been organized. A general supervision and control of insurance companies has been assumed by the states, and exercised through the insurance department. In our state this system of legislation began as early as 1810 and it has grown in bulk and importance with the growth of business and the development of the resources of the state. It fixes the minimum of actual capital necessary to the organization of a corporation for insurance against fire, on the stock plan, at one hundred thousand dollars. It provides for a reserve fund for the security of policy holders. It prohibits the division of profits in dividends to the injury of the reserve fund. It regulates the form of policy and requires the application to be attached to, or made part of, the policy. It requires each company to submit detailed statements of the business done, of its assets and liabilities, and to show its financial condition. It requires companies organized under the laws of other states or countries to make certain deposits in this state to secure those who are insured by them, and to appoint some suitable agent on whom process may be served in actions brought against them. These regulations have been made from time to time as their importance has been felt by the public. They are all easy of enforcement against corporations. Some of them cannot be enforced against private persons or partnerships. As matter of fact the business has for many years been left to the corporations and regulations made to affect corporations have therefore met fully the public need. At this time, however, private capital is seeking employment in this field and it signals its entry upon the field by a denial of the power of the state over it. The question has been raised by the corporations of other states but I recall no case in which it has been raised by individuals. In Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. of New York, 94 U. S. 535, 24 L. ed. 148, the Supreme Court of the United States stated the general rule thus, "A state has the right to impose conditions not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States on the doing of insurance business within its territory by an insurance company chartered by another state, or to exclude it altogether."

It would seem to follow logically that the state might require all persons desiring to enter upon the business to comply with the same conditions and, if necessary, to obtain a charter of incorporation in order to such compliance. An effort is made to distinguish between regulation and prohibition and to hold that the Act of 1870 is a prohibition operating upon all natural persons for the benefit of corporations who are thus given an oppressive monopoly of the business of insurance against fire. But the prohibition is only such as is necessary to give effect to the regulation which the act prescribes. The act implies a declaration by the legislature that the business of insurance against fire affects so many persons, and involves such large sums of money, as to make it necessary for the public protection that it be subjected to the supervision and control of the government; that the supervision required is such as private persons cannot be compelled to submit their business conduct to; and then expressly declares that all persons desiring to embark in the business must procure a charter of incorporation for that purpose because corporations are subject to the supervision and control of the state that creates them. This is regulative. It directs the business into the only channel that admits the necessary measure of control and it necessarily prohibits the business outside that channel.

The traffic in intoxicating drinks is regulated by law; but the regulation prohibits absolutely all persons from engaging in it unless they have first secured the permission of the state by obtaining a license under the law. Here, as in the Act of 1870, we find permission to those who comply with the regulation, and prohibition to those who do not. The practice of medicine, the sale of drugs, and many other sorts of business are regulated by law; but the regulation would be without effect if it did not include a prohibition directed against those not qualified, and enforce it with suitable penalties. The police power of a state may be exerted for the complete or the partial control of a given business. It may prohibit it absolutely to all persons for the purpose of suppression. It may permit it to some persons and under certain restrictions in order to secure control over it and hold it within proper bounds. Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079. The Sunday laws, the laws against gambling, against lotteries, against disorderly houses, the sale of liquors, the sale of oleomargarine, the sale of drugs and many similar laws afford instances of the exercise of the police power for the complete suppression of a given line of employment, or for its restriction and control.

The Act of 1870 belongs to the latter class. It does not prohibit the business of insurance but regulates it. It says to all persons interested: "If you wish to embark in this business you must secure a charter of incorporation so as to subject your business to the visitatorial power of the state. If you will not do this you must not engage in insurance against fire at all." This is not prohibition of the business, for the business is distinctly authorized. It is an effort to bring it under state supervision and control, by requiring all who wish to enter the business to put themselves in a position where the insurance legislation of the state will reach them, and the insurance department of the state can supervise their business, and compel observance of the law.

Without going further into the discussion we may now state our conclusions applicable to the case before us.

1. The business of insurance against loss by fire is by reason of its magnitude, its importance to property owners, and the nature of the business, a proper subject for the exercise of the police power of the state.

2. The Act of 1870 is a valid exercise of the police power. It does not prohibit but regulates the business. It excludes no one from engaging in it, but prescribes the preliminary qualification necessary for all alike, to entitle them to enter the business.

3. The qualification is reasonable. It is open to all under general laws. It is not burdensome. Its only effect is to secure adequate capital at the beginning, and state supervision during the continuance of the business.

4. Upon the special verdict judgment should have been entered in favor of the commonwealth and sentence should have been pronounced under the Act of 1870.

That this may now be done the judgment is reversed, the record remitted, and a procedendo awarded.

Dean, J., dissenting:

The Act of the 4th of February, 1870, declares it to be a misdemeanor for any person to issue a policy of insurance against loss by fire or lightning, without authority being expressly conferred so to do, by a charter of incorporation issued according to law.

The defendant, on the 12th of March, 1894, issued a policy to James G. Kimball in the sum of $1,000, indemnifying him against loss by fire on his household furniture contained in his dwelling house in Philadelphia, without authority expressly conferred by an act of incorporation. For so doing, he was indicted and tried March 20, 1894. There was no dispute as to the facts, and the jury, in a special verdict, found them as stated. The court, being of opinion the act was unconstitutional, entered judgment on the verdict for defendant, and thereupon the commonwealth appealed.

Unquestionably, the legislature has the authority to enact any law not in conflict with the constitution of the state or of the United States. The right to limit the transaction of the business of fire insurance to incorporated associations is not, in express terms, forbidden. But the right of natural persons to make contracts of indemnity against loss by fire or shipwreck was, for centuries, before the adoption of the constitution, a common-law right. All the authorities, without a single exception, hold, that under the constitutional right to acquire, possess, and protect property, there is necessarily included the right to make reasonable contracts concerning it, which contracts are protected by the constitution.

In this, all agree. And all agree, further, that the legislature may, in the exercise of its police power, absolutely forbid contracts which are inimical to public interests; and, second, may adopt suitable regulations of contracts for the protection of the public.

The business of fire insurance being one which, from its nature, involves contracts with large numbers of persons in all parts of the commonwealth, who have not the opportunities of gaining the information necessary to intelligent bargaining, for their better security, the legislature may make such regulations, as will protect them against fraud or imposition. It may require that all who desire to transact business with the public shall take out a license, shall make frequent reports of their financial condition, have fixed places of business where service of process can be had on them; that they shall deposit with the treasurer or other officer of the commonwealth bonds or other securities, in sufficient amount to guarantee those with whom they contract, against loss; and generally, may make all reasonable rules for the regulation of such business. But can the legislature absolutely forbid the making of such a contract by individuals, and confer on corporations a monopoly of such business?

Is the business of fire-insurance deleterious to the public? If so, the legislature may absolutely prohibit it. But no one contends that it is. On the contrary, it is admitted it is to the advantage of the public. The legislature admits this by expressly authorizing artificial persons to conduct it. If such contracts be not injurious to the public, and may not be altogether prohibited, then where is the authority to prohibit one class, natural persons, from entering into them, and specially empowering another and numerically a very much smaller class, artificial persons, to make them? In so doing, the state grants a monopoly in a particular business to a particular class.

As is said in substance in the Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 102, 21 L. ed. 417; Alger v. Thacher, 19 Pick. 54, 81 Am. Dec. 119; Taylor v. Blanchard, 18 Allen, 372, 90 Am. Dec. 203, and many other cases, "all such grants relating to any known trade have been held by all the judges of England, . . . to be void at common law as destroying the freedom of trade, discouraging labor and industry, restraining persons from getting an honest livelihood, and putting it in the power of the grantees to enhance the price of commodities."

A contract of indemnity against loss by fire, being a common-law right, it cannot, by legislative grant, be monopolized by a small class, unless it has become of such public concern as requires its exercise by the state or by a corporation to whom the state's power is immediately delegated. It may be admitted that the business of constructing and operating public highways for the carriage of goods and travelers is exclusively in the state, and is of such immediate public interest that it can be transacted only by the state and such corporations as the state may specially authorize. But, to carry on this business at all, involves a right of eminent domain, which the state alone can exercise or grant, and therefore it ought not to be exercised by private individuals. There is not, and never was, a right in the individual to take private property for the construction and operation of a public highway, on which to conduct for profit the business of transportation; but there never was a time that the individual had not the right to make a contract to indemnify his fellow against loss by fire. This act is not obnoxious to the constitution, because it authorizes corporations to insure against fire, but because it prohibits individuals doing a like business. It grants a monopoly of a particular business to a particular class; prohibits all others from engaging in it. This the legislature may, in the exercise of its police power, in some cases do. It may declare that females shall not be employed in some avocations; that children under a certain age shall not be employed in mines or factories; that none but men of good repute shall sell liquor by retail; and the wisdom of such legislation is not a question which the courts can consider, for it is adopted to promote the health, morals, and good order of the public.

That in some of the states, the legislature has restricted the business of banking to corporations, has no analogy to the case in hand. The banking intended to be restricted by the New York act was issuing of notes, receiving of deposits and discounting. In People v. Utica Ins. Co., 15 Johns. 358, 8 Am. Dec. 248, and Bristol v. Barker, 14 Johns. 205, it was held that the act was only a restraining and regulating act, applying to associations of individuals; that as to them, to do a banking business they must have corporate authority. That an individual was not prohibited from doing a banking business, except as to issuing bank notes. It has always been held to be within the police power of the legislature to restrict the issuing of notes intended to pass as money, to corporations. It is a matter of which concerns the entire public, who have no opportunity in the hurry of every-day business transactions of life, to ascertain the value of the promise which is tendered as money. But in a contract of indemnity, why should not the citizen make his contract when and where the price and security suits him best? Why should the legislature take from the whole people their common-law right of contract for insurance, and grant it to a particular class? Where is there the semblance of the constitutional exercise of the police power in this? Under the Corporation Act of 1874, and supplements, corporations for almost every business are authorized, such as supplying ice, printing and publishing, conducting hotels, drove-yards, livery-stables, lumbering, quarrying, mining, brewing, distilling, improvement and sale of real estate. In fact, almost every kind of business can be transacted by incorporated companies. All concern the public. If this act be constitutional, the legislature can prohibit the transaction of any business, if not conducted by corporations under the Act of 1874, and under the pain of imprisonment forbid the individual engaging in any business whatever.

It is paternalism to assume that citizens are incapable of prudently contracting with reference to their property without an express grant of the state in the shape of corporate franchise, to one of the contracting parties. It is an assumption that the citizen is a child, needing the tutelage and protection of the legislature in the ordinary affairs of business life or else it is a species of tyranny in government like that of Turkey, where the rights to produce, manufacture, and trade, are all the subject of grant from the sultan.

If the exercise of the right of contract to indemnify be injurious to the public then it ought to be prohibited; if beneficial, it ought not to be monopolized by a few.

The rule to be deduced from Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 523, 36 L. ed. 250, the Elevator Cases; the Sinking-Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 25 L. ed. 496, and all the cases where the police power of the state is discussed, is, that while a business affected by a public interest may be regulated, yet when not inimical to the health, morals, or safety of the people, it cannot be prohibited. I do not think an exclusive grant to a class is regulation; that is prohibition of all others, and is therefore unconstitutional.

The judgment in my opinion should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

The decision in the principal case in which the plaintiff sought to take advantage of the defendant's bond, an instrument under seal, is in keeping with the doctrines established by the courts, the general rule in favor of such actions being, that in order to entitle a third party to sue upon a contract made for his benefit, there must be a valid and binding contract entered into, upon a sufficient consideration, between the promisor and the promisee, with the express intention of benefiting the third party, to whom the promisee is under some legal obligation.

The mere fact, however, that the party to be benefited is not named, has no prior knowledge of the promise, makes no difference provided he subsequently assents to or takes advantage of the transaction, the contract or promise thereby becoming irrevocable, parol evidence being admissible to prove his identity. See heads VII., VIII., X., and XI.

Moreover it is not necessary that the contract should be delivered to him. Head IX.

The principles upon which the right has been founded are in many cases those applicable to the action of money had and received by one party for the use of another, and such as are established by something for the benefit of such stranger, there being nothing but the promise, no consideration from such stranger, and no duty or obligation to him on the part of the promisee, cannot recover upon it.

(June 8, 1893.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the District Court for Ramsay County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an ac-law upon the ground of an implied promise. Head IV.

It has been repeatedly held that in order to entitle the plaintiff to succeed, the case must come within the limits fixed by the rule which will not be extended beyond the theory fixed and declared by the authorities supporting it. Head VI.

Upon the question whether or not the doctrine applies to contracts under seal, the authorities are divided in their opinion, but there would seem to be an inclination in the later ones to apply the rule in such cases. Head XVIII.

With reference to the provisions of the statute of frauds applying, the decisions would seem to be almost unanimous in their holding that the ordinary case of a promise made to a debtor, upon a sufficient new consideration, to pay the debt owing by him to his creditor does not come within the statute, and that the creditor can sue thereon in his own name. Head V.

A large number of the cases in which the doctrine has been applied have been those of a purchase of property subject to a debt, lien, or mortgage, wherein the purchaser has undertaken to pay and discharge such incumbrance, the court applying the doctrine in such cases where there has been a debt enforceable against the vendor of which the purchaser has assumed the responsibility. Head XXI.

The doctrine has also been applied in insurance cases and in partnership transactions. Heads XIX., XX.

It will be found that its application has been greatly assisted by the provisions of the state statutes and codes, under which the right of action is vested in "the real party in interest." Head XXII.

The English theory which has been opposed to such actions would also seem, by the more recent decisions, to be conforming more nearly to the rule in equity, and this, owing to the fact that since the passing of the judicature act in that country, the rules of law and equity are blended, the acts providing that wherever there is a conflict between them the rules of equity shall prevail. The case of Gandy v. Gandy, infra, decided since the passing of such acts, would seem to bear out this contention. Head XXIII.

I. The doctrine of consideration.

As a general rule, all that the law requires with reference to the consideration is, that it be of some value, however slight that may be, provided there is no fraud in the transaction. Spangler v.

tion brought to enforce a bond given by a contractor to hold harmless the owner of certain premises which the contractor had undertaken to repair. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Owen Morris, for appellants:

The party for whose sole benefit a contract is evidently made, may sue thereon in his own name, although the engagement be not directly to or with him.

Allen v. Thomas, 8 Met. (Ky.) 198, 72 Am. Dec. 169.

When one person, for a valuable consideration, engages with another, by simple contract, to do some act for the benefit of a third, the latter, who would enjoy the benefit of the act,

Springer, 22 Pa. 454; Pierce v. Fuller, 8 Mass. 223, 5 Am. Dec. 102.

A consideration is sufficient if it arises from any act of the plaintiff, from which the defendant or a stranger derives any benefit, however small, if such act is performed by the plaintiff with the assent, express or implied, of the defendant, or by reason of any damage, or any suspension or forbearance of the plaintiff's right at law or in equity, or any possibility of loss occasioned to the plaintiff by the promise of another, although no actual benefit accrues to the party undertaking it. Ealing v. Zant-singer, 18 Pa. 50; Hind v. Holdship, 2 Watts, 104.

It is not material that any actual benefit should accrue to the party undertaking it. Cabot v. Has-kins, 8 Pick. 92.

The consideration need not be a benefit to the defendant, any loss or disadvantage to the plaintiff, by giving up some right against a third person, or agreeing to abandon or delay enforcing some right against him, being sufficient. Ellis v. Clark, 110 Mass. 899, 14 Am. Rep. 609.

It is not essential that the person to whom the consideration moves should be benefited, provided the person from whom it moves is in a legal sense injured. St. Mark's Church in Newcastle v. Teed, 120 N. Y. 583.

The injury may consist in a compromise of a disputed claim, or the forbearance to exercise a legal right, the alteration of position being regarded as a detriment that forms a consideration independent of the actual value of the right forborne. St. Mark's Church in Newcastle v. Teed, 120 N. Y. 583.

The consideration must be sufficient in order to change the position of the parties. Robinson v. Gilman, 43 N. H. 491; Carnahan v. Tousey, 38 Ind. 561; Rodenbarger v. Bramblett, 78 Ind. 213; Worley v. Sipe, 111 Ind. 236; Pope v. Porter, 33 Fed. Rep. 7; Cottage Street M. E. Church v. Kendall, 121 Mass. 523, 23 Am. Rep. 236.

A promise made in consideration of another promise is sufficient. Davis v. Calloway, 30 Ind. 112, 95 Am. Dec. 670; Helms v. Kearns, 40 Ind. 124.

There must be a legal foundation for a promise, either an actual damage or a suspension or forbearance of a right, or a possibility of loss occasioned to the one to whom the promise is made, to give it validity. Cabot v. Haskins, 8 Pick. 92.

Where a contract creates a duty or relation in the nature of a trust, the action is maintainable, the consideration retained being regarded as held in the nature of a trust for the persons indicated by the contract. Follansbee v. Johnson, 23 Minn. 811.

And it is not necessary that there should be any consideration passing from the third person, it being sufficient that the promise was made by the promisor upon a sufficient consideration, as between himself and his immediate promisee; the third person, adopting the act of the promisee by obtaining the promise for his benefit, brings himself into privity with the promisor and entitles him to enforce the promise as if made directly to him. Thorp v. Keokuk Coal Co. of New York, 48 N. Y. 253.

The consideration need not move from such third party. Dean v. Walker, 107 Ill. 540, 47 Am. Rep. 467.

It is not necessary that the consideration should move from the plaintiff, it is sufficient that the promise is made upon a valid consideration moving from such third party. Judson v. Gray, 17 How. Pr. 298; Williamson Stewart Paper Co. v. Seaman, 29 Ill. App. 68.

In all such cases the consideration of the promise is the same as that for any other stipulation of the contract. Grant v. Diebold Safe & Lock Co. 37 Wis. 72.

The consideration of the contract between the two parties for the benefit of a third is the consideration for the promise to the third. Ibid.

Yet neither at law nor in equity is a bare recipient a party to the contract, no consideration moving from him to support one, and though he is the representative of the beneficiary to receive the promise, he is not necessarily his representative to enforce it. Edmundson v. Penny, 1 Pa. 334, 44 Am. Dec. 137.

Before such an action can be maintained, it must be shown that there was a consideration for the promise moving to the defendant, either from the plaintiff, or the other party, the promisee. Wyman v. Smith, 2 Sandf. 381, 337.

In such cases, the controlling circumstance, in general, is the question whether the money or property has been received by the defendant for the plaintiff's use. Ibid.

The placing of money in the hands of the promisor under his promise to pay it over is a sufficient consideration. Perry v. Swasey, 12 Cush. 36.

Where the agreement consists of something beneficial to and received by the promisor, to render the promise valid when not in writing, it must be founded upon a consideration, and arise out of a transaction, by the terms, or by force of which, the promisor becomes substantially the debtor of the promisee, in respect to the same, and to the amount which he agrees to pay, so that making payment according to the terms of the promise will be a satisfaction of his own debt, and the discharge of an obligation resting upon him as a principal. State Bank at New Brunswick v. Mettler, 2 Bosw. 362, 398.

The receipt of the money is a sufficient consideration for the promise to pay. Kollock v. Parcher, 52 Wis. 393; Lucas v. Chamberlain, 8 B. Mon. 276.

The true rule is that the new "original consideration" spoken of must be such as to shift the actual indebtedness to the new promisor, so that as between him and the original debtor he must be bound to pay the debt as his own, the latter standing to him in the relation of surety. Kingsley v. Balcome, 4 Barb. 139.

The promisor becoming the custodian and trustee of a fund actually belonging to the beneficiary is the one instance, while he undertakes to pay the money, or do some act in consideration of a benefit conferred upon himself in the other. Guthrie v. Kerr, 85 Pa. 303.

The consideration and promise making it plainly the defendant's duty to pay the plaintiff, and implying a promise equal to a trust, the right of action being equal in the one case as in the other, that is to say, in the case of such promise, as in that of a trust. Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268.

The consideration or motive of the promise must be known to the promisor. Ellis v. Clark, 110 Mass. 899, 14 Am. Rep. 609.

In Machias Hotel Co. v. Coyle, 35 Me. 405, 58 Am. Dec. 712, it was held that a party for whose benefit may maintain an action for the breach of such engagement.

This principle extends beyond mere simple contracts, and is applicable to contracts under seal.

Kimball v. Noyes, 17 Wis. 695; Keeler v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 16 Wis. 523, 84 Am. Dec. 714; Carnegie v. Morrison, 2 Met. 881; Brewer a contract was made, might sue thereon in his own name, without reference to the manner in which he acted at the time of the formation of the contract, if the consideration be derived from a party to the suit. Robbins v. Ayers, 10 Mo. 538, 47 Am. Dec. 126.

The question as to the sufficiency of the consideration, was raised in St. Mark's Church in New-castle v. Teed, 120 N. Y. 583, but the court followed the doctrine laid down in Todd v. Weber, 95 N. Y. 181, 194, 47 Am. Rep. 20, holding that a party for whose benefit a promise is made, may sue thereon in assumpsit, even if the consideration arose between the promisor and a third person.

It has been held that in all these cases, founded on a new and original consideration of benefit to the defendant, or harm to the plaintiff moving to the party making the promise, either from the plaintiff or the original debtor, the subsisting liability of the original debtor is no objection to the recovery. Farley v. Cleveland, 4 Cow. 432, 15 Am. Dec. 387; Cleveland v. Farley, 9 Cow. 639.

In Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 283, the court held that the above case had never been doubted as sound authority, and put at rest the objection that the defendant's promise was void for want of consideration.

Where a debtor engaged the defendant to pay her debt, and put money into his hands for that purpose, and he promised to perform the action and the promise was made known to the plaintiff, the court held this raised a good implied promise to pay the plaintiff, and that the money received by the defendant from the debtor for the payment of her debt was a consideration for his promise to pay; the law created the privity and enabled the party to be benefited by the promise to treat it as a consideration moving from him. Perry v. Swasey, 12 Cush. 38.

But the courts have stated that the plaintiff must be the person from whom the consideration moved, and that therefore a stranger cannot sue upon such contract. Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 317.

Where the purchaser of goods gave the vendor an order to deliver them to a third party, which the latter accepted, it was held that such third party could not maintain an action upon such agreement without showing a consideration between the parties to the action. Cottage Street M. E. Church v. Kendall, 121 Mass. 523, 23 Am. Rep. 238.

So where a testator gave a certain legacy by his will, which he afterwards revoked by codicil and gave the same to another, upon the latter's promise to pay the former intended legatee, the court held that no consideration moved from the first legatee to the testator, and that the case came within the general rule prohibiting such actions. Linneman v. Moross's Estate, 98 Mich. 173.

Again, where a debtor requested a debtor of his to place the amount to the credit of his creditor, which act was done, it was held in an action by the creditor to recover the amount so deposited and placed to his credit, that the action would not lie as he was a stranger to the consideration and to the contract, there being nothing in the instrument to prevent an attack upon it for fraud or mistake, the plaintiff parting with nothing as a consideration, never having possession of the certificate, the defendants being entitled to withdraw the credit

v. Dyer, 7 Cush. 337; McDowell v. Laev, 35 Wis. 175; Kimball v. Noyes and Brewer v. Dyer, supra.

Mr. F. W. Zollman, for respondents:

The common-law rule is that only parties in privity of contract and parties to the consideration can sue, and this rule still prevails in most of the New England states before the plaintiff was involved in a loss by their doing so, which they did and so informed the plaintiff. Robertson v. Reed, 47 Pa. 114.

And again, in Fairchild v. Feltman, 32 Hun, 308, a debtor promised his creditor to pay the debt owing to him to the creditor of the latter. It was held that no action would lie against the debtor as upon a contract made for the benefit of a third person, the consideration being past and not sufficient. Kelly v. Roberts, 40 N. Y. 432, to the same effect.

II. The question of privity.

The general rule is, that there must be privity of contract between the parties. Second Nat. Bank of St. Louis v. Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of Missouri, 98 U. S. 123, 25 L. ed. 75.

It is an essential element in all contracts. Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 317.

And therefore strangers to the contract cannot sue thereon. Davis v. Clinton Water Works Co. 54 Iowa, 59, 37 Am. Rep. 185; Blymire v. Boistle, 6 Watts, 132, 31 Am. Dec. 458; Mellen v. Whipple, supra.

It is not every promise made by one to another, from the performance of which a benefit may inure to a third, which gives a right of action to such third person, he being neither privy to the contract, nor to the consideration. Burton v. Larkin, 36 Kan. 246, 59 Am. Rep. 541.

While at law strict privity of contract is essential, in equity the rule is different, the latter courts holding such a promise enforceable in an action brought in such parties' name. Carnahan v. Tousey, 93 Ind. 551; Rodenbarger v. Bramblett, 78 Ind. 218; Worley v. Sipe, 111 Ind. 238.

A third person for whose benefit a contract is made, does not in all cases have a right of action; to entitle him thereto there must be some privity between him and the promisee, some obligation or duty owing from the latter to him, giving him a legal or equitable claim to the benefit of the promise, or an equivalent from him personally. Ferris v. Carson Water Co. 16 Nev. 44, 40 Am. Rep. 495.

A legal obligation or duty owing from the promisee to him, the plaintiff, will so connect him with the transaction as to be a substitute for any privity with the promisor, or the consideration with the promisee, the obligation of the promisee furnishing an evidence of the interest of the latter to benefit him and creating a privity by substitution with the promisor. Ibid.; Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 234, 25 Am. Rep. 195.

The legal right of a party to assert that the performance of a contract made between two others for his benefit cannot be revoked or modified without his consent rests in the nature of an express promise on the part of the person whom he seeks to charge, and thus raises a privity of contract. Frank v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 7 N. Y. S. R. 814.

In such a case there is a privity of contract arising out of such express promise, the consideration between the promisor and promisee being sufficient to support it. Ealing v. Zantinger, 13 Pa. 50.

And when it is proved that the defendant has received the money, the law creates the privity and implies the promise. Hall v. Marston, 17 Mass. 575; Perry v. Swasey, 12 Cush. 38; Frost v. Gage, 1 Allen, 202.

Exchange Bank of St. Louis v. Rice, 107 Mass. 37, 9 Am. Rep. 1; Ellis v. Clark, 110 Mass. 389, 14 Am. Rep. 609.

As also in some classes of cases in the state of Illinois.

Neubrecht v. Santmeyer, 50 Ill. 74.

While it is true that the rule has been relaxed in many states, yet it has always been strict in the case of sealed instruments.

Story, Cont. § 573, p. 525, and note 2; Parsons, Cont. p. 468 (bottom paging 498).

The decisions have not relaxed the rule so far as to hold that a covenant may be sued upon by the person for whose benefit it is made, if he is not a party to the deed.

Moore v. House, 64 Ill. 162.

The rule in Bennett v. McGrade, 15 Minn. 132, and Slosson v. Ferguson, 81 Minn. 448, is

And enables the party to be benefited to treat it as a consideration moving from him. Perry v. Swasey, supra; Markle v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 19 Mo. App. 80; Hall v. Marston, supra; Jones v. Higgins, 80 Ky. 409.

The rule upholding such actions does not depend upon the ground of any actual or supposed relationship between the parties, nor upon the reason that the defendant impliedly contracts as agent of the principal, but it rests upon the broader basis of privity of contract established by the law owing to the parties' actions, upon which the promise and obligation were founded. Brewer v. Dyer, 7 Cush. 337.

And where one contracts for value by simple contract to pay money, or do some other act for the benefit of a third person, the latter for whose benefit it is made, may recover, the only objection to his recovery being the want of privity. Bohanan v. Pope, 42 Me. 93.

In the case of an action brought against a water company for the non-supply of water for the purposes of extinguishing a fire, by reason of which the plaintiff sustained damage, the plaintiff claiming the benefit of the contract between the defendant and the town, the court held the plaintiff could not maintain an action against the water company under its contract with the town, there being no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendant company. Ferris v. Carson Water Co. 16 Nev. 44, 40 Am. Rep. 425; Davis v. Clinton Water Works Co. 54 Iowa, 59, 37 Am. Rep. 185.

As to the right of a party to sue a water company for loss occasioned by an inadequate water supply under a contract made with a municipality, see Howsmon v. Trenton Water Co. (Mo.) 23 L. R. A. 146, and note thereto.

Where, in order to become a member of an association, a party signed a by-law by which members were liable "in their individual as well as their collective capacity" for all monies loaned to the association, it was held that he was not personally liable for money subsequently lent, in the absence of evidence that it was lent on the faith and credit of the by-law, there being no privity between the plaintiff and the defendant, or consideration for a demand between them. Flint v. Pierce, 99 Mass. 68, 96 Am. Dec. 691.

III. General rules as to party to sue.

It is a fundamental rule, that no person can maintain an action respecting a subject-matter in respect to which he has no interest, right, or duty, either personal or fiduciary. Baxter v. Baxter, 43 N. J. Eq. 82.

No action can be brought upon a contract, except by a party to it. Bohanan v. Pope, 42 Me. 93.

The parties to a contract being the persons in whom the legal interest in the subject-matter is deemed to be vested. Treat v. Stanton, 14 Conn. 445.

Therefore a promise made by one person to another for the benefit of a third person, a stranger to the consideration, will not support an action by the latter. Rogers v. Union Stone Co. 130 Mass. 581, 39 Am. Rep. 473, following Exchange Bank of St. Louis v. Rice, 107 Mass. 37, 9 Am. Rep. 1.

It is an inflexible rule of the common law that a right of action on a contract to warrant any recovery must arise upon a contract made by the party to the record. Litchfield v. Garratt, 10 Mich. 426.

A mere stranger cannot intervene and claim, by action, the benefit of a contract between other parties. Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 196; Marston v. Bigelow, 5 L. R. A. 42, 150 Mass. 45; Meech v. Ensign, 49 Conn. 191, 44 Am. Rep. 225.

In general, the action on a contract, whether express or implied, or whether by parol or under seal, or of record, must be brought in the name of the party in whom the legal interest in such contract is vested. Treat v. Stanton, supra; Miller v. Kingsbury, 23 Ill. App. 532; Wynn v. Wood, 97 Pa. 216.

Although the exclusive interest or benefit to be derived from the contract or subject-matter of litigation be in another. Violett v. Powell, 10 B. Mon. 347, 52 Am. Dec. 548.

The action should be in the name of the party whose legal interest has been affected. Crocker v. Higgins, 7 Conn. 347.

Or in other words, who has a legal interest in the cause of action, since it is of legal rights alone that courts of law take cognizance, and that only, in favor of those who are recognized as having those rights. Treat v. Stanton, 14 Conn. 445.

In Edmundson v. Penny, 1 Pa. 334, 44 Am. Dec. 137, it was held that a parol promise to one for the benefit of another could support an action on it only by him from whom the consideration moved, or who was the meritorious cause of it.

Nobody can sue upon a covenant, except he who was a party thereto and entitled to its benefit. De Bolle v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co. 4 Whart. 68, 33 Am. Dec. 38.

In chancery the plaintiff must have an interest in the subject of the suit, or a right to the thing demanded. Crocker v. Higgins, supra.

In that jurisdiction the real party in interest must sue. Thompson v. Cartwright, 1 Tex. 87, 46 Am. Dec. 95.

Where the action was brought for payment of coupons, attached in the first instance to bonds issued by a certain masonic association, on which the defendant by resolution adopted the payment under certain conditions as to the issuance of stock to such assumption of payment, the court held that, the debt already existing between the plaintiff and the association, a promise by a third person to pay it being primarily for the benefit of such debtor, and for his relief, he had a right of action for his own indemnity, and that if the original creditor could also sue, two actions would be maintainable and the rule was therefore against such action. Second Nat. Bank of St. Louis v. Grand Lodge of Free & Accepted Masons of Missouri, 98 U. S. 123, 25 L. ed. 76. See also Blymire v. Boistie, 3 Watts, 182, 31 Am. Dec. 458; Morrison v. Beckey, 6 Watts, 349.

The principles established by the Supreme Court of the United States in Second Nat. Bank of St. Louis v. Grand Lodge of Free & Accepted Masons of Missouri, supra, were followed and approved of by the court in Cragin v. Lovell, 109 U. S. 194, 27 L. ed. 903, where the plaintiff relied upon article 1890 of the Louisiana Civil Code, and article 35 of the Code of Practice of that state, the court holding that neither applied to the case in point.

not applicable here, because the bonds were statutory bonds, and further than that, the reason for the decisions is found in the statutes.

The right to sue inures to the third person, when it is intended that he should be benefited by the contract. He must be the person intended to be benefited. The fact that a benefit would inure to him from the performance is not sufficient. No right of action arises where he is neither privy to the contract nor to the consideration.

Garnsey v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 233, 7 Am. Rep. 440; Simson v. Brown, 68 N. Y. 855.

Neither is the promisor liable upon an agreement to pay a debt, for which the promisee is not himself personally liable, or under some obligation in respect thereto.

King v. Whitely, 10 Paige, 465, 4 L. ed. 1052.

In the above case the only allegation touching the relation of the defendant was that in an action by him against such third person the defendant claimed that the party acted as his agent, but the court found that no promise to the plaintiff was to be construed therefrom. Cragin v. Lovell, supra.

The cases of Second Nat. Bank of St. Louis v. Grand Lodge of Free & Accepted Masons of Missouri and Cragin v. Lovell, supra, were relied upon by the defense in a subsequent case, as showing a want of privity, but were rejected by the court, there being no contract shown by them except such as was executory upon which a third person cannot sue. Pope v. Porter, 33 Fed. Rep. 7.

In Owings v. Owings, 1 Harr. & G. 484, the court held that the mere promise of a debtor to his creditor to pay the latter's debt to his creditor will not support an action by the latter creditor against such debtor.

Where a contract was made by a father for the support of his infant daughter, founded upon a valuable consideration, it was contended that an action for the breach could be maintained by the daughter in her own name, as being a contract made for her benefit, but the court held in an action by the father for breach, that he being bound by law to support the daughter, and the contract being with him, the action was maintainable by the father. Vancleave v. Clark, 3 L. R. A. 512, 118 Ind. 61.

IV. Grounds upholding action.

a. In general.

There must be a meeting and agreement of the minds of the parties upon the terms of the whole contract, including the promise on the one side and the consideration for it on the other. Ellis v. Clark, 110 Mass. 380, 14 Am. Rep. 609.

There must be either a new consideration, or some prior right or claim against one of the contracting parties, by which he has a legal interest in the performance of the agreement. Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 185.

In order to maintain the action, it has been held that in general there must be some trust, or the defendant must have become charged as for money which ex equo et bono, belonged to the plaintiff and the privity of contract has been spelled out. Etna Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 82, 7 Am. Rep. 314.

The grounds of distinction are those stated by the court in Blymire v. Boistie, 6 Watts, 182, 31 Am. Dec. 458, where one person contracts with another to pay money to a third person, or to deliver over some valuable thing, and such third person is thus the only party in interest, and ought to possess the right to release the demand or receive it by action; but where the debt already exists from one person to another, a promise by a third person to pay such debt being for the benefit of the original debtor, and to relieve him from liability, he ought to have a right of action against the promisor for his own indemnity, and if the promisor were also liable to the original creditor, he would be liable to two separate actions at the same time for the same debt, which would be inconvenient and might lead to injustice. Morrison v. Beckey, 6 Watts, 249, to the same effect.

A third party may maintain an action on a promise made to another in many cases, as, where one delivers money or personal property to another, under the promise of the latter to deliver it over to a third party who has a beneficial interest therein, or to convert it into money and pay him the proceeds, the third person may maintain an action therefor against the promisor. Wynn v. Wood, 97 Pa. 216; Hind v. Holdship, 2 Watts, 104, 26 Am. Dec. 107; Justice v. Tallman, 86 Pa. 147; Vincent v. Watson, 18 Pa. 96; Beers v. Robinson, 9 Pa. 229; Townsend v. Long, 77 Pa. 143, 18 Am. Rep. 438; Bellas v. Faxely, 19 Pa. 273; Torrens v. Campbell, 74 Pa. 470; Kountz v. Holthouse, 85 Pa. 235.

Where there was no indication that the property was to be delivered over, nor that it was to be converted into money, and the proceeds paid over, or any inference that the avails and proceeds were to pay and discharge the debt due to the plaintiff, the court held that to entitle a third party to sustain such action, money or property must have been placed in the hands of the defendant for his use, or he must have been a party to the new agreement. Torrens v. Campbell, Blymire v. Boistie, and Kountz v. Holthouse, supra; Zell's App. 111 Pa. 537.

There must be a contract, either express or implied, by which the funds in the hands of the promisor become the property of the creditor, the debtor or promisee releasing all control over them. Seaman v. Whitney, 24 Wend. 284, 35 Am. Dec. 618.

In such cases the right of the third party to sue is based upon the extinguishment or release of the claim of the promisee against such promisor, and also upon the express contract entered into by the promisor. Esling v. Zantzinger, 13 Pa. 50.

But this rule will not apply where the creditor is himself a party to the contract of deposit. Seaman v. Whitney, supra.

In Lake v. Albert, 37 Minn. 453, it was held that a person with whom, or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another was a trustee of an express trust within the meaning of section 23 of chapter 66 of the Minnesota General Statutes of 1878.

Such a promise invests the person, for whose use it is made, with an immediate interest and right, as though the promise were made to him. Bay v. Williams, 112 Ill. 91, 54 Am. Rep. 209.

In such cases there is a difference, where the promise is to be performed to one not interested in the cause, and when he has an interest, the party to whom the promise is made having a right of action in the first and not the party in whose favor it is to be proven. Blymire v. Boistie, 6 Watts, 182, 31 Am. Dec. 458; Hadves v. Levit, Het. 176.

No such promise is available to a third person, unless it be by an agreement in the form of a simple contract. Robb v. Mudge, 14 Gray, 584.

If the contract is valid as between the parties thereto, it can be enforced by the party for whose benefit it is made, although it might have been void had it been made with the latter, as being within the statute of frauds. Helms v. Karns, 40 Ind. 124.

Where the promise is void, either for want of consideration or through fraud, the third party cannot maintain an action thereon. Dunning v. Leavitt, 85 N. Y. 30, 39 Am. Rep. 617.

In a suit brought by the obligee, upon a bond with similar conditions, though not the statutory bond against mechanics liens, this court has said: "Irrespective of the alleged purpose for which the bond was executed, it seems apparent from the bond itself that it was executed for the protection of the plaintiff, and not for the benefit of subcontractors."

Price v. Doyle, 84 Minn. 400.

Such action does not rest upon the ground of an actual or supposed relationship between the parties, nor upon the reason that the defendant, by entering into such an agreement, has impliedly made himself liable as agent of the plaintiff, but upon the broader and more satisfactory basis, that the law operating on the acts of the parties, creates the duty, establishes a privity, and implies the promise and obligation on which the action is founded. Brewer v. Dyer, 7 Cush. 337; Carnegie v. Morrison, 2 Met. 381.

The rule was considered as founded upon good sense because it avoided circuitry of action, and also because there was no necessity that one, who was only the mere recipient of a promise, should sue on it as a trustee, when there was no trust and when the person beneficially entitled was able to sue for himself. Edmundson v. Penny, 1 Pa. 384, 44 Am. Dec. 137.

The court in Wood v. Moriarty, 15 R. I. 518, followed the doctrine established in Urquhart v. Brayton, 12 R. I. 199, as being not only just and convenient, but consonant for the purposes of the parties as according the remedy to the party, who in most instances was chiefly interested to enforce the promise, thereby avoiding multiplicity of suits.

It has been yielded to with reluctance. Ætina Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 82, 7 Am. Rep. 314; Turk v. Ridge, 41 N. Y. 201; Hutchings v. Miner, 46 N. Y. 454, 7 Am. Rep. 369; Merrill v. Green, 55 N. Y. 270; Simson v. Brown, 63 N. Y. 356.

It has, however, been held that where the person for whose benefit the contract is made, has himself or by his privy in estate made a contract inconsistent with the one in question, he cannot repudiate such prior contract and claim the benefit of the second simply because it is his interest to do so. Constable v. National S. S. Co. 154 U. S. 51, 38 L. ed. 903.

b. Money had and received.

An exception to the general rule therefore exists where the plaintiff is the beneficiary solely interested in the promise, as in the case of a promise or contract to pay money, or deliver some valuable thing to another. Second Nat. Bank of St. Louis v. Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of Missouri, 98 U. S. 123, 25 L. ed. 75.

In Hall v. Marston, 17 Mass. 575, it was held that the principle in favor of the doctrine was reasonable and consistent with the character of the action of assumpsit for money had and received.

Indebitatus assumpsit for money had and received can be maintained in various instances, as where there is no actual privity of contract between the plaintiff and defendant, and when the consideration does not move from the plaintiff, such actions being allowed where the promise was to a third person for the plaintiff's benefit, the action being equitable, supportable by showing that the debtor has in his hands money which in equity and good conscience belongs to the plaintiff, without showing a direct consideration moving from him, or privity of contract between him and the defendant. Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 317. To the same effect, Meech v. Ensign, 49 Conn. 191, 44 Am. Rep. 225; Owings v. Owings, 1 Harr. & G. 484; Hall v. 25 L. R. A.

It does not necessarily follow that such beneficiaries may maintain an action on the bond in their own names.

State Bank of Duluth v. Heney, 40 Minn. 145.

The fatal objection, however, to the complaint, is that it appears from the bond and complaint that the bond was not executed for the appellants' protection or benefit.

Brown v. Stillman, 43 Minn. 126; Vrooman

Marston, supra; Warren v. Batchelder, 16 N. H. 530; Peacock v. Williams, 38 N. C. 324; Hall v. Robinson, 30 N. C. 55; Draughan v. Bunting, 31 N. C. 10; Blymire v. Botzle, 6 Watts, 182, 31 Am. Dec. 458; Wynn v. Wood, 97 Pa. 216; Hind v. Holdship, 2 Watts, 104, 26 Am. Dec. 107; Justice v. Tallman, 86 Pa. 147; Vincent v. Watson, 18 Pa. 93; Beers v. Robinson, 9 Pa. 229; Townsend v. Long, 77 Pa. 143, 18 Am. Rep. 438; Bellas v. Fagely, 19 Pa. 273; Torrens v. Campbell, 74 Pa. 470; Kountz v. Holthouse, 83 Pa. 236; Zell's App. 111 Pa. 537; Monroe v. Buchanan, 27 Tex. 247.

There must, however, be an express promise in order to entitle the creditor or third party to sue for money had and received of the defendant. Bigelow v. Davis, 16 Barb. 561.

Where, by agreement, an employer kept back part of the wages of his employees for the purpose of paying their accounts, it was held that the parties to whom such accounts were owing might sue for money had and received. Donkersley v. Levy, 38 Mich. 55.

So where a debtor remitted money to a third person with a direction to pay it to his creditor, and the latter upon being informed of it called upon the remitter, who promised to pay, there is a valid promise and such remitter is the depository of the creditor's money, holding it for his use and liable to him for it. Wyman v. Smith, 2 Sandf. 331, 337.

But in Moore v. Moore, 127 Mass. 22, the defendant received money from the executor of defendant's intestate as her own, and paid it away under a misapprehension of the testator's intentions. It was held, in an action by the parties entitled to such money, that she was not liable as for money had and received to their use, the money not having been paid to her in whole or in part for the benefit of the plaintiffs as due them from the executor, the court distinguishing the case from Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 317, upon these grounds.

And where the defendants were the holders of a note secured by mortgage and policies of insurance obtained by the mortgagor, and the equity of redemption having been assigned with the consent of the insurers, the policy being also assigned to the trustees as security for the same debt, with an agreement that any surplus should be paid over to the defendant or his assigns, the action being brought against the trustees to recover the amount of insurance received by them, upon the ground that they had in their hands money belonging to the plaintiff, the court held the action would not lie; there being no privity of contract, and the money not being deposited in their hands for the purpose of paying the debts, the case did not come within the principles laid down in Mellen v. Whipple, supra; Field v. Crawford, 6 Gray, 116.

In Thorpe v. Dillingham, 1 Denio, 254, where the action was brought by husband and wife, the facts showing that before the wife's marriage money had been paid by a third party to the defendant's testator, to be enjoyed by him for life and then to be paid to her, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover on a count for money had and received, but must declare specially, the money not having been received by the testator to her use, only being advanced to him as his own property, and he only binding himself to pay a like sum to the wife.

v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 195; Litchfield v. Flint, 104 N. Y. 549; Wilbur v. Warren, 104 N. Y. 193; Comley v. Dazian, 114 N. Y. 161; Lorillard v. Clyde, 10 L. R. A. 118, 122 N. Y. 498.

Gillfillan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Boston Northwest Real-Estate Company owned a lot on Sixth street, St. Paul, with two buildings standing on it, and let it to George Benz for the term of five years from May 1, 1889, and about a year thereafter he sublet it for the remainder of his term to Smith & Co. Afterwards Smith & Co. entered into a contract with the defendant Leithauser to make certain alterations and repairs and the defendants Leithauser as prin-

c. Implied promise.

An exception also exists in cases where under a contract between two persons, assets have come into the promisor's hands, or under his control, which in equity belonged to a third person, the latter being allowed to sue in his own name. Second Nat. Bank of St. Louis v. Grand Lodge of Free & Accepted Masons of Missouri, 98 U. S. 123, 25 L. ed. 75.

The suit in such a case is founded, rather upon the implied undertaking raised by law than upon any express promise. Ibid.; Meech v. Ensign, 49 Conn. 191, 44 Am. Rep. 225; Davis v. Clinton Water Works Co. 54 Iowa, 59, 37 Am. Rep. 185; Jones v. Higgins, 80 Ky. 409; Bohanan v. Pope, 42 Me. 83; Urquhart v. Brayton, 12 R. I. 169; Wood v. Moriarty, 15 R. I. 518; Merriman v. Social Mfg. Co. 12 R. I. 175; Perry v. Swasey, 12 Cush. 96; Hall v. Marston, 17 Mass. 575; Frost v. Gage, 1 Allen, 262; Markle v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 19 Mo. App. 80; Brewer v. Dyer, 7 Cush. 337.

Such a person has a legal right or title arising out of the promise. Crocker v. Higgins, 7 Conn. 347.

d. There must be an actual benefit.

Even though the party may not have known of the transaction, yet if the contract was wholly for his own benefit, or if the party acted or assumed to act as the agent of such third person, by receiving the property in such a manner that the ownership vested in such third party, the action is maintainable. Hostetter v. Hollinger, 117 Pa. 606.

The same principles were upheld in Grim v. Thomas Iron Co., 115 Pa. 611, although in that case the contract was conditional, and the defendant was therefore not liable.

There must be a distinct promise, and also proof of consent that the third party is to be benefited. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Flanigan, 112 Pa. 558.

In cases where the promise is for the payment of the debtor's debt to a third person, founded upon valuable consideration, the agreement or promise must show a clear intent and purpose upon the part of both the promisor and promisee, the mere fact that the creditor might be benefited, being not sufficient to constitute the promisor his debtor, or to authorize the creditor to sue upon the promise; and it must be shown that the creditor was intended to be benefited directly and primarily by the contract. Wright v. Terry, 23 Fla. 160; Meech v. Ensign, 49 Conn. 191, 44 Am. Rep. 225; Eddy v. Roberts, 17 Ill. 505; Beasley v. Webster, 64 Ill. 458; Brown v. Strait, 19 Ill. 88; Bristow v. Lane, 21 Ill. 194; Rabbermann v. Wiskamp, 54 Ill. 179; Pruitt v. Pruitt, 91 Ind. 595; Mumper v. Kelley, 43 Kan. 254, where the purchaser of property assumed the obligation of the vendor in respect to such property, and agreed to pay the same and to settle the plaintiff's claims against such vendor; Plano Mfg. Co. v. Burrows, 40 Kan. 361; Jordan v. White, 60 Minn. 91; Sanders v. Clason, 13 Minn. 379; Maxfield v. Schwartz, 43 Minn. 221; Rogers v. Gosnell, 51 Mo. 466; Sobuster v. Cleveland, 4 Cow. 432, 15 Am. Dec. 387; Willis v. Smyth, 91 N. Y. 298; Carter v. Holaban, 92 N. Y. 498; Cleveland v. Farley, 9 Cow. 639.

It must have been entered into for his benefit, or such benefit must be the direct result of performance and so within the contemplation of the parties, and in addition, the grantor must have a legal interest that the covenant be performed in favor of the party claiming performance. Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219.

So where promises have been made to a father or uncle for the benefit of a child or nephew, the action has been allowed. Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 317.

In Austin v. Seligman, 18 Fed. Rep. 519, the court admitting a conflict in the decisions, upheld the doctrine as the better law, wherever it was shown that by the agreement it was the intention that the contract should be made for the third party's benefit.

The rule in favor of such actions applies only to cases where the third party is the person solely and exclusively benefited by the contract, and is therefore invested with the legal interest. Treat v. Stanton, 14 Conn. 445.

The mere assumption of a debt by the terms of the deed is not sufficient. Meech v. Ensign, 49 Conn. 191, 44 Am. Rep. 225.

So the fact that a benefit may accrue is not enough. Ibid.

A mere incidental operation in that direction is not sufficient. Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522; Wright v. Terry, 23 Fla. 160; Markle v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 19 Mo. App. 80; Lake Ontario Shore R. Co. v. Curtis, 80 N. Y. 222.

The rule will not be enforced where the contract is a mere gratuity, the motive of love and affection. Gates v. Hames, 23 N. Y. S. R. 818.

Nor will it be extended to give a right of action to a creditor, for whose benefit the promise might, or might not, have been made. Wheat v. Rice, 97 N. Y. 296.

It is not sufficient that the performance of the covenant may benefit a third person to entitle him to sue for its enforcement. Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219.

Neither is it sufficient to show that a benefit would have inured to him from the performance of it. Simson v. Brown, 68 N. Y. 355.

Where the instrument did not show that either the plaintiff, or any other stranger to it, was intended to be benefited, it was held that the mere fact that one, not a party to an agreement, may be benefited by its performance, did not bring him into contractual relations with the promisor, in the agreement that such party must be the one intended to be benefited by the promise, and that there must have existed at the time such an obligation on the part of the promisor towards the third person as would give him an equitable right to the benefits of the promise. Parlin v. Hall, 3 N. Dak. 473.

So where a collector of customs placed revenue in the hands of a third person to be paid to the marshal, the action was refused, the plaintiff hav-cipal, and Asch and Boldthen as sureties, executed a bond, in which they acknowledged themselves to be indebted to George Benz, "for the use of the Boston Northwest Real-Estate Company," "and all persons who may do work or furnish material" pursuant to said contract, to be paid to the said George Benz, his executors, administrators, or assigns, for the said use," and which was conditioned to be void if Leithauser should pay "all just claims for all work done and to be done and all materials furnished and to be furnished pursuant to said contract and in the execution of the work therein provided for, as they shall become due, and shall indemnify and save harmless said George Benz and said Boston Northwest Real-Estate Company from all mechanics' liens," etc., and "indemnify and ing no exclusive interest in the subject-matter. Sally v. Cleveland, 10 Wend. 154.

v. The statute of frauds.

In cases where the contract or promise has been made by one party to another to pay the latter's debt to a third person, the question has been raised whether or not such a contract is within the statute of frauds as being a contract to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another. Wood v. Moriarty, 15 R. I. 518; Urquhart v. Brayton, 12 R. I. 169; Merriman v. Social Mfg. Co. Id. 175.

With regard to this subject, however, the courts are nearly unanimous in their opinions, which show that the statute does not apply.

In order to bring a promise within the statute of frauds, it must be collateral, and not an original liability. Townsend v. Long, 77 Pa. 143, 18 Am. Rep. 438.

To take the case out of the statute of frauds, the verbal promise of a third person made to a debtor of the plaintiff to pay to the latter the debt which the promisee owes him, must find its consideration in a purchase of property from the promisee so that the amount which is promised to be paid is to be paid in discharge of the promisor of the transaction, and the promise must be such, that, making the promised payment to the plaintiff as creditor of the promisee, will operate incidentally as a satisfaction of the debt of the latter, and primarily as payment of the debt of the promisee. State Bank at New Brunswick v. Mettler, 2 Bosw. 392, 398; Farley v. Cleveland, 4 Cow. 432, 15 Am. Dec. 337; Cleveland v. Farley, 9 Cow. 639; Ellwood v. Monk, 5 Wend. 235; Johnson v. Gilbert, 4 Hill, 178; Barker v. Bucklin, 2 Denio, 15, 43 Am. Dec. 733.

The reasons assigned by the courts for holding such a contract not within the terms of the statute are that:

The party making the promise holds the funds of the debtor for the purpose of paying the debt, and although the original debtor still remains liable, he is liable rather as surety than as principal, the fund being held in trust under a duty to pay, the contract thereby becoming an original one and not within the statute. Fullam v. Adams, 37 Vt. 397; Dearborn v. Parks, 5 Me. 81, 17 Am. Dec. 206.

Such promise is upon a new consideration moving the promisor. Steinhart v. Doellner, 2 Jones & S. 221; Wolff v. Koppell, 5 Hill, 460; Barker v. Bucklin, 2 Denio, 60, 43 Am. Dec. 726; Dearborn v. Parks, supra.

The statute applies only to promisees made to the person to whom another is answerable. Green v. Brookins, 23 Mich. 48, 53, 9 Am. Rep. 74.

The promise is not merely for the debt of another, although in effect the undertaking be to answer for another person. Dearborn v. Parks, supra.

In cases of this description, although the promisor undertakes to pay the debt of another, yet he thereby pays his own debt and that constitutes the operative mode and inducement by which he is actuated. Ibid.; Burrows v. Robertson, 7 Iowa, 101; State Bank at New Brunswick v. Mettler, Farley v. Cleveland, Ellwood v. Monk, Johnson v. Gilbert, and Barker v. Bucklin, supra.

v. Rowe, 46 Mo. 503; Starha v. Greenwood, 23 Minn. 521; Stillwell v. Otis, 7 Abb. Pr. 432.

The agreement is merely to pay in a particular way. Cotterill v. Stevens, 10 Wis. 423; Cook v. Barrett, 15 Wis. 567.

A simple contract made by a party for the benefit of a third is enforceable by the latter and is not within the statute of frauds. Mason v. Hall, 30 Ala. 599; Sacramento Lumber Co. v. Wagner, 67 Cal. 293; Green v. Richardson, 4 Colo. 58; Green v. Morrison, 5 Colo. 18; Pratt v. Humphrey, 22 Conn. 325; Eddy v. Roberts, 17 Ill. 505; Boals v. Nixon, 23 Ill. App. 517; Runde v. Runde, 59 Ill. 102; Helms v. Kearns, 40 Ind. 124; Haggerty v. Johnston, 48 Ind. 44; Carter v. Zenblin, 68 Ind. 436; Dearborn v. Parks, 5 Me. 81, 17 Am. Hackett*, 1 Nev. 360; Proprietors of the Upper Locks v. Abbott, 14 N. H. 157, 40 Am. Dec. 184; Robinson v. Gilman, 43 N. H. 491; Lang v. Henry, 54 N. H. 63; Hetfield v. Dow, 27 N. J. L. 440; Phillips v. Gray, 3 E. D. Smith, 69; Stillwell v. Otis, 7 Abb. Pr. 432; Steinhart v. Doellner, 4 Jones & S. 221; Wolff v. Koppell, 5 Hill, 460; Barker v. Bucklin, 2 Denio, 60, 43 Am. Dec. 726; Therasson v. McSpedon, 2 Hill, 3; Wyman v. Smith, 2 Sandf. 331, 337; Blunt v. Boyd, 3 Barb. 209; Ellwood v. Monk, 5 Wend. 235; Westfall v. Parsons, 15 Barb. 649; Seaman v. Hasbrouck, 35 Barb. 155; Mallory v. Gillett, 21 N. Y. 412, 427; Townsend v. Long, 77 Pa. 143, 18 Am. Rep. 438; Wynn v. Wood, 37 Pa. 216; Urquhart v. Brayton, 12 R. I. 169; Wood v. Moriarty, 15 R. I. 518, 578; Merriman v. Social Mfg. Co. 12 R. I. 175; Moore v. Stovall, 2 Lea, 543; Fullam v. Adams, 37 Vt. 397; Putney v. Farnham, 27 Wis. 187; Cotterill v. Stevens, 10 Wis. 423; Cook v. Barrett, 15 Wis. 567.

Where a promise was made by a debtor to pay money, which he owed, to a creditor of his creditor, with the assent of the latter, and in discharge of his own pre-existing liability, it was held the case was not within the statute of frauds. Phillips v. Gray, 3 E. D. Smith, 69.

Other courts, however, have held that such a parol contract or promise is void if not in writing under the statute of frauds, thus:

In Clapp v. Lawton, 31 Conn. 95, the defendant promised to pay the debt due to plaintiffs from the latter's debtors, the action being in assumpsit with a general count for money had and received, the facts showing that the debtors had sold out to the defendants who undertook to pay the debts. The court held the contract within the statute; and further, that no promise was made to the plaintiffs or for their benefit.

So in Packer v. Benton, 35 Conn. 343, 35 Am. Dec. 246, the court followed the same doctrine.

The same was the decision of the court in the earlier Tennessee decisions, as shown in Campbell v. Findley, 3 Humph. 330, and McAlister v. Marberry, 4 Humph. 426.

In a later case, however, decided in that state, the court held that the principles established in Campbell v. Findley, supra, and Erwin v. Wagoman, 1 Cooke (Tenn.) 401, were not sound, and overruled them. Moore v. Stovall, 2 Lea, 543.

Where a son promised to pay his father's note in save harmless the said George-Benz from all claims of whatever description which may arise from, in, or about said work, alterations, and repairs." The plaintiffs, having furnished materials to the contractor for the purposes of the contract, bring this action on the bond to recover the price thereof. The court below sustained a demurrer to the complaint.

consideration of the promisees discontinuing an action thereon, it was held no action would lie on such promise, unless in writing under the statute of frauds. Nelson v. Boynton, 8 Met. 396, 37 Am. Dec. 148.

If two persons jointly promise to pay for goods delivered to one, they are considered joint original debtors, the promise not being to pay the debt of another, and therefore not within the statute. Hetfield v. Dow, 27 N. J. L. 440.

VI. Limitation of the rule.

The principle should be limited to cases having the same essential facts. Lorillard v. Clyde, 10 L. R. A. 113, 122 N. Y. 498.

The courts are disinclined to extend the rule beyond the principles adopted in Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268; Pulver v. Skinner, 42 Hun. 322; Pardee v. Treat, 32 N. Y. 385; Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219; Wheat v. Rice, 97 N. Y. 296; Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 317.

The doctrine will not be extended to new or doubtful cases. Ætna Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 45 N. Y. 32, 7 Am. Rep. 314.

In cases outside of the class mentioned in Mellen v. Whipple, supra, the courts will adhere to the general rule of the common law, that the plaintiff in an action on a simple contract must be the person from whom the consideration of the contract actually moves, and that a stranger to the consideration cannot maintain an action on it. Dow v. Clark, 7 Gray, 198.

And the same is the ruling of the court in Colburn v. Phillips, 13 Gray, 64, the court holding that the doctrine in favor of such actions would not be applied, except under certain peculiar and limited conditions.

No action can be maintained by such third party, unless he can bring his case within some of the recognized exceptions to the general rule against such actions. Flint v. Pierce, 99 Mass. 68, 96 Am. Dec. 691.

The exceptions to the rule as recognized in Massachusetts will not be extended further, than as shown in Mellen v. Whipple, supra. College Street M. E. Church v. Kendall, 121 Mass. 523, 23 Am. Rep. 283.

VII. Designation of such party.

The name of the person intended to be benefited need not be given, provided he is otherwise sufficiently described or designated. Burton v. Larkin, 36 Kan. 246, 59 Am. Rep. 541; Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522; Emmitt v. Brophy, 42 Ohio St. 82.

Where the engagement was to pay the debts of the promisee, the creditor was not named and the court held it sufficient for the creditor to show that the debt was due from the promisee. Williamson Stewart Paper Co. v. Seaman, 29 Ill. App. 68.

Whenever one man has in his hands the money of another, which he ought to pay over, he is liable to this action, although he has never seen or heard of the party who has a right. Hall v. Marston, 17 Mass. 575.

But a promise, by one party to another to pay an unspecified sum of money to various persons not named but described as a class, has been held not to be sufficient to entitle the class to bring the action. Morrill v. Lane, 136 Mass. 93.

From the seals to this bond there arises the presumption of a sufficient consideration to sustain it between the parties to it. The cases in which one not a party to a contract may sue upon a promise in it for his benefit were at one time limited to contracts not under seal, and this court, in stating the law on the subject, in Follansbee v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 311, expressed that limitation; but the

VIII. Parol evidence to prove party.

Parol evidence is admissible to prove the real parties in interest. Burrows v. Turner, 24 Wend. 275, 25 Am. Dec. 622, where a policy was issued on account of ———.

The true party in interest may be ascertained by extrinsic evidence, under the rule id certum est quod reddit potest. Pitney v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 65 N. Y. 14; Clinton v. Hope Ins. Co. 45 N. Y. 461.

IX. Necessity of delivery.

In order to enable the party to maintain an action, it is not necessary that the contract should have been delivered to him. Copeland v. Summers (Ind.) Nov. 27, 1893.

The delivery to the promisee is sufficient. Ibid.; Henry v. Anderson, 77 Ind. 361; West v. Cavina, 74 Ind. 265; Waltz v. Waltz, 84 Ind. 403.

X. Necessity of assent and knowledge.

The rescission of the contract prior to the plaintiff's assent to it would be a good defense to an action brought thereon by the party for whose benefit it was made. Emmitt v. Brophy, 42 Ohio St. 82; Trimble v. Strother, 25 Ohio St. 378; Brewer v. Maurer, 38 Ohio St. 554, 43 Am. Rep. 436; Crowell v. Hospital of St. Barnabas, 27 N. J. Eq. 650.

The courts have never held that the express assent of the beneficiary is essential, nor that it is necessary that he should discharge the original debtor and accept the new promisor. Bay v. Williams, 112 Ill. 91.

Such assent will be presumed. Williamson Stewart Paper Co. v. Seaman, 29 Ill. App. 68; Flemming v. Marine Ins. Co. 4 Whart. 59, 33 Am. Dec. 83; Baker v. Eglin, 11 Or. 333; Rogers v. Gosnell, 54 Mo. 589.

In Ridge v. Olmstead, 73 Mo. 578, however, it was held that where money was placed in the hands of the promisor for payment to the creditor, the title to such money did not pass to the creditor until he was notified of the deposit and assented, and that therefore if before such notification and assent it was garnished by other creditors of the depositor, the remedy was lost.

Other cases show that the third party must have become a party to, or have adopted the new agreement. Kountz v. Holthouse, 85 Pa. 225; Meyer v. Lowell, 44 Mo. 323; Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268; Wheat v. Rice, 97 N. Y. 296; Servius v. McDonnell, 107 N. Y. 200.

A demand of performance is necessary. Durham v. Bischof, 47 Ind. 211.

In Strayhorn v. Webb, 47 N. C. 199, it was held that until the creditor, for whose use the deposit was made, does some act ratifying the receipt so as to extinguish the debt and make the money his own, he cannot maintain an action against the receiver of such money. White v. Hunt, 64 N. C. 496, to the same effect.

It was held not necessary where the plaintiff was a minor that he should have accepted the promise, it being for his benefit, the law accepting it for him. Copeland v. Summers (Ind.) Nov. 27, 1893; Nolte v. Libbert, 34 Ind. 163; Guard v. Bradley, 7 Ind. 600; Pruitt v. Pruitt, 91 Ind. 595, to the same effect.

It is not necessary that the person for whose distinction in this respect between contracts by specialty and simple contracts has not in the later authorities been adhered to, and may now be regarded as abandoned. If there ever was any reason for the distinction, it could only have been a technical one, which no longer has any merit to commend it, and we do not think we ought to recognize it. Though this seems intended as a mere bond to indemnify and save the obligee named harmless, that, and not any incidental benefit that might accrue to others not parties to it, being the primary purpose of its stipulations and promises, we will treat it, because on both sides it is so presented here, as though such primary purpose were to secure payment to the persons doing work or furnishing material under the contract men-benefit the promisee made should be aware of the promise at the time it is made, it being sufficient that such person accepts the promise and acts upon it when informed. Miller v. Billingsly, 41 Ind. 489; Hostetter v. Hollinger, 117 Pa. 608.

A promise on a sufficient consideration, made by one person to another for the benefit of a third person, may be enforced by the latter, and the fact that at the time the promise is made the third party is not aware of it makes no difference under the decisions of the Indiana courts. Waterman v. Morgan, 114 Ind. 237; Harrison v. Wright, 100 Ind. 515, 58 Am. Rep. 805; Rodenbarger v. Bramblett, 78 Ind. 218; Henderson v. McDonald, 84 Ind. 149; Hale v. Boardman, 27 Barb. 85.

XI. Effect of assent.

The promise is not revokable after the assent of the party to be benefited. Bassett v. Hughes, 43 Wis. 819.

And after notice of the promise and assent thereto, it cannot be revoked by the promisee. Putney v. Farnham, 27 Wis. 187.

If the third party elects to affirm such contract, he may maintain an action for its breach. Boals v. Nixon, 26 Ill. App. 517.

By the acceptance of such a promise, the third party manifests, as between himself and the promisee, his acceptance by resorting to prepared remedies. Carver v. Eads, 65 Ala. 190; Henry v. Murphy, 54 Ala. 245, to the same effect.

The assent being sufficiently proved by the bringing of an action on the contract. Arnold v. Lyman, 17 Mass. 400, 9 Am. Dec. 154.

The money, having, however, been deposited with the defendant for the purpose of paying the plaintiff, the plaintiff's assent to the arrangement, and his acceptance of the provision made for the payment to him, whether such assent and acceptance be contemporaneous with the acts of the other parties or subsequent, must operate to discharge the debt for which it was designed to provide, unless the provision can from any case be held collateral. Warren v. Batchelder, 16 N. H. 580; Clough v. Giles, 64 N. H. 73; Beit v. McLaughlin, 12 Mo. 438.

But until the acceptance of the promise, the parties to the agreement have the right to rescind. Davis v. Calloway, 30 Ind. 112, 95 Am. Dec. 670.

XII. Election of remedies.

The release of the principal by the bringing of suit against the promisor has been upheld upon the ground that while the law does this in favor of such third person for whose benefit it was made, it does not confine such person to the remedy so provided, it being at his election. Bohanan v. Pope, 42 Me. 98.

If the party elects to bring action against the person primarily liable upon the contract, he can do so, and in such case the principal debtor may recover over against such party. Ibid.

An adoption of the former remedy is a release of the latter. Ibid.

The following cases uphold these principles: Todd v. Tobey, 29 Me. 219; Motley v. Manufacturing Ins. Co., 29 Me. 337, 80 Am. Dec. 591; Johnson v. Collins, 14 Iowa, 68; Thompson v. Bertram, 14 Iowa, 26 L. R. A.

476; Scott v. Gill, 19 Iowa, 187; Phillips v. Van Schaick, 37 Iowa, 229; Roberts v. Corbin, 26 Iowa, 315, 96 Am. Dec. 146.

XIII. Release of the promise.

Such a promise may be released, changed, or abandoned before being accepted by the third party. Gilbert v. Sanderson, 56 Iowa, 349, 41 Am. Rep. 108; Jones v. Higgins, 80 Ky. 409; Trimble v. Strother, 25 Ohio St. 378.

Such a contract must be enforced before the parties thereto rescind it. Parlin v. Hall, 9 N. Dak. 473.

XIV. As a defense to an action.

It may be pleaded by way of set-off. Green v. Richardson, 4 Colo. 584; Green v. Morrison, 5 Colo. 18.

XV. Action maintainable by either party.

In Steele v. Aylesworth, 18 Conn. 244, it was held that the suit was maintainable by either the promisee or the beneficiary.

A contract made with a party for the benefit of another may be sued upon by either. Mosman v. Bender, 80 Mo. 579; Rogers v. Gosnell, 51 Mo. 466.

XVI. State doctrines.

In Alabama the law is stated as follows:

Where one, for a sufficient consideration moving from another indebted to a third person, promises him so indebted to pay his creditor, a failure to comply with the contract gives a right of action over to the promisee or to the person for whose benefit the promise was made. Shotwell v. Gilkey, 31 Ala. 724; Mason v. Hall, 30 Ala. 599; Huokabee v. May, 14 Ala. 233.

Such promise, however, must be specially declared upon, except where an action for money had and received would lie. Mason v. Hall, supra.

The action was upheld in Sacramento Lumber Co. v. Wagner, 67 Cal. 233, a case of a contract by a married woman to pay a debt as part of the consideration of a purchase.

Such actions are upheld in Colorado, the court stating that it accorded the remedy to the party who in most instances was chiefly interested to enforce the promise, and avoided multiplicity of suits, without causing injustice to either party. Lehow v. Simonton, 3 Colo. 346.

Where supported by a valuable consideration. Green v. Richardson, 4 Colo. 584; Green v. Morrison, 5 Colo. 18.

In Connecticut it is taken as now established that even in a court of law a third person may maintain a suit on a parol promise made for his benefit, although he is not a party to the contract. Crocker v. Higgins, 7 Conn. 347; Meech v. Ensign, 49 Conn. 191, 44 Am. Rep. 225.

The same is the rule in Florida, provided there is a clear intention and purpose to benefit the third person strictly and primarily. Hunter v. Wilson, 21 Fla. 250; Wright v. Terry, 23 Fla. 160.

It is stated as well settled in Illinois that where one person, for a valuable consideration engages with another by simple contract, to do some act for the benefit of a third, the latter, who would enjoy the benefit of the act, may maintain an action for the breach of the engagement. Williamson Stewart Paper Co. v. Seaman, 29 Ill. App. 68; Hume v.

tioned in it. In considering the question presented we must lay aside, as having no bearing upon it, the cases of official or statutory bonds required or authorized for the benefit or security of persons not named as obligee, a nominal obligee being named, and where the statute expressly or by implication authorizes such persons to sue upon them. Instances of such are sheriffs' bonds, probate bonds, bonds authorized by the Mechanic's Lien Law in Gen. Stat. 1878, and such as were considered in St. Paul v. Butler, 30 Minn. 459, and Morton v. Power, 33 Minn. 521. As, so far as appears by the complaint Benz could not be liable to pay for the work done and materials furnished in fulfilling the contract to repair, and, as, under the law then in force, his interest in the property

Brower, 25 Ill. App. 120; Bay v. Williams, 112 Ill. 91, 54 Am. Rep. 239; Eddy v. Roberts, 17 Ill. 506; Beasley v. Webster, 64 Ill. 458; Brown v. Straft, 19 Ill. 88; Bristow v. Lane, 21 Ill. 194; Rabbermann v. Wiskamp, 54 Ill. 179.

And upon such an agreement to pay all the debts of one, any creditor may sue. Hume v. Brower, supra; Shober Lithographing Co. v. Kerting, 107 Ill. 244; Snell v. Ives, 65 Ill. 279; Dean v. Walker, 107 Ill. 540, 47 Am. Rep. 497, to the same effect.

The earlier Indiana cases upheld the principle that the third party was not entitled to sue at law upon such contract, there being no privity between the promisor and such third party. Salmon v. Brown, 6 Blackf. 347; Farlow v. Kemp, 7 Blackf. 544; Britzell v. Fryberger, 2 Ind. 178; Conklin v. Smith, 7 Ind. 107, 63 Am. Dec. 418.

In equity, however, such a suit is always maintainable. Cross v. Truesdale, 28 Ind. 44.

The party making the promise is treated as a trustee for the person for whose benefit it is made. Miller v. Billingsly, 41 Ind. 429.

In the Indiana code of procedure, the plaintiff is entitled, on bringing his action, to whatever relief either the law or equity would have afforded him on the case made before the distinction between them in practice was abolished. The two systems, being blended by the code and other legal or equitable rights, are now enforceable in the civil action provided for by the code. Ibid.; Potter v. Smith, 36 Ind. 221; Frenzel v. Miller, 37 Ind. 1, 10 Am. Rep. 62.

The complaint under the code being regarded as a bill in chancery under the old practice. Davis v. Calloway, 30 Ind. 112, 95 Am. Dec. 670; Bird v. Lanina, 7 Ind. 615; Day v. Patterson, 18 Ind. 114.

In actions at law privity of contract is essential, but the rule is and always has been different in equity, and the rule should be regarded as settled in Indiana that a party, not known as a contracting party for whose benefit the contract was made, may maintain a suit upon it in equity. Miller v. Billingsly, supra; Ball v. Silver, 17 Ind. 539; Cloud v. Moorman, 18 Ind. 40; Day v. Patterson, supra; Lamb v. Donovan, 19 Ind. 40; Shucraft v. Davidson, Id. 98; Eilston v. Scott, Id. 290; Beals v. Beals, 20 Ind. 168; Devol v. McIntosh, 23 Ind. 529; Cross v. Truesdale, and Davis v. Calloway, supra; Marlett v. Wilson, 30 Ind. 240; Mathews v. Ritenour, 31 Ind. 81; Jaqua v. Montgomery, 33 Ind. 36, 5 Am. Rep. 168; Ritenour v. Mathews, 34 Ind. 279; Haggerty v. Johnston, 43 Ind. 44; South Side Planing Mill Assn. v. Cutler & Sawidge Lumber Co. 64 Ind. 569; Rodenbarger v. Bramblett, 73 Ind. 213; Worley v. Sipe, 111 Ind. 238; Pruitt v. Pruitt, 91 Ind. 595; Redelsheimer v. Miller, 107 Ind. 495, where the action was upon an agreement with a principal debtor, based upon a consideration to pay his debt to the creditor; Stevens v. Flannagan, 31 Ind. 122; Carnahan v. Tousey, 33 Ind. 561; Leake v. Ball, 116 Ind. 214.

In Copeland v. Summers (Ind.) Nov. 27, 1893, it was held that the rule was too familiar to require the citation of authority.

Where an action was brought by an administrator for the recovery of property, and was compromised by the defendants undertaking to pay all valid claims against the intestate's estate in consideration of the withdrawal of the suit, which was dismissed, it was held that a third party could sue upon such agreement. Cross v. Truesdale, supra.

Under the Iowa code, the party holding the legal title to a cause of action, though a mere agent or trustee with no beneficial interest therein, may sue thereon in his own name. Cassidy v. Woodward, 77 Iowa, 354; Cottle v. Cole, 20 Iowa, 451; Rice v. Savery, 22 Iowa, 470; Pearson v. Cummings, 23 Iowa, 344; Knadler v. Sharp, 25 Iowa, 232; Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 514; Burrows v. Robertson, 7 Iowa, 101.

The law in Iowa is that an action can be maintained upon a promise made for the benefit of a third person, if there is a sufficient consideration. Pope v. Porter, 33 Fed. Rep. 7.

In a case where a contract was made with the father of an infant for the benefit of the infant, and the question of emancipation did not arise, it was held that an action could be brought by the infant upon such contract, even though made with the father. Gooden v. Rayl, 85 Iowa, 522.

The rule is said to be well established in Kansas that a third person, not a party or privy to a contract, may sue thereon for his own benefit. Anthony v. Herman, 14 Kan. 494; Strong v. Marcy, 23 Kan. 109; Brenner v. Luth, 28 Kan. 583; Burton v. Larkin, 36 Kan. 245, 59 Am. Rep. 541; Plano Mfg. Co. v. Burrows, 40 Kan. 361; Mumper v. Kelley, 43 Kan. 256.

It would also seem to be well established in Kentucky, where it has been held that section 21 of the Revised Code, ed. 1888, does not take away the right from the real party in interest to bring suit in his name. Smith v. Smith, 5 Bush, 625; Allen v. Thomas, 3 Met. (Ky.) 198, 77 Am. Dec. 169; Lucas v. Chamberlain, 3 B. Mon. 276.

That a party for whose benefit a promise is made to another may maintain an action upon such promise against the party who has made it, though not made to the plaintiff, is a proposition too well established by this court to require a citation of cases to support it. Dodge v. Moss, 82 Ky. 441.

The action was sustained in Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah Water Supply Co. 7 L. R. A. 77, 39 Ky. 840, upon a contract made by the city for the supply of water for the benefit of the inhabitants, by reason of a breach of which contract the company sustained damage, the courts holding the plaintiff to be the real party in interest within the provisions of the civil code.

The same is the law in Louisiana. Ferguson's Succession, 17 La. Ann. 255; New Orleans St. Joseph's Assn. v. Magnier, 16 La. Ann. 338.

In Ashby v. Ashby, 39 La. Ann. 105, it was held that an action could only be brought by one having a real or actual interest which he pursues under the Code of Practice, article 15.

The Maine courts upheld the same doctrine.

If one makes a promise to another for the benefit of a third person the latter may maintain an action upon it. Dearborn v. Parks, 5 Me. 81, 17 Am. Dec. 208; Hinkley v. Fowler, 15 Me. 235.

Where money has been paid by one party to another for the benefit of a third, the latter may maintain an action for the money. Bohanan v. Pope, 43 Me. 93.

The principle was upheld in Carr v. Bartlett, 73 could not be subject to a lien therefor, it was legally a matter of indifference to him whether the work and materials were paid for or not. He had no duty in respect to it. And the question comes to this: Where, in a contract between two persons one promises the other to do something for the benefit of a stranger to the contract, and the promisee has no relation to the thing to be done nor to the stranger to be benefited, can such stranger bring an action to enforce the promise? In some of the text-books and decisions it is stated generally "that, where one person makes a promise to another for the benefit of a third person, that third person may maintain an action upon it." But we do not think there is a case to be found in which such an action was sustained upon a bare promise,

Me. 120, a case of a subscription contract, the mutual promise being a sufficient consideration.

The doctrine in favor of the right to sue is also upheld by the Maryland courts. Coates v. Pennsylvania F. Ins. Co. of Philadelphia, 58 Md. 172, 42 Am. Rep. 327.

So if one has money in hand belonging to a party and promises to pay it to another. Owings v. Owings, 1 Harr. & G. 484.

The earlier Massachusetts decisions follow the doctrine favoring such actions, considering its principles as reasonable and consistent with the character of an action of assumpsit for money had and received. Hall v. Marston, 17 Mass. 575.

In Brewer v. Dyer, 7 Cush. 387, the court also upheld the doctrine, as resting upon a broad and satisfactory basis, the law operating upon the act of the parties creating a duty, establishing a privity and implying a promise and obligation.

In Cabot v. Haskins, 3 Pick. 92, the court held there was no doubt that, in the case of an advance of money by one person to another, with a promise at the request of the party advancing the money to pay the same to a third person, such third person may maintain an action upon the promise.

Where the promise was to the father for the child's benefit when of age, it was held that the child might sue the father having his interests in view when he entered into the transaction, even though the contract was in the father's name. Felton v. Dickinson, 10 Mass. 237. See, however, Marston v. Bigelow, 5 L. R. A. 43, 150 Mass. 45, infra, head "Not maintainable."

The principles established in Hall v. Marston, supra, are followed by the court in Carnegie v. Morrison, 2 Met. 381, an action of assumpsit founded on a letter of credit given by the defendants by their general agent in Boston, in favor of the plaintiffs, and for the purpose of paying in part a debt due from a debtor to the plaintiffs.

The contrary doctrine would, however, seem to be established by the later cases in that state, the general rule being declared to be that a person who is not a party to a simple contract, and from whom no consideration moves, cannot sue on the contract, and therefore a promise made by one person to another for the benefit of a third, who is a stranger to the consideration, will not support an action by the latter. Exchange Bank of St. Louis v. Rice, 107 Mass. 37, 9 Am. Rep. 1.

In the above case the court stated that the cases of Carnegie v. Morrison, and Brewer v. Dyer, supra, were qualified by the later cases where the limits of the doctrine were defined and a disinclination repeatedly expressed to admit new exceptions to the general rule. Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray. 317; Millard v. Baldwin, 8 Gray, 484; Fild v. Crawford, 6 Gray, 116; Dow v. Clark, 7 Gray, 198, settling the law in that state; Colburn v. Phillips, 13 Gray, 64; Flint v. Pierce, 99 Mass. 68, 96 Am. Dec. 691.

The doctrine will not be extended to cases outside of the class mentioned in Mellen v. Whipple, supra; head IV. b, supra; so held in Dow v. Clark, supra, where the defendants by agreement not under seal, for a certain consideration, promised to pay the debts of a railroad company, including certain bonds owned by the plaintiff.

In Millard v. Baldwin, supra, the principle was 35 L. R. A.

confined exclusively to parcel contracts; a case of an agreement founded upon an award under submission to arbitration.

The court in the later case of Exchange Bank of St. Louis v. Rice, supra, looked upon the expressions of opinion in Carnegie v. Morrison and Brewer v. Dyer, supra, as unguarded.

The doctrine established in Exchange Bank of St. Louis v. Rice, supra, was followed in the later cases of Gamwell v. Pomeroy, 121 Mass. 207; Pren-tice v. Brimhall, 123 Mass. 291; Carr v. National Security Bank, 107 Mass. 45, 9 Am. Dec. 6; Rogers v. Union Stone Co. 130 Mass. 581, 89 Am. Rep. 473; Morrill v. Lane, 136 Mass. 98; Marston v. Bigelow, 5 L. R. A. 43, 150 Mass. 45.

The exceptions noticed in Mellen v. Whipple, supra, were not, however, overruled by the above cases. Exchange Bank of St. Louis v. Rice, supra.

In Michigan, the rule is that a promise made by one person to another, for the benefit of a third, a stranger to the consideration, will not support an action by the latter. Linneman v. Moross, 96 Mich. 173.

In the case of Pipp v. Reynolds, 20 Mich. 88, where, as between the third party and the plaintiff, the former had undertaken to do the work, and as between the defendant and such party the defendant was alleged to have promised to carry out that agreement, thus making the performance on such third party's part one of the objects of the second agreement, the court held there was no contract relation between them so far as the latter agreement was concerned, such as would entitle the plaintiff to recover damages for a breach thereof.

The same principle is recognized in Brown v. Hazen, 11 Mich. 219, where the plaintiff sued the defendant in assumpsit upon a promise to pay a note of a debtor of the plaintiff, made by the defendant to such debtor.

The same doctrine is upheld in Halsted v. Francis, 81 Mich. 113, where the only contract proved was between defendant and a third party to pay the latter's note to the plaintiff who was no party to the contract, and gave no consideration and was in no way bound by it, the only consideration being that paid by the third party who was the only one injured by the breach. The case of Brown v. Hazen, supra, is to the same effect.

And again in Turner v. McCarty, 22 Mich. 265; Wheeler v. Stewart, 94 Mich. 445; Hunt v. Strew, 39 Mich. 398; Hidden v. Chappel, 48 Mich. 527; Hicks v. McGarry, 88 Mich. 667; Edwards v. Clement, 81 Mich. 518.

These cases are all distinguished from the case of Osborn v. Osborn, 36 Mich. 48, upon the ground that in that case the promise was made to the plaintiff herself, and there was evidence of her acceptance of the new debtors in place of the old ones, the plaintiff giving up her claim against the original debtor.

And again in Toohy v. Comstock, 45 Mich. 603, a case in which the promise was held to be made directly to such third party, and not to another for his benefit.

It is the law in Minnesota, that a person for whose benefit a promise is made may enforce it, although a stranger to the contract and to the consideration.

with no other circumstances to justify an exception to the general rule that an action upon contract can be maintained only where there is privity of contract between the parties. In Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268,—the most conspicuous and most thoroughly reasoned case in New York, sustaining an action by a stranger to a contract,—the promisee owed the debt which the promisor agreed to pay, and loaned him the money, which he agreed to pay to the promisee's creditor. Thorp v. Keokuk Coal Co. of New York, 48 N. Y. 253, was a case where the grantee in a conveyance of real estate assumed to pay a mortgage resting on it to secure a debt of the grantor. In the syllabus to the case it is stated that it overrules King v. Whitely, 10 Paige, 465, 4 L. ed. 1052, but, as we read

Starlin v. Greenwood, 28 Minn. 521; Maxfield v. Schwartz, 43 Minn. 221.

In Follansbee v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 311, it was stated that the weight of authority was to the effect that with regard to contracts not by specialty, the person for whose benefit the promise was made might enforce it, though a stranger to the contract and to the consideration.

To the same effect, Jordan v. White, 20 Minn. 91; Sanders v. Clason, 13 Minn. 379.

In Welsh v. First Div. St. Paul & P. R. Co., 25 Minn. 314, it was held that the company were liable under the agreement of organization, as sanctioned by the legislature to third parties, in respect to the liabilities assumed by it thereunder.

In the action of a contractor's bond given to a city, it was held that the indemnified party might maintain an action upon such bond in his own name, without joining the city or the board. St. Paul v. Butler, 30 Minn. 459; Morton v. Power, 33 Minn. 521.

The cases of St. Paul v. Butler, and Morton v. Power, supra, were distinguished in State Bank of Duluth v. Heney, 40 Minn. 145, the latter case giving the city the right of action upon the bonds.

In Murphree v. Scovell, 44 Minn. 530, it was held that the action might be prosecuted by the party in whose name the contract was made. Cremer v. Wimmer, 40 Minn. 511, to the same effect.

Where the promise was upon a penal bond executed to the plaintiff by the defendant as principal, and by other defendants as sureties, defendant had entered into a contract with the plaintiff to perform work, and to furnish labor and materials, the bond being given to secure the plaintiff from liens upon the premises for labor done, or materials furnished to the defendant in the performance of his contract; it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover a voluntary payment of a debt of the defendant paid by him, but that for payments necessarily made by the plaintiff the defendant would be liable. Price v. Doyle, 34 Minn. 400.

So in Mississippi where the agreement is adopted by the stranger, or he has a benefit in the transaction. Sweatman v. Parker, 49 Miss. 19; Bonner v. Marx, 51 Miss. 141.

The Missouri courts follow the same doctrine, it being stated as the prevailing doctrine that an action lies on the promise made by a defendant upon a valid consideration to a third person for the benefit of a plaintiff, even though the latter was not privy thereto. Rogers v. Gosnell, 53 Mo. 589; Robbins v. Ayers, 10 Mo. 512, 47 Am. Dec. 125; Markle v. Western U. Telegraph Co. 19 Mo. App. 80; State v. Laclede Gaslight Co. 103 Mo. 472; Bank of Missouri v. Benoit, 10 Mo. 521; Ellis v. Harrison, 104 Mo. 270; Fitzgerald v. Barker, 70 Mo. 635; Schuster v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 60 Mo. 290; Mosman v. Bender, 30 Mo. 579.

The principle in favor of such actions is upheld in Meyer v. Lowell, 44 Mo. 223, where a firm of debtors sold out to the defendants, part of the consideration being the assumption of the debt due to the plaintiff. It was held the plaintiffs were entitled to recovery, and that the plaintiff was not a stranger to the consideration so as to prevent his suing in his own name.

In construing the sections 1990, 1901, of the Missouri Revised Statutes, ed. of 1899, the court took it to be clearly implied that the beneficiary in such a contract was to be regarded as a real party in interest, and that as such he might sue thereon in his own name, while, on the other hand, the contracting party (as trustee of an express trust within the statutory definition), might likewise maintain action on the same contract. Ellis v. Harrison, supra; Snider v. Adams Exp. Co. 77 Mo. 523.

The provisions of the Missouri code allowing a trustee to sue in his own name, upon a contract made for the benefit of the cestui que trust, was held not to affect the right of the beneficiary to sue in his own name, as it existed prior to the code. Rogers v. Gosnell, 51 Mo. 465.

The code has not changed the rule. Ibid.

It was sought to apply the doctrine to the case of damages occasioned by fire owing to an inadequate water supply in an action against the water company under its contract with the municipality brought by a citizen who claimed that the action was made for his benefit and that he had therefore a right to sue, but the court, while upholding the doctrine as the law in that state, held that the case did not come within its limits. Hawson v. Trenton Water Co. (Mo.) 23 L. R. A. 146.

In a note to the above case in 23 L. R. A. 146, the cases upon the question of the right to sue a water company are collected.

Where the promise was made to an administrator to pay the estate of the deceased one half the sum due to such estate upon a demand, in consideration of his releasing a levy of execution, it was held that the administrator could maintain an action against such third person for the benefit of the estate, the estate of the deceased being the real party in interest. Mosman v. Bender, 30 Mo. 579.

And in Nebraska it has been held that where one makes a promise to another for the benefit of a third person, the latter may maintain an action upon the promise, even though the consideration did not move from him. Shamp v. Meyer, 20 Neb. 223.

So in Nevada, the court stating that 'besides the statute, which provides that every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, the beneficiary named in the contract may maintain an action thereon in his own name. Millani v. Tornini, 19 Nev. 133; Rubling v. Hackett, 1 Nev. 360; Alcala v. Morales, 3 Nev. 132; Bishop v. Stewart, 13 Nev. 25, to the same effect.

In New Hampshire the courts seem to require a novation. Warren v. Batchelder, 16 N. H. 530; Clough v. Giles, 64 N. H. 73, both supra.

Such actions were upheld in Jackson v. Smith, 52 N. H. 11.

It would seem to be the rule in New Jersey that such contract cannot be sued upon so far as damages for a breach of duty arising therefrom are concerned. Marvin Safe Co. v. Ward, 46 N. J. L. 12.

But a different rule would seem to exist upon simple contracts. Crowell v. Currier, 27 N. J. Eq. 152.

On a simple contract, an action may be maintained on a promise made by the defendant to a third person for the plaintiff's benefit, without any consideration moving from the plaintiff. Crowell the opinion, it goes no further than to question the reason given by the chancellor in the latter case for sustaining an action in such a case when it can be sustained. The case in 10 Paige was one where the grantee in a conveyance assumed to pay a mortgage on real estate for which the grantor was not personally liable. It was held that the creditor could not recover of the grantee. The chancellor stated as the principle upon which a creditor can recover from a grantee so assuming to pay a debt of the grantor that a creditor is entitled to be subrogated to securities for the debts held by a surety, and that between the grantor and the grantee in such case the latter becomes the principal debtor and the former surety. Another and simpler reason might have been given, to wit, that where

v. Hospital of St. Barnabas, 27 N. J. Eq. 650; Joslin v. New Jersey Car Spring Co. 36 N. J. L. 141; Cocks v. Varney, 45 N. J. Eq. 72.

The New York doctrine was thus stated in Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 230, 25 Am. Rep. 195; to give a third party, who may derive a benefit from the performance of the promise an action, there must be first, an interest by the promisee to secure some benefit to the third party, and second, some privity between the two, the promisee and the party to be benefited, and some obligation or duty owing from the former to the latter, which would give him a legal or equitable claim to the benefit of the promise or an equivalent from him personally. To the same effect: St. Marks Church in Newcastle v. Teed, 120 N. Y. 588; Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 238; Farley v. Cleveland, 4 Cow. 422, 15 Am. Dec. 887; Cleveland v. Farley, 9 Cow. 639; State Bank at New Brunswick v. Mettler, 2 Bosw. 392, 398; Astor v. L'Amoreux, 4 Sandf. 524; Ellwood v. Monk, 5 Wend. 226; Sailey v. Cleveland, 10 Wend. 156; Glen v. Hope Mut. L. Ins. Co. of New York, 56 N. Y. 879; Simson v. Brown, 68 N. Y. 355; Carter v. Holahan, 92 N. Y. 498; Durnherr v. Rau, 136 N. Y. 219.

So in Willis v. Smyth, 91 N. Y. 298, where money was deposited in a bank for a debtor's benefit.

In Todd v. Weber, 95 N. Y. 181, 47 Am. Rep. 20, the court looked upon the doctrine upholding such actions, as the prevailing one and as well settled. To the same effect: Duke of Cumberland v. Codrington, 8 Johns. Ch. 229, 254, 1 L. ed. 601, 610; Butts v. Perkins, 41 Barb. 513; Barker v. Bradley, 42 N. Y. 816, 1 Am. Rep. 521; Schemerhorn v. Vanderheyden, 1 Johns. 129, 8 Am. Dec. 304; Knowles v. Erwin, 43 Hun, 150, where suit was brought by a child upon a contract made with her father for her benefit.

The same principle is upheld in Barker v. Bucklin, 2 Denio, 45, 48 Am. Dec. 728, even though the consideration move from a third party.

Although the consideration does not move from him, Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Westchester County Bank, 4 Denio, 97.

Lawrence v. Fox, supra, was recognized in Litchfield v. Flint, 104 N. Y. 543, where the payee of a note had transferred it upon a promise of valuable consideration to pay it.

The principles upholding such action, upon the ground that the special promise was for the plaintiff's benefit, were recognized in Dolph v. White, 12 N. Y. 300.

In the case of Lawrence v. Fox, supra, a dissenting opinion was filed by Comstock, J., who upheld the doctrine established in the English case of Tweddle v. Atkinson, and distinguished the case from Mellen v. Whipple, supra, upon the ground that it and like cases were cases of trusts.

Some of the judges, however, held the action maintainable upon the principle of agency, the act of the agent being ratified when ascertained. Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 238.

The case of Christ v. Schell, 81 Fed. Rep. 550, sustains the doctrine under the New York code of civil procedure, under which suits must be brought by the parties in interest, causes of action which accrued to one firm being recoverable by another firm which has succeeded to its right.

Where persons indebted to the plaintiff placed a bill of exchange in the hands of defendants for 25 L. R. A. collection, and the latter upon the consideration thereof undertook to collect it and to pay the amount to plaintiffs in satisfaction of their debt against the party making the deposit, it was held that the defendants, having collected the bill, were liable in an action at the suit of the plaintiff upon such promise. Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Westchester County Bank, supra.

In Lorillard v. Clyde, 10 L. R. A. 113, 123 N. Y. 498, it did not appear that the plaintiff made any agreement with defendant to pay its debt, or that the defendant made any promise to the plaintiff, or to the company, to pay the debt, or that either the plaintiff or the other company had any knowledge of the agreement or of the pretended obligation arising from it; until long after the agreement was made and had been in process of performance in other respects, and the court therefore distinguished the case from the principles laid down in Lawrence v. Fox, supra, and held the action not maintainable.

The doctrine in favor of such actions is well established in North Carolina.

In Draughan v. Bunting, 81 N. C. 10, the doctrine in favor of such action was taken as well settled, and it was further recognized in Peacock v. Williams, 98 N. C. 324; Hall v. Robinson, 30 N. C. 54, in the form of an action for money had and received.

Where the right of action rested entirely upon the undertaking on the part of the defendant to surrender property to the owner, the court held the defendant incurred no personal liability enforceable by the plaintiff in an action ex contractu the agreement being one of indemnity to the owner against any one asserting a lien, and was solely between the parties to it with whom the plaintiff was not in privity, there being no promise to pay plaintiff and the defendant having no funds, only holding a note secured from the party by which funds might be derived. Peacock v. Williams, supra.

In the earlier Ohio cases the court would seem to have recognized the right of action in a stranger, but the rule must now be understood and applied with its proper qualifications. Thompson v. Thompson, 4 Ohio St. 333; Crumbaugh v. Kugler, 3 Ohio St. 549; Bazaley v. Waters, 7 Ohio St. 369; Miller v. Florer, 15 Ohio St. 151; Brewer v. Maurer, 38 Ohio St. 543, 43 Am. Rep. 438; Emmitt v. Brophy, 42 Ohio St. 82; Trimble v. Strother, 25 Ohio St. 378.

Such actions are maintainable under the Oregon code. Baker v. Eglin, 11 Or. 333; Holladay v. Davis, 5 Or. 43.

The principles were further supported by Hughes v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co., 11 Or. 437, a third party being the real party in interest under the general laws of the state.

In Schneider v. White, 12 Or. 508, the doctrine was considered as too well settled to require authority to support it.

In Pennsylvania it is held that if one party pays money to another for the use of a third person, or, having money belonging to another, agrees with that other to pay it to a third, an action will lie by the person beneficially interested. Blymire v. Boistie, 6 Watts, 182, 31 Am. Dec. 453.

He for whose benefit a promise is made, may maintain an action upon it, even though no consideration passed from him, nor any promise was one delivers to or leaves in the hands of another a fund with which to satisfy an obligation of the former, a duty in the nature of a trust is thereby created. The decision in 10 Paige was followed in Trotter v. Hughes, 12 N. Y. 74, 62 Am. Dec. 137, and approved in Garnsey v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 233, 7 Am. Rep. 440. In Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 195, similar in its facts to the case in 10 Paige, the court go over the whole ground, recognize the decision in Lawrence v. Fox, and hold the two decisions consistent, and follow that in 10 Paige. It lays down this rule: "To give a third party who may derive a benefit from the performance of the promise an action there must be—First, an intent by the promisee to secure some benefit to the third party; and, second, made direct to him. Hostetter v. Hollinger, 117 Pa. 606; Hind v. Holdship, 2 Watts, 104, 26 Am. Dec. 107; Justice v. Tallman, 86 Pa. 147; Townsend v. Long, 77 Pa. 143, 18 Am. Rep. 438; Beers v. Robinson, 9 Pa. 223; Grim v. Thomas Iron Co. 115 Pa. 611; Eling v. Zantlinger, 13 Pa. 50, where a landlord gave his tenant an order to pay the rent to a creditor of such landlords, the order being accepted by the tenant; Campbell v. Lacock, 40 Pa. 448; Merriman v. Moore, 90 Pa. 78; Wynn v. Wood, 97 Pa. 216; Cummings v. Klapp, 5 Watts & S. 511; Commercial Bank of Cincinnati v. Wood, 7 Watts & S. 89, where a bank took a draft in payment of a note in their hands and agreed to pay the note, the holder of the note assenting to the arrangement, and he was held entitled to sue the bank; Vincent v. Watson, 18 Pa. 96, where the lessees of a debtor undertook to pay certain debts and assume certain liabilities for which they were to be allowed in the rent account, the lessees publicly assuming the claims.

The doctrine is thus stated in Townsend v. Long, 77 Pa. 143, 18 Am. Rep. 438, where there is a transfer of a fund to the promisor for the payment of a debt, he is liable to the creditor on his verbal promise made to the owner of the fund, or for property charged with the payment of the debt by transfer to him, on his promise to the vendor to pay the debt, he is liable to an action by the creditor.

The action is looked upon as not simply to pay the debt of another, but to hand over funds appropriated by the debtor himself to the creditor, for whose benefit they were deposited, the creditor being the party to be benefited becoming the owner of the fund impressed with a trust in his favor. Justice v. Tallman, 86 Pa. 147.

In Ramsdale v. Horton, 3 Pa. 330, the action was to recover from the defendant money borrowed of the plaintiff by another party, which the defendant had promised such party to pay to the plaintiff in discharge of his debt. It was held that the plaintiff's action could not be maintained, unless he accepted the defendant as his debtor in the place of the original debtor, and that on no other foundation could the right to sue stand.

Where a debtor promised a constable, having an execution in his hands, to pay the same, it was held that such promise could only be enforced by the constable and not by the creditor, the plaintiff in the action, as it was made to the constable for his own use, being not only to pay the debt but the costs to which the plaintiff had no claim. Cummings v. Klapp, 5 Watts & S. 511.

In Rhode Island such an action is generally upheld, the contract being considered as not within the statute of frauds. Wood v. Moriarty, 15 R. I. 518; Urquhart v. Brayton, 12 R. I. 169; Merriman v. Social Mfg. Co. 12 R. I. 176.

In South Carolina the action is maintainable by the third party. Brown v. O'Brien, 1 Rich. L. 268, 44 Am. Dec. 254, where notes had been placed in defendant's hands upon his promise to hand them to plaintiff; Thompson v. Gordon, 3 Strobb. L. 126, a case of a promise by a son to his father for the payment of certain moneys to his sisters upon the father's death.

In Tennessee the right of such third party is looked upon and enforced upon the principle of the 26 L. R. A.

equitable doctrine, which allows a vendor to proceed, either against the estate sold, or against the purchase money in the hands of a sub-purchaser for damages for breach of contract, likening the action of assumpsit to an equitable one, investing the party with a right to recover what in equity belongs to him. Moore v. Stovall, 2 Lea, 543.

In Texas the real party in interest must sue. Thompson v. Cartwright, 1 Tex. 87, 46 Am. Dec. 96; Monroe v. Buchanan, 27 Tex. 247.

In Thompson v. Cartwright, supra, the party appearing to be the holder of a note was allowed to sue in his own name.

In Vermont, the doctrine in favor of such actions prevails. Arlington v. Hinds, 1 D. Chip. 431, 12 Am. Dec. 704; Rutland & B. R. Co. v. Cole, 24 Vt. 83, a case of an action of assumpsit upon a promissory note, to which cases the court extended the doctrine.

The action may be brought in the name of those in interest, without joining those in whose name the contract was made, and the suit may always be brought in the name of the contracting parties. Lapham v. Green, 9 Vt. 407.

The legal interest in a contract is in the person to whom the promise is made and from whom the consideration passes, and he is the person who must bring the action, and a person claiming to come within the exception to the rule must bring himself strictly within the exceptions. Hall v. Huntoon, 17 Vt. 244, 44 Am. Dec. 332.

In the ordinary case of the receipt of property or money by one party, with an undertaking to pay a debt due to a third party, such third party is entitled to the action in his own name. Where, however, the contract is special, the party with whom it is made can alone sue, the courts holding that after the money is realized it belongs absolutely to the third person, and the law implies the promise to pay. Phelps v. Conant, 30 Vt. 277; Crampton v. Ballard, 10 Vt. 251.

In United States Nat. Bank v. Burton, 58 Vt. 426, it is said to be settled in that state, contrary to the general rule of commercial law, that an action upon a promissory note might be maintained in the name of the party beneficially interested, where the note was in terms made payable to his agent, the treasurer or cashier. Rutland & B. R. Co. v. Cole, 24 Vt. 83, to the same effect.

In Virginia the doctrine that a party for whose benefit a contract is made may sue thereon, is upheld, the court stating that such a rule was in accordance with sound principles, and also with well established principles of law, it being the justice of the action to enforce a solemn contract of a party based upon a valuable consideration, received and enjoyed by him. Moore v. Stovall, 2 Lea, 543.

The doctrine was recognized in Ross v. Milne, 13 Leigh, 204, 37 Am. Dec. 646, where there was an executed gift and a valuable consideration. See Osborne v. Cabell, 77 Va. 462.

In Johnson v. McClung, 26 W. Va. 650, the court construed the second section of chapter 71 of the West Virginia Code, as follows: If a covenant or promise be made for the sole benefit of a person with whom it is not made, or (if a covenant or promise made for the sole benefit of a person) with some privity between the two,—the promisee and the party to be benefited,—and some obligation or duty owing from the former to the latter which would give him a legal or equitable claim to the benefit of the promise, or an equivalent from him personally." "There must be either a new consideration, or some prior right or claim against one of the contracting parties, by which he has a legal interest in the performance of the agreement;" and "there must be some legal right, founded upon some obligation of the promisee, in the third party, to adopt and claim the promise as made for his benefit." In some cases, near relationship, as of father and daughter, or uncle and nephew, has been held to supply the place of a strictly legal right in the third party. Dutton v. Pool, 1 Vent. 318; Felton whom it is made jointly with others, such person may maintain in his own name any action thereon, which he might maintain in case it had been made with him only, and the consideration had moved from him to the party making such covenant or promise.

In Wisconsin, the case of Kimball v. Noyes, 17 Wis. 606, confirms the doctrine in favor of such actions, and suggests that they exist, even in the case of bonds and other specialties.

The doctrine is declared settled in Putney v. Farnham, 27 Wis. 187, even though the consideration did not move from such party. Kollock v. Parcher, 52 Wis. 393; Jones v. Foster, 67 Wis. 296; Grant v. Diebold Safe & Lock Co. 87 Wis. 72; McDowell v. Laev, 86 Wis. 176; Keeler v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 16 Wis. 523, 84 Am. Dec. 714.

See also "State statutes" infra, 224.

XVII. Not maintainable.

In Weller v. Goble, 66 Iowa, 118, it was sought to apply the principles in favor of such actions to a guarantee of a contract with the owner of property in favor of materialmen but it was not intended for their benefit so as to give them a right to sue.

In an action upon a breach of contract for the advance of money, it was held that persons not parties, with whom there was no undertaking to advance, and therefore no privity, had no right of action. Cardwell v. Atwater, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 570.

In Marston v. Bigelow, 5 L. R. A. 43, 150 Mass. 45, it was held that a promise, made by one person to another for the benefit of a third, a stranger to the consideration, would not support an action by the latter, and that a person not a party to a contract could not sue upon it.

Where one of the parties had contracted to sell the property in question to the other defendant, and the latter defendant had contracted with the plaintiff for the sale of the same property to him, the plaintiff being ready and willing to perform the contract, but the last-named defendant had refused to complete his contract with the other defendant, the court held the plaintiff was not a party to the first contract, which was still executory, and that neither party could be compelled to specifically perform the same. McCarthy v. Couch, 37 Minn. 124.

Where the plaintiff sought to show that his debtor had put demands into the hands of the defendant for collection, which the latter agreed to collect and to pay the proceeds to certain creditors, but there was no evidence to show the amount of the demands to be collected, or the demands to be paid, or that the defendant had paid any of the other demands which he had agreed to pay, or that either of those demands was entitled to priority, it was held that an instruction to the jury that the plaintiff could not succeed unless the money was received under the agreement to appropriate it specifically to pay the plaintiff's debt, or unless the defendant had collected sufficient to pay all the demands which he had assumed to pay, was correct. Fitch v. Chandler, 4 Cub. 256.

In Marston v. Bigelow, supra, the court stated that the case of Felton v. Dickinson, 10 Mass. 287, could not be fairly regarded as establishing a general rule, that a son may sue upon a promise made for his benefit to his father, although the nearness of the relation might be evidence that the promise was made to the father as acting on behalf of and as agent for the son, and there was a promise to the son; but that when the promise was not made to the son and the consideration did not move from him, there was no reason why the nearness of the relation should change the general rule, that a man cannot sue upon a contract to which he is not a party or privy.

In Anderson v. Fitzgerald, 21 Fed. Rep. 294, it was attempted to apply the doctrine to the case of a contract by the defendant, with a railroad company for the construction of a certain part of the company's road, which stipulated among other things that the defendant would pay all claims against him or against any sub-contractor under him, for services and labor or materials furnished, and to pay all claims growing out of the work, whether against him or any sub-contractor, for trespass and injury to lands, fences, timber, the use of land for waste and all claims for provisions and supplies, and bills for the board of men, the teams engaged upon the work and similar claims, the damages to be estimated and paid as specified in the contract, the contract providing that in case of damage to the lands or property in the vicinity of the work, the resident engineer should estimate the damage and pay the same to the owner, deducting on his first estimate the amount paid for the value of the work done under the contract; and it was further provided that in all cases the claims for labor and material should be deducted and retained and paid to such claimants, or held till such dues were paid or settled; under which contract the defendant sublet the work, the agreement with the sub-contractor providing that the defendant shall have the same right to pay claims against the sub-contractor which the company had reserved to themselves, and the petition alleged that the sub-contractor gave orders to the plaintiffs for supplies and labor, which the plaintiffs paid and sought to recover by the action, and the court held that under the above facts the doctrine did not apply.

In a recent case, Constable v. National R. & Co., 154 U. S. 51, 38 L. ed. 903, where an agreement had been entered into between a carrier and the collector of customs to pay the consignee the value of the goods burned, made as a condition to the collector's permit for the goods to remain upon the wharf forty-eight hours, the court held it was not an agreement upon which the owners could sue as adding to the obligation of their contract with the carrier, the bill of lading stating that the goods should be at the consignee's risk.

In this case the first contract was made by the defendant in full contemplation of the fact that it would be obliged to enter into the second and for the special purpose of providing against it, and the court considered it an absurdity to hold that having entered into one contract, knowing that a second would have to be made, wholly inconsistent, the defendant intended to be bound by it. Constable v. National R. & Co. 154 U. S. 51, 38 L. ed. 903.

The court further held that there was a want of privity, and there was no knowledge of the con-

v. Dickinson, 10 Mass. 287,—are instances of such. To enforce such a promise in favor of a third party, where there is no obligation to benefit him on the part of the promisor or promisee, nor anything such as near relationship, nor any consideration from the third party, would be much like enforcing an intended gift or gratuity. Vrooman v. Turner settled the law in New York, as the decision, though subsequently referred to with approval (see Wilbur v. Warren, 104 N. Y. 198; Litchfield v. Flint, 104 N. Y. 548; Comley v. Dorian, 114 N. Y. 161; Lorillard v. Clyde, 123 N. Y. 498, 10 L. R. A. 113; Durnherr v. Rau, 185 N. Y. 219), has never since been questioned. The question was considered and the cases in Massachusetts summed up in an able and exhaustive opinion by tract, no change in the position of the parties, no new consideration moving from the plaintiffs, and and that though the contract was nominally made for their benefit the gift of the collector was voluntary, the contract really for his benefit. Ibid.

A strong dissenting opinion was delivered in the above case by Jackson, Field, and Gray, JJ., in which the right to maintain such action was upheld upon the lines shown in the case of Vrooman v. Turner, 60 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 196, there being an intent to benefit, privity of contract and an obligation cast upon the defendant to care for the goods. Constable v. National S. S. Co. supra.

XVIII. Contracts under seal.

Where the contract or promise is by an instrument under seal, the court are divided in their opinion, some maintaining the right of action while others reject it, the latter being the doctrine of the majority.

The doctrine in favor of such actions in cases of this nature is upheld in Alabama where the promise is assented to. Huckabee v. May, 14 Ala. 263.

The rule is by the statute (Rev. Stat. 1880, § 1013) extended to cases where the undertaking is under seal and therefore the case of Moore v. House, 64 Ill. 162, is declared to be no longer law in that state. Harms v. McCormick, 30 Ill. App. 125; Dean v. Walker, 107 Ill. 540, 47 Am. Rep. 487, to the same effect.

By section 19 of chapter 110, Practice Statutes of Illinois, 1872, every instrument under seal, except penal bonds, may be sued and declared upon as if they were unsealed. Adam v. Arnold, 36 Ill. 186.

There was no distinction between a simple contract and a contract under seal (Rogers v. Gosnell, 51 Mo. 466; Fitzgerald v. Barker, 70 Mo. 686; Heim v. Vogel, 60 Mo. 629), and is extended to a covenant in a deed poll.

It makes no difference that the contract is under seal. Hughes v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 11 Or. 437.

Applies equally to instruments under seal. Emmitt v. Brophy, 43 Ohio St. 32.

So in the case of Bassett v. Hughes, 43 Wis. 319, which regarded it as settled, both with respect to simple and specialty contract. McDowell v. Laev, 36 Wis. 171.

The doctrine was applied to a case of covenant, by a husband to pay for the wife's maintenance and support upon a permanent separation, giving her a right to reside where and with whom she chose. Houghton v. Milburn, 54 Wis. 554.

The contrary doctrine has been held in the following:

No one can maintain an action at law upon a contract under seal but a party thereto, one for whose benefit it is made cannot sue. Willard v. Wood, 135 U. S. 809, 34 L. ed. 210.

When the contract is under seal, the action must be in the name of the obligee, though the agreement may be for the benefit of another. Miller v. Kingsbury, 28 Ill. App. 532; Moore v. House, 64 Ill. 162; Gautzert v. Hoge, 73 Ill. 30. But these cases would seem to be no longer law in that state. See cases supra.

It is a technical and inflexible rule, that if a deed on the face of it expressly describe and denote who are the parties to it, a third person cannot sue 25 L. R. A.

thereon. Haskett v. Flint, 5 Blackf. 60, 33 Am. Dec. 452.

Where one covenants with another to do any act for the benefit of a third, the action cannot be maintained upon such covenant in the name of the third person for whose benefit it was made. Hinkley v. Fowler, 15 Me. 236.

The right of action on a sealed instrument belongs to the party having the legal interest. So held in Northampton v. Elwell, 4 Gray, 81, where the action was brought by the plaintiffs on a bond made to the commonwealth, for the use of the plaintiff town, the law being stated to be now well settled on that point.

The same conclusion was arrived at in Bobb v. Mudge, 14 Gray, 584, where the defendant's promise to pay the partnership debts of a firm was by way of covenant and under seal.

Upon an agreement under seal one not a party to it cannot maintain an action at law. Flynn v. North American L. Ins. Co. 115 Mass. 449; Pettee v. Peppard, 130 Mass. 522.

In the case of an instrument under seal made for the benefit of a third person, the action cannot be maintained by the latter. Robbins v. Ayres, 10 Mo. 542, 47 Am. Dec. 125.

An action will not lie upon a covenant made for the benefit of a third party by the latter. Howe v. How, 1 N. H. 49, a case of a promise by way of covenant to maintain a wife if she survive her husband.

A stranger to a contract cannot sue at law, upon a deed which contains no covenant with him in express terms. Crowell v. Hospital of St. Barnabas, 27 N. J. Eq. 650. To the same effect, Cooks v. Varney, 45 N. J. Eq. 72.

The doctrine in favor of such actions was held to apply to both simple and specialty contracts. Coster v. Albany, 43 N. Y. 399.

In the case of a covenant under seal, the action must be in the covenantee, even though it were exclusively for the benefit of a third person and the consideration moved from him. Mississippi Cent. R. Co. v. Southern R. Asso. 8 Phila. 107; De Bolle v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co. 4 Whart. 68.

Where, however, it is for the benefit of a third person, he would have such an exclusive equitable ownership of the money when received as would entitle him to use the name of the covenantee in an action brought for his benefit. Mississippi Cent. R. Co. v. Southern R. Asso. supra.

The action in such cases must be brought in the name of the covenantee, even though the instrument may be expressed to be for the benefit of a third person. Fairchild v. North-Eastern Mut. L. Asso. 51 Vt. 618.

The right to sue under an indenture inter partes, is confined to the parties to it. Ross v. Milne, 13 Leigh, 204, 37 Am. Dec. 445.

In an action of covenant upon a deed inter partes, whereby the defendant covenanted with the covenantee to instruct the plaintiff in a certain line, it was held that the plaintiff could not sue for breach of the covenant, although the obligation purported to be made for his sole advantage, and contained an express covenant to perform the act for his benefit. Haskett v. Flint, 5 Blackf. 60, 33 Am. Dec. 452.

But where the assignment was made by a debtor

Metcalf, J., in Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 817. That was the case of an agreement by a grantee of real estate to pay a mortgage for which the grantor was not personally liable. It was held the creditor could not recover from the grantee. The court attempts to to the defendant in trust for certain creditors, the defendant did not execute the instrument under seal, but accepted the trust and proceeded to execute it, paying all the creditors except the plaintiff, whom on demand he refused to pay. The court held the plaintiff entitled to recover, and that no special promise was necessary to render the defendant liable. Frost v. Gage, 1 Allen, 262.

XIX. Insurance contracts.

The doctrine applicable to simple contracts, generally, and the appropriate and well-established doctrine of contract of insurance, is, that if one makes a promise to another for the benefit of a third, the latter can maintain an action on it in his own name. Motley v. Manufacturers Ins. Co. 29 Me. 337, 50 Am. Rep. 501; Walsh v. Washington Marine Ins. Co. 32 N. Y. 440, where the policy of insurance was "on account of whom it may concern."

In Motley v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., supra, mortgaged property was insured by the mortgagor in his own name, the policy containing a stipulation that in case of loss the same was to be paid to the plaintiffs, the mortgagees of the premises, and the question was whether the plaintiff could maintain an action for the policy moneys in his own name. The court held that such action was maintainable, and that the act of issuing process was a sufficient acceptance of the benefit.

Where a clause was inserted in a policy of insurance issued to a mortgagor, that the loss, if any, should be payable to the mortgagee, the latter sued on the policy in his own name. Keeler v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 16 Wis. 523, 84 Am. Dec. 714. Ripley v. Astor Ins. Co. 17 How. Pr. 444, to the same effect.

In Pitney v. Glen's Falls Ins. Co., 65 N. Y. 14, it was held that the words "as his interest may appear," in an insurance policy, imported an interest in a third person so as to entitle him to an action upon the policy.

Where, by agreement, the defendant agreed to reinsure an insurance company on all risks upon its policies outstanding at that date, and also to assume all such policies and pay to the holders thereof, all such sums as the said company might by force of such policies become liable to pay, it was held in an action upon a policy that the defendant, by force of its agreement had become liable to the plaintiffs upon the principles established in Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268; Glen v. Hope Mut. L. Ins. Co. of New York, 56 N. Y. 379, 381.

In Farrow v. Commonwealth Ins. Co., 18 Pick. 53, 29 Am. Dec. 564, where a vessel was insured by brokers for the owners, the insurance money payable to such brokers, it was held that the owners might sue in their own names, the brokers consenting to the suit.

In Mosser v. Donaldson (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 153, the question was whether a clause or expression in an insurance policy, "for the benefit of whom it may concern" gave the plaintiffs a right of action as being the parties for whose benefit the contract of insurance was made, there being a plain declaration in the policy that the persons "whom it may concern" were the parties thereto, and it was held that a third party could not sue under the policy.

The real party in interest may sue. Lane v. Columbus Ins. Co. 2 Code Rep. 66, a case of a policy of insurance effected by an agent in his own name, with a proviso that he alone could sue thereon, in which the court held the proviso invalid.

XX. Partnership transactions.

The theory in favor of such actions has in some 25 L. R. A.

cases also been extended to partnership transactions, in cases where a party has purchased a firm's business, assuming its liabilities as part of the consideration; where a continuing partner has agreed to discharge the firm's debts.

The promise or agreement of the defendants was, in legal effect, to pay the creditors the debts due from the vendors of the defendants, from whom the consideration moved. Maxfield v. Schwartz, 43 Minn. 221.

Again, in Shober & C. Lithographing Co. v. Kerting, 107 Ill. 344, a case of a purchase of a firm's business, assuming its indebtedness as part of the consideration, the court held the assumption of the indebtedness was a sufficient consideration.

So in Clafin v. Ostrom, 54 N. Y. 581, where in consideration of the transfer of a firm's property to the defendant, he agreed to pay the firm's debt.

Where the members of a partnership concern entered into an agreement with the defendants for a transfer of the business of the partnership, the defendant assuming the liabilities of the concern, the court held that by their agreement with the vendors the defendants made the outstanding debts of the firm a liability of their own. Maxfield v. Schwartz, supra.

Where an incoming partner agreed to pay part of the debts of the old firm as part of the consideration for the partnership. Wheat v. Rice, 97 N. Y. 296; Serviss v. McDonnell, 107 N. Y. 260.

Where, however, by the terms of the contract to purchase the share of a partner, it was agreed that the outstanding debts were sufficient to discharge the outstanding liabilities, and that if they proved otherwise the debtor would pay the deficiency, it was held that the creditors could not hold the incoming partner liable upon his promise to pay for the debts based upon such covenant. Edick v. Green, 38 Hun, 202.

Where a partnership firm disposed of the business, the purchaser undertaking to pay the firm's debts, it was held a creditor could not sue upon such verbal contract, as the contract, although good inter partes, was void as to such creditor under the statute of frauds, the creditors not having given up their original claims and accepted the new contract instead, for the reason that while the old debt remains a new contract cannot be substituted. Shoemaker v. King, 40 Pa. 107.

Where the action alleged a partnership debt owing to the plaintiffs, and a sale by one partner to the defendant upon his assuming and paying the same, the court distinguished the case upon the ground that a debt already existed and showed no privity of contract. Manny v. Frasier, 27 Mo. 412.

Where a covenant was entered into upon the dissolution of a partnership by the continuing party, to discharge the debts of the firm, it was held that the creditors were entitled to the benefit thereof. Devol v. McIntosh, 23 Ind. 529.

In Zeil's App., 111 Pa. 532, there was a contract between partners to apply the assets, remaining at the time of the dissolution, to a payment of the individual debts of one of the partners enumerated in the articles, such partner being heavily in debt at the formation of the partnership, and the agreement being shown and known to the creditors and made for their benefit. The court held they had a clear right to enforce it, although not parties thereto.

In Merrill v. Green, 55 N. Y. 270, however, where a partner gave a bond with surety for the payment of the firm's debts, upon a dissolution, it was held that the firm's creditors could not recover against the obligors, whose only liability was to the obliclassify the cases in that state in which one not a party to the promise has been permitted to sue upon it. The classification may be briefly stated as—First, cases where the defendant has in his hands money which in equity and good conscience belongs to the gee, and distinguished the case from Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268.

Where a creditor sought to recover upon an agreement, between his debtor and a person not a partner in the firm, to pay a portion of the firm's indebtedness, it is held such indebtedness would not lie as it could not be shown to be for his benefit, or that it covered any portion of his debt. Wheat v. Rice, 97 N. Y. 268.

XXI. Purchase subject to a lien, debt, or mortgage.

With respect to a purchase of property subject to a debt, lien, or mortgage, the question has arisen whether the original creditor, lienor, or mortgagee has a right to sue upon the undertaking of the purchaser as made for his benefit, and the courts have upheld such actions as coming within the doctrines which favor the right of a third party to sue upon a contract made for his benefit, in cases where the vendor was personally liable for the amount and the purchaser has covenanted or assumed the debt or liability as part of the consideration of the purchase.

The liability of the grantee in such a deed rests upon the doctrine that where one person promises another to do an act for the benefit of a third person, such third person may maintain an action. Thorpe v. Keokuk Coal Co. of New York, 48 N. Y. 263.

Such a promise is primary and not collateral. Huyler v. Atwood, 26 N. J. Eq. 504, 28 N. J. Eq. 275.

Where the grantor is in equity bound to pay the debt as his own, then the covenant may be treated as a promise made for the benefit of the lienor, and may be enforced in a legal action, although the primary object of the covenant was to protect the grantor against his personal liability for the debt secured upon the land. Pardee v. Treat, 38 N. Y. 268; Burr v. Beers, 24 N. Y. 178, 30 Am. Dec. 327.

The principle extends to cases where personal property is the subject of the contract, and where real estate is conveyed upon which there is a mortgage, the amount of which the grantee promises to pay the mortgagee. Dingeldein v. Third Avenue R. Co. 37 N. Y. 575; Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268; Burr v. Beers, supra; Hartley v. Harrison, 24 N. Y. 171; Russell v. Pistor, 7 N. Y. 171, 57 Am. Dec. 509.

The legal effect of the transaction is to leave the portion of the purchase money, represented by the incumbrance, in the hands of the purchaser for the purpose of paying the incumbrance, and the promise being made for the benefit of the holder of the incumbrance, he may maintain an action to enforce it. Twichell v. Mears, 8 Biss. 211.

The purchaser, however, must covenant to pay the mortgage. Brewer v. Maurer, 38 Ohio St. 542, 48 Am. Rep. 436.

If the defendant comes into possession by reason of a contract under which he promises to pay, he is liable. Pope v. Porter, 38 Fed. Rep. 7.

The law will imply an agreement to pay upon which an action of assumpsit will lie by the mortgagee. Twichell v. Mears, supra; Urquhart v. Brayton, 12 R. I. 160.

In Urquhart v. Brayton, supra, the court stated that the purchaser not only bought the estate subject to the mortgages, but impliedly assumed to pay the mortgages as part of the consideration.

To the same effect, Hayden v. Snow, 9 Biss. 511, a case of the assumption of a mortgage debt.

In such an action the property is considered as belonging in equity to the plaintiff who is entitled by virtue of the mortgage to take possession, sell and apply the proceeds in payment of the debt. Pope v. Porter, supra.

The promise, though not made directly to the complainant, is looked upon as inuring to his benefit, and upon his acceptance of it, he can sue in his own name, either at law or in equity. Carver v. Eads, 65 Ala. 190.

It must be shown, however, that the contract is for the benefit of the mortgagee, and is made with that intent. Meech v. Ensign, 49 Conn. 191, 44 Am. Dec. 225.

Otherwise the mortgagee cannot avail himself of the purchaser's assumption to pay the mortgage. Norwood v. De Hart, 30 N. J. Eq. 412.

The purchaser's promise to pay the creditor or mortgagee the amount owing by the vendor is a sufficient consideration for the promise and will support an action by the creditor or mortgagee against the promisor. Helms v. Kearns, 40 Ind. 124; Allen v. Bucknam, 75 Mo. 362, a case of a purchase of property assuming a lien, both the vendor and the original lienor assenting.

Such a purchaser is not a stranger to a privity, and is subject to the same rules which prevail against his vendor, becoming the principal debtor. Figart v. Halderman, 75 Ind. 537.

The assumption of the vendor's indebtedness as part of the consideration creates the personal liability. George v. Andrews, 60 Md. 26, 45 Am. Rep. 706.

As between the parties to such an instrument the purchaser becomes the principal and the mortgagor the surety. Ibid.; Paine v. Jones, 76 N. Y. 274; Willard v. Worsham, 76 Va. 362; Huyler v. Atwood, 26 N. J. Eq. 504.

The right of the mortgagee is simply a right to substitution, subject, however, to the equities between the purchaser and his immediate grantor. Osborne v. Cabell, 77 Va. 462.

The amount allowed to the grantee out of the purchase money, by reason of his assumption of the mortgage, is a fund in his hands applicable to the payment of the mortgage in exoneration of the grantor. Willard v. Worsham, supra.

The mortgagee or creditor is entitled upon equitable principles to the benefit of all collateral securities held by the debtor, and may therefore resort, by way of equitable subrogation, to the covenant of the purchaser. Ibid.

Such a covenant creates an additional security for the mortgage debt and inures as a promise to the mortgagee. Wilbur v. Warren, 104 N. Y. 193.

It must, however, be shown that such original mortgagor was himself personally liable. Carter v. Holahan, 38 N. Y. 498; Wilbur v. Warren, supra; Norwood v. De Hart, 30 N. J. Eq. 412; Spencer v. Spencer, 95 N. Y. 853.

In Campbell v. Smith, 71 N. Y. 26, 27 Am. Rep. 5, the covenant to pay the mortgage was absolute, and the mortgagee had therefore the right to enforce it, the court recognizing the principles established in Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268.

By the acceptance of such a deed containing a covenant to pay, a grantee becomes liable as covenantor. Bowen v. Beck, 94 N. Y. 38, 46 Am. Rep. 124.

Such agreement is within the equity of the provisions of the revised statutes, authorizing the court of chancery in foreclosure proceedings to make a decree over for the deficiency against a third person liable for the payment of a mortgage debt. Halsey v. Reed, 9 Paige, 446, 4 L. ed. 769.

The principles upon which such actions are maintainable were considered as settled in Dingeldein v. Third Avenue R. Co. 37 N. Y. 575.

The principles laid down in Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268, and Burr v. Beers, 24 N. Y. 178, 30 Am.

plaintiff,—as, if A. put money or property in the hands of B. as a fund from which A's creditors are to be paid, and B. has promised expressly or impliedly to pay such creditors; second, cases where a near relationship, as father and child, or uncle and nephew, exists

Dec. 327, were followed in Ricard v. Sanderson, 41 N. Y. 179, the case of a purchase subject to a mortgage, the grantee assuming the liability.

And again in Turk v. Ridge, 41 N. Y. 208; Thorpe v. Keokuk Coal Co. of New York, 48 N. Y. 258; Calco v. Davies, 78 N. Y. 211, 20 Am. Rep. 120; Pardee v. Treat, 82 N. Y. 385.

Where the purchaser assumes payment as portion of the purchase money he becomes personally liable for the payment of the mortgage. Hartley v. Harrison, 24 N. Y. 170; Burr v. Beers, supra, where a personal action was upheld, the court recognizing the principles of Lawrence v. Fox, supra.

In Snell v. Ives, 85 Ill. 279, where the action was brought upon a promise made to pay the debts and undertakings of a railroad company upon the purchase of its property.

In the case of an agreement to pay a bond for the payment of a debt in the purchase of property. Beasley v. Webster, 64 Ill. 458.

To the same effect, Carter v. Zenblin, 68 Ind. 436; Arnold v. Lyman, 17 Mass. 400, 9 Am. Dec. 154; Crawford v. Edwards, 38 Mich. 354; Unger v. Smith, 44 Mich. 22; Higman v. Stewart, 38 Mich. 523; Miller v. Thompson, 34 Mich. 10; Tichenor v. Dodd, 4 N. J. Eq. 454; Stariba v. Greenwood, 28 Minn. 521; Follansbee v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 311.

Where the purchaser assumes the payment of a mortgage or prior lien as part of the consideration. Dean v. Walker, 107 Ill. 540, 47 Am. Rep. 467; Crawford v. Edwards, and Unger v. Smith, supra; Cooper v. Foss, 15 Neb. 515; Willard v. Worsham, 78 Va. 362.

In Dean v. Walker, supra, the opinion of the court was dissented from by Sheldon, Ch. J., and Dickey, J.

Where a married woman sued upon a promise made by the purchaser of property from her husband, to pay her a certain sum in lieu of her inchoate right to dower. Worley v. Sipe, 111 Ind. 238.

In Mize v. Barnes, 73 Ky. 506, the sole question was whether, if by an arrangement between the vendor and vendee, the latter executed a note for the purchase money to a third person, a lien could be retained in the deed in favor of such third person. The court held that such being the intention of the parties it might be retained for the benefit of the third person with her consent, although such third party was not a party to the deed, the contract being made with the grantor for the benefit of such party, and therefore enforceable by such party.

And again where the defendant had the use and occupation of land belonging to the plaintiff under a promise to pay rent. Brewer v. Dyer, 5 Cush. 337.

Such an action was maintained in Therasson v. McSpedon, 2 Hilt. 3, where the defendant agreed to pay the liabilities, and a certain sum to shareholders of a mining company upon the purchase of its property.

In Cashman v. Henry, 75 N. Y. 103, 31 Am. Rep. 437, it was held that a married woman was personally liable upon her covenant to pay a mortgage debt, as part of the consideration for property purchased.

So in Beers v. Robinson, 9 Pa. 229, where the plaintiff was a creditor and proved that his debtor's property was sold at auction, and the notes given by the purchasers were handed to defendant, who promised the debtor to pay his debts so far as they and the property purchased by the defendant would go.

In such a case, however, the grantor may release the grantee from liability, and in such a case he will not be liable to the prior mortgagee. Arnaud v. Grigg, 29 N. J. Eq. 482.

Where, however, the conveyance is simply "subject to a mortgage" without any express agreement to pay, none will be implied and the grantee assumes no personal liability. Dingeldien v. Third Avenue R. Co., 37 N. Y. 575; Belmont v. Coman, 23 N. Y. 438, 78 Am. Dec. 213.

It is necessary that there should be something further than a mere statement in the conveyance that the deed is made subject to the mortgage. Stebbing v. Hall, 29 Barb. 530.

Where the conveyance was taken of land, subject to a mortgage, the grantee covenanting to indemnify the grantor against the mortgage, it was held that the grantee having died intestate, the land was the primary fund to be resorted to, and that there was no personal liability attaching. Duke of Cumberland v. Codrington, 3 Johns. Ch. 229, 254, 1 L. ed. 601, 610.

Such an action cannot be maintained, where the mortgagee acquires no independent equity arising from the dealings between himself and the subsequent grantee of the mortgaged premises, and stands exclusively on the engagement of the grantee with his grantor to assume and pay the mortgage debt. Youngs v. Trustees for Support of Public Schools of New Jersey, 81 N. J. Eq. 290.

So a contract made between a mortgagor and a purchaser of property may be rescinded for fraud, where the mortgagee has not assented to its terms, and the purchaser will thereby be released of his liability. Cohrt v. Koch, 56 Iowa, 658.

In Calvo v. Davies, 78 N. Y. 211, 29 Am. Rep. 130, the court held that an extension of time to the grantee by the mortgagee created a release of the grantor, unless made with his consent.

Where the original lender or mortgagee extends the time for the payment of the debt to the original mortgagor, he thereby releases the grantee from his original liability. George v. Andrews, 60 Md. 26, 45 Am. Rep. 706.

Any release or variation of the terms of the original contract between the mortgagee and the original mortgagor will discharge the grantee from his personal liability. Paine v. Jones, 76 N. Y. 274.

He cannot have the benefit of such contract, if it has, before bill filed, been released and discharged in good faith, by the parties to it.

In Garnsey v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 233, 7 Am. Rep. 440, it was held that the assumption by the mortgagee of the payment of an anterior mortgage did not impose a personal liability enforceable by the first mortgagee, the promise being for the benefit of the mortgagor only.

The court distinguished the above case from Burr v. Beers, 24 N. Y. 178, 80 Am. Dec. 327, and Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 238, upon the ground that it was not an absolute conveyance, the engagement being merely for the advancement of money for the purpose of protecting the property of the promisee, the advance if made being a mere lien upon the property. Garnsey v. Rogers, supra.

Where the purchaser assumed to pay the mortgage debt as part of the consideration, it was held that the purchaser, so far as the vendor was concerned, became the original debtor and might be sued by him upon his promise, and that the rights of the mortgage creditor were not affected. Boardman v. Larrabee, 51 Conn. 39.

In Pettee v. Peppard, 120 Mass. 523, where property originally subject to a mortgage was conveyed by deed reciting that fact, whereby the grantee covenanted to assume and pay as his own debt, and save the grantor harmless and indemnified from such debt, the court holding the promise between the promisee and the person to be benefited; third, cases of which Brewer v. Dyer, 7 Cush. 337, is an instance, in which the defendant agreed with a lessee of premises to take the lease and pay the rent to the lessor, and entered with the knowledge of the could only be enforced by the mortgagor, there was no privity between the, purchaser and the mortgagee.

In Prentice v. Brimhall, 123 Mass. 291, the case of a purchase of an equity of redemption, the grantee assuming the mortgage as part of the consideration, it was held the mortgagee could not maintain an action upon such promise in his own name, the grantor transferring no money or funds to the defendant, and the defendant making no contract with the mortgagee or his assigns upon which an action at law would lie.

The same conclusions were arrived at in Coffin v. Adams, 181 Mass. 183, it being stated that it was not to be doubted in that commonwealth, that an action at law upon a stipulation in a deed poll, by which the grantee assumed and agreed to pay as his own debt a previous debt of the grantor secured by mortgage of the mortgaged property, could be brought in the name of the grantor only.

The case of Brown v. Stillman, 43 Minn. 126, was distinguished from Follansbee v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 211, there being nothing in the former case to warrant the inference that the contract was made for the benefit of the mortgagee or the plaintiff, he not being put forward as the party to whom the consideration was to be paid, or to receive a part of it reserved in the hands of the grantee for his benefit, nor was there any debt or obligation due from the grantor; but the grantee assumed to pay as part of the consideration and thus made the debt his own.

In Butterfield v. Hartshorn, 7 N. H. 845, 23 Am. Dec. 741, where an executor left part of the purchase money in the hands of a purchaser, for the purpose of paying certain debts owing by the testator, it was held that the creditors could not sue the purchaser for payment of such accounts, unless they assented to the arrangement or elected to look to such purchaser as their debtor, and to release the estate, and then only after demand, which must be before suit.

In Crowell v. Hospital of St. Barnabas, 27 N. J. Eq. 350, it was held that to a deed inter partes, conveying an estate by a mortgagor to a purchaser, a prior mortgagee was a stranger, both to the contract and to the consideration, and was not in privity with the grantee, either with respect to the contract or the estate granted.

Where a purchaser of land agrees to pay off, as part of the consideration, a mortgage or other incumbrance on the property, he becomes a surety and his obligation is enforceable in equity to the extent of the deficiency. Klapworth v. Dressler, 13 N. J. Eq. 62, 73 Am. Dec. 69.

A creditor is entitled to the benefit of all collateral obligations for the payment of a debt, which a person standing in the situation of a surety for others has received for his indemnity, and to release him or his property from liability for such payment. Ibid.

Where the deed was intended simply as a security for a debt, a contract being executed to convey to the wife of the grantor upon her paying the amount of the liens and defendant's debt, the court held that the lienor had no right of action. Pardee v. Treat, 32 N. Y. 365.

In Root v. Wright, 84 N. Y. 74, 33 Am. Rep. 495, the liability of the defendant for the deficiency arising on the sale of mortgaged premises turned upon the question whether the deed from a grantor was intended as an absolute covenant, or simply as a mortgage; that if it was merely a mortgage, the covenant to assume and pay the plaintiff's debt was in effect an agreement between the 25 L. R. A.

grantor and the defendant; that the latter should advance the amount of the prior lien upon the security of the land, and gave no right of action to the plaintiff, who was neither a party to the contract nor the person for whose benefit it was made, the court following the principles laid down in Garnsey v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 233, 7 Am. Rep. 440. Pardee v. Treat, supra.

The doctrine in favor of such contracts was upheld in the case of a parol contract upon a purchase, to pay certain creditors of the grantor. Seaman v. Hasbrouck, 35 Barb. 155.

In Pardee v. Treat, 32 N. Y. 365, the case turned upon the question whether the doctrine of Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 233, was applicable to the covenant of the defendants in a deed from their grantors "to assume and pay as part of the consideration" the lien upon the premises conveyed. The court held that if the deed was an absolute conveyance, and the relation between the grantor and the defendants was that of vendor and purchaser, simply, the case of Burr v. Beers, 24 N. Y. 173, 30 Am. Dec. 327, was decisive of the right of the plaintiff as assignee of a judgment against the grantor to maintain the action, the judgment being a lien upon the premises at the time of the conveyance.

Where the defendant had promised to pay a debt, due upon a note by his vendor to the plaintiff, the original owner of the land, as part of the consideration for his purchase, it was held that the original vendor might maintain an action against such purchaser for the amount due. Price v. Reed, 33 Mo. App. 459.

The right was recognized in Pulver v. Skinner, 42 Hun, 323, an action against a grantee of property purchased from an intestate, who had in his lifetime undertaken with a debtor for a valuable consideration to pay his debt, the personal representative having sold his estate to the purchaser, the assumption of the debts being part of the consideration.

In Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 317, the action was upon a promise made by the purchaser of the equity of redemption the mortgage having been given to secure the payment of a promissory note, the purchase deed containing only a stipulation that the defendant should pay the mortgage notes which the court held was a matter exclusively between the parties and one upon which the plaintiff could not sue, there being nothing to bring the case within the exceptions to the general rule therein noticed.

In Willard v. Wood, 135 U. S. 309, 34 L. ed. 210, where the suit was brought in the District of Columbia to enforce the payment of a mortgage debt against the grantee of the equity of redemption upon a mortgage made in New York upon property there, the court held that it would not lie, the lex fori governing as to the form and nature of the claim, and that by such law the action could only be maintained by the grantor in the form of an action at law, but his remedy was in equity.

The court looked upon the contract in that case as made with the grantor alone and for his benefit, the consideration moving from him alone, without any privity existing between the parties to the action, and without the mortgagee's assent either express or implied from his subsequent acts. Willard v. Wood, supra.

In that case the court did not consider that the fact that the mortgagee had received payments on account from the grantee affected the case, holding that if they were received it was only by virtue of the agreement between the grantor and the lessor, paid him the rent for a year, and then left before the term expired. We have referred so fully to the decisions in New York and Massachusetts because in those states the question has more frequently arisen, and been more ably and thoroughly discussed, than grantee and created no new contract between the grantee and the mortgagee. Ibid.

The same conclusion was arrived at in Keller v. Ashford, 138 U. S. 610, 38 L. ed. 607.

XXII. State statutes.

The Alabama Civil Code, ed. 1886, p. 577, provides: Section 2594. Actions on promissory notes, bonds, or other contracts, express or implied for the payment of money, must be prosecuted in the name of the party really interested, whether he has the legal title or not, subject to any defense the payor, obligor, or debtor may have against the payee, obligee, or creditor, previous to notice of assignment or transfer, except that, in actions upon bills of exchange and promissory notes payable at a bank or banking house, or at a designated place, and other commercial instruments, the suit must be instituted in the name of the person having the legal title.

In Yerby v. Sexton, 48 Ala. 811, the court passed upon the meaning of the words "the party really interested" as found in the Alabama code, and held that where the dry legal title is in one and a clear equitable title is in another, whether by transfer, delivery, or otherwise to whom alone the money belongs and who only is entitled to receive it, and authorized to discharge the debtor, in such cases there is no trouble; the action must be brought in the name of the equitable owner, as he is the party really interested. But when the party having the legal title is also the only party entitled to receive the money and discharges the debtor, although, when collected he holds the money, not for his own use, but for the use of some other person or persons, and to whose use he is to apply it, or to whom he is bound to pay it,—in such cases the action must be brought in the name of the party having the legal title.

The Arizona Code of Civil Procedure provides: Section 660. Every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise prescribed.

The Arkansas Revised Statutes, chapter 119, ed. 1884, p. 972, provides: Section 4933. Every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as provided in sections 4935, 4936, and 4938.

Section 1559 of the California Civil Code provides that a contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it.

The Dakota Civil Code provides: Section 3490. A contract, made expressly for the benefit of a third person, may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it.

In Georgia, section 2747 of the Code, ed. 1882, provides, if there be a valid consideration for the promise, it matters not from whom it is moved, the promisee may sustain his action through a stranger to the consideration.

Section 3221 of the Revised Statutes of Idaho, ed. 1887, p. 380, provides a contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it.

The Revised Statutes of Illinois, ed. 1880, section 19, p. 1013, provides that any deed, bond, note, covenant, or other instrument under seal (except penal bonds) may be sued and declared upon or set off as heretofore, or in any form of action in which such instrument might have been sued and declared upon or set off if it had not been under seal, and demands upon simple contracts may be set off against demands upon sealed instruments, judgments, or decrees.

By section 2543 of the Iowa Code of Civil Procedure, it is provided every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest except as provided in the next section. The following section affects actions brought by the trustees, and others in a like position.

The Civil Code of Kentucky provides, section 18, every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as provided in section 21.

Section 21. A personal representative, guardian, curator, committee of a person of unsound mind, trustee of an express trust, a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another, a receiver appointed by a court, the assignee of a bankrupt, or a person expressly authorized by statute to do so, may bring an action without joining with him the person for whose benefit it is prosecuted.

The Civil Code of Louisiana, 1870, article 1890, and the Louisiana Code of Practice, article 35, supra, page 601, support the right of a third party to sue upon the contract.

By the Statutes of Minnesota, ed. of 1878, vol. 1, chapter 66, § 23, p. 709, every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as hereinafter provided, but this section does not authorize the assignment of a thing in action not arising out of a contract.

By section 28 of the Statutes of Minnesota, of 1878, vol. 1, p. 710, it is provided an executor or administrator and trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. A person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another, is a trustee of an express trust within the meaning of this section.

The Missouri Code, section 1990, provides every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in the next succeeding section, but this section shall not be deemed to authorize the assignment of a thing in action not arising out of a contract.

And section 1991. An executor or administrator, a trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue in his own name without joining with him the person for whose benefit the suit is prosecuted. A trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section shall, be construed to include a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another.

The Montana Code of Civil Procedure, (Comp. Stat. ed. 1887, pp. 60, 61) provides, section 4, every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in this act.

And section 6, an executor or administrator, or trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the person or persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. A trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section, shall be construed to include a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another.

The Nebraska Code of Civil Procedure, section 29, provides every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in section 32, which relates to actions by trustees and others standing in a fiduciary position.

The Nevada General Statutes, ed. 1885, p. 785, provides, section 3023, every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in this act.

The New Mexico Code of Civil Procedure provides, section 1832, every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as provided in the next section.

Under section 118 of the New York Code, a person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another, may maintain the action, such party being deemed the trustee of an express trust.

Under sections 25 and 27 of the Ohio Civil Code, when a promise is made to one for the benefit of another, he for whose benefit it is made may bring an action for its breach, either in his own name or in the name of the party to whom made.

The Oregon Code of Civil Procedure provides, section 27, every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in section 23, but this section shall not be deemed to authorize the assignment of a thing in action not arising out of contract.

And section 29, an executor or administrator, a trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. A person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another is a trustee of an express trust within the meaning of this section.

The South Carolina Code of Civil Procedure provides, section 132, every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in section 124; but this section shall not be deemed to authorize the assignment of a thing in action not arising out of contract. But an action may be maintained by a grantee of land in the name of the grantor, or his or her heirs or legal representatives, when the grant or grants are void by reason of the actual possession of a person claiming under a title adverse to that of the grantor at the time of the delivery of the grant, and the plaintiff shall be allowed to prove the facts to bring the case within this provision.

The Compiled Laws of Utah, ed. 1876, p. 492, provide, section 4, every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in this act.

The Washington Code of Civil Procedure provides, section 4, every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as is otherwise provided by law.

The West Virginia Code, chapter 71, provides, section 2, an immediate estate or interest in, or the benefit of a condition respecting any estate, may be taken by a person under an instrument, although he be not a party thereto; and if a covenant or promise be made, for the sole benefit of a person with whom it is made, or with whom it is made jointly with others, such person may maintain in his own name any action thereon which he might maintain in case it had been made with him only, and the consideration had moved from him to the party making such covenant or promise.

The Wisconsin Revised Statutes, ed. 1890, p. 1432, provide, section 2005, every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in section 2007; but this section shall not be deemed to authorize the assignment of a thing in action not arising out of the contract.

provide, section 2382, an action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as provided in the next two following sections; but when a party asks that he may recover by virtue of an assignment, the right of set-off, counterclaim, and defense, as allowed by law, shall not be impaired. The sections referred to apply to actions on bonds and by executors, officers, trustees, and so forth.

XXIII. The English doctrine.

It is laid down in Comyns' Dig. title, "Action upon the case upon assumpsit," B 15, that an assumpsit lies though the consideration arise in part from another; as if a man promise a pig of lead to A, and his executor give lead to make a pig to B and assumes to deliver it to A, an assumpsit lies by A against him.

In Bourne v. Mason, 1 Vent. 6, it was held that the daughter of a physician might maintain assumpsit upon a promise made to her father for her benefit, in case he performed a certain cure.

The modern English cases overrule the older ones and show that the consideration must move from the party entitled to sue upon the contract. Tweddle v. Atkinson, 1 Best & S. 893, 30 L. J. Q. B. 265, 8 Jur. N. S. 332, 4 L. T. N. S. 468, 9 Week. Rep. 781.

In the above case the court declared the rule to be well established in England, that no stranger to the consideration could take advantage of a contract, although made for his benefit.

The court considered it a monstrous proposition to hold that a person was a party to a contract for the purpose of suing thereon for his own benefit, where he was not a party for the purpose of being sued. Tweddle v. Atkinson, supra.

The case of Price v. Easton, 1 Barn. & Ad. 433, 1 Nev. & M. 303, follows the doctrine laid down in Tweddle v. Atkinson, supra.

The same principle would appear to have been applied in Dutton v. Poole, 1 Vent. 318; Alton v. Midland R. Co. 19 C. B. N. S. 213, 34 L. J. C. P. 232, 11 Jur. N. S. 672, 12 N. T. N. S. 703, 13 Week. Rep. 918.

In Gandy v. Gandy, L. R. 30 Ch. Div. 57, 54 L. J. Ch. 1154, 53 L. T. N. S. 306, 33 Week. Rep. 808, the court stated it was sufficient to say that in the case of Tweddle v. Atkinson, supra, the true common-law doctrine was laid down.

A mere agreement between two parties that one shall pay the debt of the other to his creditor, gives no right of action by the creditor against such promisor. Re Rotherham Alum & Chemical Co. L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 111, 53 L. J. Ch. 290, 50 L. T. N. S. 219, 32 Week. Rep. 131.

Yet, there would seem to be an exception to such rule, in the case of money had and received for the use of another, an express or implied assent being shown to the holding of such money. The mere fact of the receipt of the money, however, is not enough to raise such implied promise. Lilly v. Hays, 4 Ad. & El. 543, 1 Nev. & P. 23, 2 Harr. & W. 333.

It must, however, be shown that the parties have a beneficial right or interest. Gandy v. Gandy, supra.

A mere agreement between A and B that B shall pay to C (an agreement to which C is not a party, either directly or indirectly) will not prevent A and B coming to a new agreement and releasing the old one. If C were a cestui que trust it would have that effect. Re Express Engineering Co. L. R. 16 Ch. Div. 125.

If the true intent and effect of a deed is to give the parties a beneficial right under it, that is to say, purpose. That one case was decided in a line with the rule held in the Vrooman and Mellen Cases. A grantee of real estate had assumed a mortgage debt for which the grantor was not personally liable. It was held the creditor could not recover from the grantee. Brown v. Stillman, 48 Minn. 186. Without undertaking to lay down a general rule defining when a stranger to a promise between others may sue to enforce it, we are prepared to say that, where there is nothing but the promise, no consideration from such stranger, and no duty or obligation to him on the part of the promisee, he cannot sue upon it. Such is this case.

a right to have the covenant performed and to call upon the trustees to protect their rights and interests under it, such parties will, outside of the common-law doctrine, in equity be allowed to enforce their rights under the deed. Gandy v. Gandy, supra.

In Gandy v. Gandy, supra, the action was upon a covenant made by a husband, upon separation with trustees to maintain the children, and the question was as to the children's right to sue upon the covenant. It was held that in order to entitle a third person, not known as a party to a contract, to sue either of the contracting parties, the third party must possess an actual beneficial right placing him in the position of cestui que trust under the contract.

Where it was agreed on behalf of the company, that the promisee should sell and the company buy a certain business, and assume the payment of certain expenses and charges of the registration of the company then owing to the attorneys, the agreement being adopted by the memorandum of the association and ratified by the directors, the attorneys sought, upon the winding up of the company, to prove for their claim against the company. It was held the claim must be disallowed, the contract being made before the company existed, a mere ratification not binding the company. Re Express Engineering Co. supra.

In Gandy v. Gandy, L. R. 80 Ch. Div. 69, the above case was referred to as establishing the true common-law doctrine. In the latter case, however, the court admitted that, whatever might have been the common-law doctrine, yet in that case a true effect of the deed in question was to give a beneficial interest under it, that is to say, a right to have the covenants performed and to call upon the trustees to protect the interests and rights of the beneficiaries who would, outside of the common-law doctrine, in a court of equity, be allowed to enforce their rights under the deed, the application of the doctrine depending upon its being made to and upon the true construction of the deed, which in that case was held to give a beneficial interest upon which the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

In Gregory v. Williams, 3 Meriv. 582, on an agreement to pay one party which is not made directly to him but through another by whom the consideration is furnished, the latter was held a trustee in equity for the former, although the court questioned whether the action would lie at law.

In a Canadian case of Moot v. Gibson, 21 Ont. Rep. 248, it was held that where the contract gave the stranger a beneficial right he might enforce it by action.

LIBRARY BOARD OF THE CITY OF

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. Under the provisions of its charter (Special Laws 1885, chap. 8), defendant board has the power to become an ordinary bailee as to such personal property as may be of a proper character for exhibition in its public museums; a coin collection for instance.
2. At the defendant's request, plaintiff, without compensation, loaned to it, for exhibition in its museum, several cases of coins. The law required of defendant that it exercise ordinary care and prudence in caring for the same. And if a resolution was passed by defendant board, and brought to the notice and knowledge of plaintiff, that it would not be responsible for the safety of the coins in any manner, it would still be liable in case the same were stolen and lost by reason of its gross negligence.
3. Several unimportant assignments of error considered and disposed of.

(July 5, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County refusing a new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to hold defendant liable for the value of certain coins which were in its possession for exhibition to the public. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. David F. Simpson and William H. Morse, for appellant:

The receipt was not competent for the purpose of proving the terms of a contract between the plaintiff and defendant.

It is not signed by the defendant library board, or by any officer of the board on its behalf, and it does not purport to be signed by Mr. Putnam under or by virtue of any direction or authority from the library board.

It was not competent evidence against the defendant as an admission of an agent, servant, or officer of the library board.

The defendant library board had no authority to make such a receipt and incur any liability thereunder, and had no power or authority to authorize Mr. Putnam, as its agent, to execute such a paper on behalf of the board, and consequently it was not and could not be a valid and binding contract on the part of the library board.

The powers of the library board are only such as have been expressly granted to it, and those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted to the

That the coins were in a room with other property owned by or loaned to defendant, and in its charge, neither refutes the charge of negligence, nor relieves from liability.

Story, Bailm. 9th ed. §§ 68, 64, 64a.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

For more than two years prior to September 1, 1892, plaintiff had been the owner of a large collection of coins, placed in cases for exhibition. During all of this time these cases of coins were in the possession of defendant, and by it were being exhibited to the public with other articles of interest, at its building in the city of Minneapolis. There was some dispute between the parties as to the terms or conditions under which the coins were placed in defendant's custody, but it is evident that they were loaned by plaintiff at defendant's solicitation; that nothing was to be paid for their use; but that defendant was to and did pay the premium upon a fire insurance policy covering the same, and did furnish one case for a part thereof. One evening, about the date first mentioned, one of the cases, with its contents, was stolen from the building, and lost to plaintiff, whereupon she instituted this action to recover the value of the coins, alleging that they were stolen and lost because of defendant's gross negligence and carelessness.

1. On the trial of the case there was introduced in evidence (defendant objecting) a receipt of date April 6, 1891, signed by defendant's librarian, in which he acknowledged that the coins had been received for exhibition in the loan collection of the library, to be returned in good condition. The ruling of the trial court when receiving this receipt in evidence is assigned as error on two grounds—First, that it was not signed by defendant board, or by any of its duly authorized officers, nor did it purport to be signed by the librarian by virtue of any authority of the board or of its officers, nor was any attempt made to show that it was so signed; second, that in no event was defendant board authorized to incur a liability of the character found in the receipt, or to enter into a contract of the nature of that attempted thereby, which, briefly stated, was a contract of bailment. It was stoutly maintained on this second point that, under its charter, defendant board was not empowered to become a bailee. While we feel satisfied that on the evidence, as it stood when the court overruled the defendant's objection to the introduction of the receipt, there was nothing which warranted its reception, it is manifest that under the charge of the court no prejudice could have resulted to defendant from its introduction, provided it had authority, under its charter, to receive the coins as a loan from the owner; and this was in controversy, as before stated. The defendant board derived its powers under Special Laws 1885, chap. 8. It was authorized to establish and maintain in the city of Minneapolis public libraries and reading rooms, galleries of art, and museums, for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of the city, and for this purpose, had power to take, by "gift, grant, purchase, devise, bequest or otherwise any real or personal property." It had power to make and publish, from time to time, by-laws for its own guidance; rules and regulations for the government of its agents, servants, and employes, and "for the government and regulation of the libraries and other collections" under its control. It had other expressly enumerated powers, and finally, in addition to these, was granted "power and authority to undertake and perform every act necessary or proper to carry out the spirit and intent" of the act. The defendant board was chartered for the purpose of establishing and maintaining public libraries and museums. While it was not expressly authorized to take property as a loan or deposit, or to incur the liability of an ordinary bailee, such express authority was not necessary. In addition to the powers expressly granted, it had those which are necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted, and those also essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation,—not simply convenient, but indispensable. That it could take personal property in some other way than by gift, grant, purchase, devise, or bequest is evident from the words "or otherwise," which are added to those mentioned. It was also expressly empowered to undertake and perform every act necessary or proper to carry out the spirit and intent of the incorporating act. Coins of all descriptions are regarded as essential and indispensable to the establishment and maintenance of museums, and it is a well-known fact that in nearly every institution of this kind there are large and valuable collections owned by private individuals, and held by the exhibitors as loans or deposits. Frequently, the most valuable works of art and the rarest collections of curios can only be obtained in this way. We have no doubt of the power of the board to take property of this character by express or implied contract, and to incur liability thereunder. In doing this it is undoubtedly acting within the scope of its powers, and carrying out the spirit and intent of the statute creating it.

2. It is admitted that defendant board desired that plaintiff place the coins in its custody and for exhibition, and that the plaintiff was also desirous, for reasons of her own, that they be exhibited to the public, and that the latter be informed as to the ownership. With this mutually understood, they were handed over and put upon exhibition, defendant having entire control of them for the time being. At defendant's request, plaintiff loaned her property to it, and the law required of the former that it exercise ordinary care and prudence in caring for the same. If ordinary care and prudence were not exercised by the board in regard to the property, and it was stolen, then defendant board would be liable in damages, and the trial court so charged. But it was contended that some time after the coins came into defendant's possession, without any express understanding as to the latter's liability, a resolution was passed by the board, of which plaintiff was notified, that it would not be responsible for the safety of the coins, or for them, in any manner, except as to loss by fire. It did procure and pay for a fire insurance policy at this time. On the trial, plaintiff denied that she was informed of the resolution, and in view of the conflict in testimony the jury were instructed that, if they were of the opinion that plaintiff had knowledge of this resolution, she could not recover, unless they found that the coins were stolen and lost by reason of the gross negligence of the defendant. Of this feature of the charge the latter should not and does not complain. Evidently, under the charge of the court, as applied to the admitted facts, any error with respect to the admission of the receipt in evidence, and also as to what the librarian said to plaintiff and her husband relative to the responsibility of defendant board, worked no prejudice to it. The result was not affected by either the receipt or the statements.

We are of the opinion that plaintiff's husband was competent to testify as to the value of the coins. It was not necessary that he should have bought and sold such articles up to the day of trial. See Brackett v. Edgerton, 14 Minn. 174 (Gil. 184), 100 Am. Dec. 211; Hoxie v. Empire Lumber Co. 41 Minn. 548; 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 512. But in any event the motion to strike out all of the testimony of the witness was properly denied, for much of his testimony related to matters other than values.

In view of the previous testimony of the janitor as to his knowledge of what transpired at the library building on the evening the coins were stolen, we think it was permissible to ask him as to his statements made next morning to plaintiff in reference to a fire in the vicinity of the building just before the coins were missed, and as to the attendants going to it, for the purpose of laying the foundation for impeachment. This disposes of all the assignments of error which we regard as entitled to discussion.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of North Carolina

v.

(114 N. C. 855.)

An ordinance forbidding unmarried minors to enter any bar-room unless as agent or servant is not void, unreasonable, or inconsistent with a statute which makes it unlawful to sell or give intoxicating liquors to such persons.

(March 12, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Union County convicting him of violating a city ordinance forbidding minors to enter saloons. Affirmed.

The defendant was arrested upon a warrant issued by the mayor and appealed to the superior court, where the jury found a special verdict setting forth that an ordinance of the city prohibited persons under twenty one years of age from entering bar-rooms, etc., but provided that the same should not apply to any minor who was married or who was acting as agent or servant of his parent or guardian. Defendant was twenty years old, unmarried, and was not acting as agent or servant when he entered the bar-room.

Further facts appear in the opinions.

Messrs. Batchelor & Devereux and Robert B. Redwine for appellant.

Mr. Frank I. Osborne, Atty-Gen., for the state.

Burwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The town of Monroe has power and authority "to make such by-laws, rules, and regulations for the better government of the town" as the commissioners thereof may deem necessary, provided the same are "not inconsistent with the laws of the land." Code, § 3799. This is an express grant of authority to the officers of this municipal corporation to exercise, within the territory made subject to their control, the police power of the state, the only expressed restriction upon their action being that the rules and regulations made by them shall not be inconsistent with "the laws of the land." Authorities need not be cited to prove that the legislature of the state may transfer to local municipal legislative bodies created by it the duty and responsibility of exercising a portion of its own police power. It seems to be conceded that the legislature has power to declare it unlawful for any minors to enter a bar-room, and thus protect them from the evil influences that might affect them if exposed to the temptations to which their presence in such resorts might expose them. This concession is an admission that the ordinance in question is not repugnant in its provisions to either the federal or state constitutions, for those fundamental enactments impose their restraining influence on the legislature not less than on its creatures,—the legislative councils of the towns and cities of the commonwealth.

There being, then, no ground for maintaining that the ordinance under consideration is invalid because of its unconstitutionality, and the grant by the legislature to the municipality of the power to exercise its police power in such manner as the commissioners may deem necessary being clear and explicit, it only remains to inquire whether the enactment is consistent with the laws of the state, and is reasonable. In the grant of police power to this municipality, the restriction imposed is that its ordinance shall not be inconsistent with "the laws of the land." The expression "the laws of the land" can only refer to the laws of this state,—the statutes and common law,—by the enforcement of which peace and good order are maintained throughout this state, and by which the conduct of all its citizens, whether they dwell in its cities and towns or not, is controlled. It is not permitted to these local legislative bodies in this state to exercise that portion of the police power intrusted to them upon subjects about which the legislature has seen fit to enact laws (Washington v. Hammond, 76 N. C. 38; State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 574), nor to adopt ordinances that tend to obstruct the general policy of the state in the exercise of its police power, as evinced by its statutes. In the treatise of Horr & Bemis on Municipal Police Ordinances (sec. 88), it is said: "According to the American theory of municipal existence, the legislation permitted to be exercised by municipal corporations is a mere delegation of the power of the state, and the ordinances created by virtue of this delegated authority are as much a part of the general scheme of legislation as are the laws of the state. It is therefore necessary that they should be consistent with the laws of the state. . . . Municipalities have no power to repeal, directly, or indirectly, the laws of the state, and their legislation must accord with the policy of the legislation of the state. If the only measure of authority were the terms of the charter, there would often be ordinances plainly within the granted power, but irreconcilable with some state law, or contrary to the settled policy of the state,—a result neither lawful nor intended. Some charters, by express language, restrict the ordinances that may be passed to such as are consistent with the laws of the state. Others are silent upon the subject. But the restriction exists, whether expressed or not, and becomes very important in its application." We can discern no inconsistency between the provisions of the ordinance under consideration and any particular law of the state, or the general policy of its legislation. Indeed, we find in it rather a commendable effort on the part of this local legislative body to supplement what the state, by its general legislation, has done to protect the young of the commonwealth. The state declares that one who deals in intoxicating liquors shall neither sell nor give to an unmarried minor any such liquors. Code, § 1077. This ordinance declares that such minor shall not enter the bar-rooms that are subject to the control of the town. It helps, and does not hinder, the policy of the state upon this subject. All its tendencies are towards the prevention of the infraction of the law of the state, and the preservation of peace and good order. Its rigid enforcement must be desired by the proprietors of saloons, for only danger and trouble can come to them from allowing such persons to frequent their places of business. State v. Kittelle, 110 N. C. 560, 15 L. R. A. 694. It interferes with none of the saloon keeper's rights, and, is, indeed, contrived in part for his protection. It prevents minors from exposure to temptation in places where they should not go. The law which forbids any dealer in intoxicating liquors to give or sell to a minor such liquors is valid. Its validity could scarcely be assailed with any show of reason. Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 42. This ordinance rests upon the same foundation as that law,—the right of the state, either by direct general legislation or through its municipal "home-rule" agencies, to shield youth from temptation. "It is held," says the author quoted above, "that a law against permitting a minor to enter upon and remain in a retail liquor dealer's place of business is valid, . . . and the state has power to enact and enforce such a law, even in disregard of the parent's wishes, when its object and tendency are to protect the child." Goldsticker v. Ford, 63 Tex. 385.

with those which prevail in other states. An interesting discussion upon the subject will be found in Champer v. Greencastle (Ind.) 24 L. R. A. 768.

What has been said above seems a sufficient refutation of the assertion that the ordinance is unreasonable, oppressive, and discriminating. It seems to us a wise and wholesome restraint upon the youth of the community,—made in their interest, as well as that of the law-abiding keepers of the bar-rooms. It is not oppressive. The police of our cities and towns—officers charged with the duty of preventing offenses, as well as of arresting offenders—should have the power and authority to prevent youths from entering saloons. They can derive such authority only from such ordinances. It is not unlawfully discriminating. It applies to all unmarried minors, and is no more obnoxious to this objection than is the section of the code mentioned above, and other laws which are made to protect and control the youth of the land. While it is true that all grants of power to municipal corporations should be strictly construed, and that all doubts should be resolved against the authority of the corporation, it is also true that where, as in this case, the grant of power is plain and unequivocal, courts will not interfere with, control, or nullify the acts of the officers of the municipality, except for most cogent reasons. The contrary course would bring about an unseemly intermeddling of the judicial department of the government with the established agencies of the legislative department. 25 L. R. A.

ment,—the legislative councils of towns and cities,—and such intermeddling could but have the effect of hampering the action of those bodies, and retarding the development of such communities. If fraud, dishonesty, or oppression is charged against them, courts will be swift to investigate the charge, and to correct the evil, if found to exist. But other matters, involving mere questions of expediency and judgment, must be decided in another way. We adopt, as applicable here, the language used by Judge Daniel in Hellen v. Noe, 25 N. C. 498: "If a majority of the citizens of the town deem the ordinance impolitic, or injurious to the people of the corporation, they have the power in their own hands to remedy the evil; but we cannot say that this ordinance is against the general law, or is in itself unreasonable."

Avery, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the opinion of the court, and, as my dissent rests upon the idea that the municipality has usurped powers not delegated to it, I deem it proper to give expression to my views. The only question presented is whether a municipal corporation, under a grant of power (1) to make such by-laws, rules, and regulations for the better government of said town as they may deem necessary, provided the same be not inconsistent with the laws of the land; (2) to exercise all of the authority conferred on towns generally under chapter 62, vol. 2, of the Code,—is empowered, by ordinance, to prohibit an unmarried minor, except when acting as the agent of his parent or guardian, from entering any bar-room, or room where spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors are kept for sale.

It was not contended on the argument that the legislature, in the exercise of its police power, was not authorized to prohibit infants from exposing themselves to such evil influences, nor was it necessary to discuss the question whether the legislature was empowered by the constitution to delegate to the municipality the authority to enact the ordinance set forth in the special verdict, unless we discover upon a careful examination that the power has been granted either expressly or by fair implication. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 89; State v. Webber, 107 N. C. 963; 15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 1039. The first contested point, therefore, is whether, under the permission to make by-laws contained in the charter, or under the general act, the authority to enact this ordinance has been incidentally conferred. The supreme court of New Jersey stated in the case of Taylor v. Griswold, 14 N. J. L. 222, 27 Am. Dec. 83, the doctrine upon which the decision of the question involved depends: "Whenever a by-law seeks to alter a well-settled and fundamental principle of the common law, or to establish a rule interfering with the rights of individuals or the public, the power to do so must come from plain and direct legislative enactment. The legislature may enact laws imposing restraint upon the natural liberties of the people, for the benefit of the public morals, provided no constitutional right of the individual is violated; but where a municipal corporation, which is a public agency created by the lawmaking branch of the government, undertakes to pass laws in derogation of common right, it is incumbent upon such municipality to show clearly, not only that the legislature is warranted by the constitution in delegating, but has actually conferred, the power claimed." Dillon says (1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 825, citing Taylor v. Griswold, supra, in support of the proposition): "An ordinance cannot legally be made, which contravenes a common right, unless the power to do so be plainly conferred by a valid and competent legislative grant; and, in cases relating to such right, authority to regulate, conferred upon towns of limited powers, has been held not necessarily to include the power to prohibit." One of the cases cited by Dillon to sustain this proposition is Hayden v. Noyes, 5 Conn. 391, where the court held that the authority of a town to regulate fishing in a navigable stream within its limits did not warrant it in enacting a by-law prohibiting fishing within its boundaries.

The commissioners of the town of Monroe may, by virtue of its charter, "make such by-laws, rules, and regulations for the better government of said town as they may deem necessary, provided the same be not inconsistent with the laws of the land." The word "law," in its general sense, includes statute and common law, as well as the constitution, and the term "laws of the land" has been so expressly interpreted by high authority. 12 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 950, note 1; Lycoming, F. Ins. Co. v. Wright, 60 Vt. 515, 22 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 662, note. The language which was incorporated in Magna Charta, and transplanted into all of our state constitutions, and has been declared equivalent to "due process of law" is "law [not 'laws'] of the land." The phrase "laws of the land" was construed in the case cited to include both common and statute law, and by other courts to embrace constitutions also. Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 32. Is the ordinance in derogation of a right which the common law, from time immemorial, has conferred upon a minor twenty years old? An individual right is that which a person is entitled to have or to receive from others, or to do under the protection of the law. 21 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 406; Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Baty, 6 Neb. 40, 29 Am. Rep. 356. The common law clearly includes all principles and rules of action established for the security of the rights of personal liberty and private property which are not embodied in some express legislation. "Personal liberty consists in the power of locomotion, of changing situation, or moving one's person to whatever place one's inclination may direct, without imprisonment or restraint, unless by due course of law." Anderson, Law Dict. 619; 1 Bl. Com. 134. Mr. Blackstone says, further, of this privilege of free locomotion that it is "a right strictly natural, and the law of England has never abridged it without sufficient cause, and that in this kingdom it cannot ever be abridged at the mere discretion of the magistrate, without the explicit permission of the laws." This is a statement of the well-settled doctrine that even a statute passed by the legislature must be construed strictly when it operates, to any extent, to repeal or abrogate any principle of common law, which protects personal security, personal liberty, or private property. Has an infant a right of locomotion, which the common law protects, and other persons are bound to respect? A person sui generis may enter any house where goods, wares, or groceries are sold, subject only to the right of the proprietor to eject him for misconduct. An infant labors under disabilities as to the power to make contracts or execute a will, to hold office, and to do certain other acts; but the common law imposes no more restraint upon his locomotion than upon the movements of an adult, except such as may be incident to parental authority, when exerted. If, therefore, the legislature had attempted, by express statute, to prohibit all minors, except those specified in the ordinance, from entering houses of the particular classes therein mentioned, the law would have been at least subject to a strict construction whenever the courts should be called upon to enforce it. When the duty is imposed on the courts of close scrutiny in searching for a power claimed by implication, it is doubly a duty to see that it exists in some shape, and has not been abused in the particular exercise of it, where the legislation drawn in question purports to be under delegated power, and operates, if conferred at all, in derogation of a personal right recognized by the common law. Such power does not pass, as we have seen, under the general grant of authority to make all needful by-laws, rules, and regulations. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 825. But not only has the legislature omitted to confer, but it has positively prohibited, the making of any ordinance not consistent with the laws of the land, whether statute or common law, such as that elementary principle declaratory of the right of an infant to go where he may choose, subject only to the superior authority of the parent to control him, or the legislature, in plain terms, to impose restraints for his own protection, or the general welfare of the public, and not repugnant to the constitution.

The other powers conferred upon municipal corporations under the general law are embodied in Code, §§ 3801, 3802, which are as follows: "They may establish and regulate their markets, and prescribe at what place, within the corporation, shall be sold marketable things, in what manner, whether by weight or measure, may be sold grain, meal, or flour, if the flour be not packed in barrels, fodder, hay, or oats in straw; may erect scales for the purpose of weighing the same, appoint a weigher, fix his fees, and direct by whom they shall be paid. And it shall not be lawful for the commissioners or other authorities of any town to impose any tax whatever on wagons or carts selling farm products, garden truck, fish and oysters in the public streets thereof. They may pass laws for abating or preventing nuisances of any kind, and for preserving the health of the citizens."

In these two sections we find enumerated all of the express powers to pass ordinances, except such as arise under the authority to levy taxes, and to repair, improve, and open public streets and sidewalks, contained in the sections immediately preceding and following those quoted above. So that if the ordinance, for a violation of which the defendant is indicted, was not passed by virtue of the power to preserve health, or abate or prevent nuisances, there is no express warrant for its enactment in the general statute, as there is no sufficient grant of authority to pass it in the charter. The power conferred upon the municipality is not to create by legislation a nuisance not previously known to the law, but to protect the people of a town from annoyance by refusing or prohibiting the creation of what already comes within the legal definition of "nuisance."

Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 242, 741, note 2; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984; Salem v. Eastern R. Co. 98 Mass. 481, 96 Am. Dec. 650. In State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, 48 Am. Rep. 105, cited by Judge Cooley to sustain substantially the proposition we have laid down, the facts were that the city of Baltimore enacted an ordinance providing that it should "not be lawful for any person, persons or body corporate to work, operate or continue in use, for the purpose of burning oyster shells or stone lime, any kiln situated or erected within the limits of the city of Baltimore under a penalty," etc. The defendant was charged in the indictment with operating a limekiln within the limits of the city of Baltimore for the purpose of burning oyster shells and stone lime, etc. The authority to pass the ordinance was claimed under a provision of the charter empowering the city "to pass ordinances to preserve the health of the city, and to prevent and remove nuisances," being practically identical with section 3802,—the only difference being in the order of conferring the powers, and in the use of the word "abating," instead of "removing," in precisely the same sense. The court held that it was not a nuisance, per se, to burn a limekiln at any point within the limits of the city, and the corporation was not authorized, by grant of power to prevent and remove, to prohibit an act not necessarily a nuisance. See also Ward v. Little Rock, 41 Ark. 526, 48 Am. Rep. 46. Judge Cooley also cited the case of Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 70 Ill. 634, in which the court held, in effect, that where the legislature explicitly gave to the town the power, after the lapse of two years, "to determine what were nuisances and to abate the same," the corporation was not authorized to declare any act a nuisance, which was not a nuisance at common law, till after the expiration of the time mentioned. The court, in this case, in a very elaborate argument, maintained the right of a private corporation to manufacture fertilizer, despite any general power in the town to protect or prevent nuisance, unless it should create, in the conduct of its business, a nuisance at common law. It has been held, also, for similar reasons, that a municipal corporation has no more power to legalize an acknowledged nuisance than it has to prohibit what does not amount to a nuisance as such. Pettie v. Johnson, 56 Ind. 139; 15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 1185; Horr & Bemis, Mun. Ord. § 252.

It seems needless to multiply authorities, as we might do almost indefinitely, to show that the word "nuisance," in the statute, must be interpreted according to its technical meaning. The legislature has the authority (no longer questioned in this state) to prohibit the sale of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, and possibly to declare bar-rooms a nuisance, but the towns cannot prohibit the sale of liquors without express authority from the legislature to do so. Had the town attempted by ordinance to prohibit the sale of spirituous liquors to minors only, the ordinance would have been void, whether the statute on the subject were in force or repealed, because no such authority is conferred upon it, either expressly or by implication. How, then, does the corporation acquire the power to prohibit a boy, upon whom the law has imposed no such restraint, from entering a house where a business legalized by our statutes is being conducted? It is doubtless desirable that the youth of the state should be guarded against the temptations to which frequenters of such places are subjected. Legislation which will legalize what the town commissioners of Monroe have attempted to enact, if it is deemed constitutional, can probably be had for the asking. But the violation of constitutions or statutes under the specious plea of reforming the world in obedience to a higher law is neither excusable upon moral, nor defensible upon legal, grounds.

I think, for the reasons which I have stated, that neither under the provision of the charter commonly known as the "General Welfare Clause," nor under the power to protect health and prevent nuisances, can the governing authorities of a municipality enact a valid ordinance, purporting to prohibit a boy of twenty years of age from entering where business is conducted presumably under the sanction of the law. The legislature may put the sale of intoxicants under ban of the law so completely that a place where it is illicitly sold shall be deemed a nuisance, but, while such business houses are licensed by law, town commissioners cannot brand them, without authority, as places unfit for boys who frequent other stores and saloons.

It was contended on the argument of the case, and not without authority and reason, that had the legislature, instead of the municipality, enacted a law prohibiting minors from frequenting the business houses mentioned in the ordinance in question, the statute would have been unconstitutional and void. Without passing upon that question, or even conceding, for the sake of the argument, that the legislature has the power to prevent a minor from being employed in, or even entering, a place where intoxicants are sold, it would be none the less essential, in order to give validity to a similar law passed by a municipality, to show the delegation to the corporation of the authority claimed, either expressly or by fair implication. The authorities cited therefore (Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 42, and numerous cases from the courts of other states), in support of the legislative authority to pass statutes of the same purport, have no necessary bearing upon the case, in the absence of any attempt to delegate the power which the town attempted to exercise. I think that the judge below erred in instructing the jury, upon the special verdict, to find the defendant guilty, and a new trial should be awarded.

Martha SMITH, Admx., etc., of Joseph Smith, Deceased.,
v.

NORFOLK & SOUTHERN R. CO., Appt.

(114 N. C. 723.)

1. Failure of an engineer to stop a train which is due merely to its lack of proper equipment, where he was guilty of no negligence after discovering the danger, will not preclude the defense of contributory negligence, where an intoxicated person is on the track and struck by the train.
2. One who has voluntarily disabled himself by reason of intoxication is held to the same degree of care and prudence for his safety that is required of a sober person.
3. The duty of the engineer of a railroad train to keep a vigilant lookout on the track in order to discover and avoid any obstructions that may be encountered thereon is enforceable in favor of helpless persons

NOTE.—Duty to maintain lookout on railroad train.

Failure to maintain a lookout at crossings.

It is the duty of a railroad company to maintain a reasonable lookout at crossings and prevent injury to persons or trains. Hinkle v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 109 N. C. 472; Bullock v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 105 N. C. 180.

So in backing trains. Cheney v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co., 16 Hun, 415; Wiley v. Long Island R. Co., 78 Hun, 22.

And some cases hold that the railroad company is liable for injuries caused from failure to maintain such lookout even if the party injured is guilty of contributory negligence. Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Cline, 31 Ill. App. 563; Hilz v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 101 Mo. 54; Kelley v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 75 Mo. 133.

There are other cases which hold that while it is the duty of the railroad company to maintain a lookout at crossings, contributory negligence of the injured party will bar a recovery. Georgia Pac. R. Co. v. Lee, 92 Ala. 222; Continental Imp. Co. v. Stead, 95 U. S. 161, 24 L. ed. 402; Heddes v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 74 Wis. 239.

And failure to look out at crossing is negligence, and the question of negligence and contributory negligence is for the jury. Johnson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 49 Wis. 529; Leavitt v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co., 5 Ind. App. 512.

Under 51 Vict., chap. 29, § 280, requiring a lookout on the last car of a train moving reversely, to warn people on the track, a locomotive and tender constitute a train, and the railroad company is liable for failure to exercise reasonable care in having outlook. Hollinger v. Canadian Pac. R. Co., 21 Ont. Rep. 705.

Where a team had crossed near to the engine just after the engine passed, the engineer was not upon the track between crossings when it can be exercised consistently with giving the attention to the engine necessary to its safe and proper management.

4. The question of contributory negligence depends on the question whether or not the plaintiff's negligence is a remote or proximate cause of the injury.
5. If the injury could have been prevented by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence on the part of the defendant after plaintiff's negligence had occurred, contributory negligence is not a defense.
6. Failure by an engineer to exercise ordinary care to discover persons on the track in time to avoid injuring them is not such willful and wanton negligence as to exclude the defense of contributory negligence in case a person so situated is injured.

(May 9, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Washington County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The charge given to the jury by the trial court was as follows:

"There are four issues or questions for you to answer, as follows: (1) Was Joseph Smith killed by the negligence of the defendant? (2) Did the said Joseph Smith, negligent in failing to watch the team to see if the horse would back on the track when he reversed his engine after coupling to some cars. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Yeamans, 86 Va. 380.

Lookout for persons on track; generally.

Under this subhead some of the injured parties were trespassers, but that fact does not appear to have been considered or discussed. The decisions on that question are found in next subdivision.

Where the person injured was a small child, the failure to keep a proper lookout and prevent injury, renders the company liable. Gunn v. Ohio River R. Co., 36 W. Va. 165; Bottoms v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. (N. C.) May 9, 1894.

There should be such a lookout as is reasonably required by the circumstances, and it should be more careful where there is risk of access to the track than at other places, and the jury had the right to consider the presence of strangers in the cab as an interference with vision. Marcott v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co., 47 Mich. 1.

But on second trial where the engineer testified that the child could not be on the track without being seen and must have come up out of a culvert, there was a verdict for the defendant. Marcott v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co., 49 Mich. 99.

And in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Boozer, 70 Tex. 580.

And in Townley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 53 Wis. 626, the question of negligence of the company and contributory negligence of the injured party was for the jury.

And in Chrystal v. Troy & B. R. Co., 105 N. Y. 164, where a child was injured it was said to be the first case in New York in which must be defined the liability for not seeing one lawfully on the track, but the evidence did not support a verdict for plaintiff.

by his own negligence, contribute to his own death? (8) Could the defendant, by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, have avoided the injury? (4) What damage, if any, is the plaintiff administratrix entitled to recover? As to which I lay down the law to you as follows: (1) Negligence is the omission to do some act or to perform some duty required by law to be done or performed, or the doing of the act or the performance of the duty in a careless and improper manner. (2) It is the duty of the defendant company to put competent men in charge of its trains. It is the duty of the engineer or fireman, in running the train, to keep a lookout in front of the train, to see objects on the track in order to avoid accidents; and, if they fail to do so, this failure is negligence on the part of the company; and, if an injury results from a failure to keep this lookout, then company would be liable for it; and if you find the plaintiff's intestate was run over by the train of the defendant company, and killed, because of a failure of the officers in charge of and running the train to keep this outlook and see deceased lying on the track, it would be negligence; and you will answer the first issue, 'Yes.' (8) If you find the facts to be that, by reasonable diligence in keeping a lookout, the engineer could have seen the deceased lying on the track in time to have stopped the train before it ran over deceased, and he did not stop it, it would be negligence, and you will answer the first issue, 'Yes.' (4) The fact that the defendant did not have air brakes on the trains is not negligence. (5) It was the duty of the defendant to have sufficient brakes and appliances to have stopped the train in emergencies of this character in a reasonable distance; and, if you find that the brakes were not sufficient for that purpose, it would be negligence; and, if the deceased came to his death in consequence of this fact, you will answer the first issue, 'Yes.' (6) It is insisted by the defendant that the train was properly equipped and manned for trains after character of this, being a mixed train of passenger and freight cars. The plaintiff insists that two brakemen to fourteen cars was insufficient. This is a question for you. If you find from all the evidence in this case that two brakemen and the steam brake on the engine were sufficient to properly run the train and control it, then the failure to have more is not negligence; but if you find from all the circumstances growing out of this evidence, as you find it to be, two brakemen, the steam brake on engine, and the number of brakes you find were on this train were insufficient to properly run and control it, then the failure to have a sufficient number would be negligence in the company. (7) If you find that the train could have been stopped with the appliances with which it was equipped, after the deceased could, by reasonable diligence, have been seen, and it was not stopped, but ran over deceased, and killed him, it would be negligence, and you will answer the first issue, 'Yes.' (8) The question for you as to the outlook is not when

See German v. Suburban Rapid Transit Co. infra. And in Herring v. Wilmington & R. R. Co. 22 N. C. 402, it was held that the failure to keep a lookout and discover a slave child asleep on the track was not negligence, as the owner was guilty of contributory negligence in allowing him to be there. But this case was overruled in Deans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 698.

Where the party injured was an adult, mere negligence or want of ordinary care on his part would not prevent a recovery. Virginia Midland R. Co. v. White, 84 Va. 498; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 36 Md. 366.

In Brown v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 50 Mo. 481, 11 Am. Rep. 420, it was said that a party who was on the track without license is not guilty of such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery for injury caused by failure to keep a proper lookout.

And contributory negligence of plaintiff is a question for the jury. Johnson v. Lake Superior Terminal & Transfer Co. 86 Wis. 64.

But in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Ryon, 70 Tex. 55, it was held that if the injured party was guilty of negligence in going on the track (which is not decided) no recovery for his death will be allowed although his presence could have been discovered by due care, and the injury prevented by the company.

And where a policeman on the track was negligent in not looking out for the train, no recovery can be had for causing death where every means were used after discovery although the company was negligent in not discovering him sooner. Pennsylvania Co. v. Myers (Ind.) Jan. 2, 1894.

Party on track in city.

It is the duty of the railroad company to keep a proper lookout in towns and cities to prevent injury to persons, and a failure to use vigilance will render the company liable. Conley v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 89 Ky. 408; Lynch v. St. Joseph & L. R. Co. 111 Mo. 601; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Bodemer, 139 Ill. 586; South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 59 Ala. 272.

And backing a train without any one on lookout is negligence and renders the company liable for injury caused. Savannah & M. R. Co. v. Shearer, 58 Ala. 672; Dunkman v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 95 Mo. 232, 16 Mo. App. 543.

But a railroad company is not liable for failing to keep a man posted on the front of a locomotive in the city limits at night where there are no streets and the place is swampy, uneven, and there are no lights notwithstanding a city ordinance, and the use of a footpath without objection is not an invitation to the public. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 62 Md. 479, 50 Am. Rep. 233.

And in Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Stroud, 64 Miss. 784, it was held that a railroad company is not responsible for injuries to a person on account of the employees not seeing him when he is in a place where he has no right to be.

It is the duty of the railroad company to keep a proper lookout for children in towns and cities, and it will be liable for injuries caused through failure to keep a vigilant lookout. South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Donovan, 84 Ala. 141; Georgia Pac. R. Co. v. Blanton, 84 Ala. 155; Daley v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 26 Conn. 591; Frick v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 5 Mo. App. 435; Battishill v. Humphreys, 64 Mich. 494, 514; Hamilton v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. 42 La. Ann. 324; Reilly v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 94 Mo. 600.

But if the employees run a car on a side track without looking to see if a child was near, the company is not liable if they could not have seen the injured child behind a standing car by looking.

the engineer did see the deceased lying on the track, but when he could, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have seen him; and if he could, by reasonable diligence, have seen him in time to stop the train, but did not in fact see him in time to stop it, it would be negligence. (9) If you find the engineer kept a lookout and saw the deceased lying on the track as soon as he could have seen him, and immediately used all the appliances he could control in order to stop the train, and could not do so, it would not be negligence, and you will answer the first issue, 'No.' (10) If you answer the first issue, 'No,' you need not answer the others; for, unless the deceased came to his death by the negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff cannot recover. (11) If you answer the first issue, 'Yes,' I instruct you to answer the second issue, 'Yes,' if you believe the evidence in this case. (12) If you answer the first and second issues, 'Yes,' then come to the third. On this issue the same law is applicable that I have laid down to you as applicable to the first, and the facts that would constitute negligence under the first issue would constitute negligence under the third issue; so that if the facts proven satisfy you that the defendant was guilty of negligence, and you answer the first issue, 'Yes,' it will be your duty to answer the third issue, 'Yes.'"

Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Smith, 28 Kan. 541.

In Iowa the engineer is not bound to watch out for trespassers on the track, and the duty of an engineer in regard to saving trespassing children begins after they are discovered. Burg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (Iowa) Jan. 31, 1894; Messer v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 602.

Trespassers.

In places other than in towns and cities and at crossings, it is generally held that a railroad company is not required to maintain a lookout for trespassers on the track. *East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Where the injured party was trespassing and was intoxicated, some states hold that no outlook is required. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Womack, 84 Ala. 149.

And intoxication imposes no greater vigilance on the part of the company unless those in charge of the train knew his condition. Columbus & W. R. Co. v. Wood, 86 Ala. 164.

But in Felch v. Concord Railroad (N. H.) July 25, 1890, and McDonald v. International & G. N. R. Co. (Tex.) 22 S. W. Rep. 399, reversing 20 S. W. Rep. 847, 25 L. R. A.

Shepherd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. We are of the opinion that there should be a new trial upon the charge of his honor on the third issue. This issue was intended to present to the jury the principle of Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 548, and the jury were instructed that the same law and facts which would constitute negligence under the first issue would be applicable to the third issue. The evidence upon the first issue tended to prove negligence on the part of the defendant by reason of its failure to keep a proper lookout in order to discover the deceased in time to avoid the accident, and also because of its failure to properly equip the train by providing sufficient brakes and brakemen. Now, as the doctrine of Davies v. Mann is based upon some omission of duty occurring after the negligence of the deceased (Gunter v. Wicker, 85 N. C. 812), which negligence was found by the court on the second issue, it is plain that there was error in blending these two essentially different elements of negligence,—the one existing prior, and the other occurring subsequently, to the negligence of the deceased,—and applying them indiscriminately to the third issue. We cannot know upon what phase of the testimony the jury acted in determining the question of negligence upon the first issue, and we have just as much right to assume that, under the charge of the court, they found that the negligence consisted simply in the failure to properly equip the train, as that they predicated it upon the and 21 S. W. Rep. 774, it was held that the railroad company was bound to exercise ordinary care in maintaining a lookout to prevent injury to trespassers.

And in Fraser v. South & North Ala. R. Co., 81 Ala. 185, 60 Am. Rep. 145, it was held that where his actions or conditions indicate that he is helpless, the failure to use the means to prevent injury will be reckless negligence, if the trainmen are in a position to have discovered the peril of the party in time.

And in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Symphkins, 54 Tex. 615, 38 Am. Rep. 632, it was held that the failure to discover a party by the use of due care and diligence will authorize a recovery for injury, where such party was on the track and had a fit, but not where the fit was one of intoxication.

In North Carolina, however, where the trespassing party was intoxicated, and his condition might have been discovered by keeping a reasonable lookout so as to prevent injury, the company will be liable for failure to exercise such care. Norwood v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 111 N. C. 238; Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 14 L. R. A. 749, 109 N. C. 430; Deans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 686.

And in Troy v. Cape Fear & Y. V. R. Co., 99 N. C. 238, where the injured party was intoxicated, it was said that a reasonable lookout is required even for trespassers, and the company will be liable for injuring those who are not guilty of contributory negligence.

These cases next supra hold with the case of SMITH v. NORFOLK & S. R. Co. that a railroad company is required to keep an outlook, even for trespassers.

Many cases hold that the company is not liable for failure to maintain a proper lookout, where the party injured was trespassing, even though such person is a small child. Woodruff v. Northern Pac.

alleged failure to observe ordinary care in keeping a reasonable lookout, etc. Under the first view, there can be no doubt that the finding upon the second issue would have barred a recovery; for if the engineer discovered the deceased as soon as he could have done so by keeping a proper lookout, and immediately applied all the means within his control to avoid the collision, and his failure to do so was by reason of the improper equipment of the train (an omission of duty which might have existed for weeks or months), then the negligence of the defendant would be no more proximate than that of the deceased, and there would be no ground whatever for the operation of the principle of Davies v. Mann. If this be not so, and the principle of that case is to be extended to negligence occurring both prior, as well as that which is subsequent, to the negligence of the deceased, it is perfectly useless to pretend that the doctrine of contributory negligence as to cases of this character has any place in the jurisprudence of this state. This inadvertence on the part of his honor (and such, alone, do we consider it) affords the defendant a clear ground of new trial, and this would be equally true if, as suggested, the third issue had been omitted, and the same instruction had been given on the first.

2. We are also of the opinion that there was error in ignoring that universally established principle in the law of contributory negligence which imposes upon one who has voluntarily disabled himself by reason of intoxication the same degree of care and prudence which is required of a sober person. This is so well established that it would seem unnecessary to cite authority in its support, but, as it appears to be questioned, we will reproduce a few extracts from some of the text-books, which are substantially repeated by every writer upon the subject. Mr. Wood, in his work on Railways (vol. 2, § 1457), after stating that one cannot voluntarily incapacitate himself from liability to exercise ordinary care, and then set up such incapacity as an excuse for his negligence, remarks: "The rule, therefore, is that the same care is required of a person when he is intoxicated as when he is sober, though, if the defendant is aware of his state before the injury, it is bound to exercise greater care to avoid inflicting any injury upon him." In Patterson's Railway Accident Law (p. 74) it is said: "The fact that the person injured was intoxicated at the time of the injury will not relieve him from the legal consequences of his contributory negligence." In Bishop's Noncontract Law (p. 513) it is said: "Contributory negligence is the product of a general ill condition of the mind, and not of a specific intent. Therefore, on principle, drunkenness does not excuse it, and so also are the authorities." In Thompson on Negligence (vol. 1, p. 480) the author remarks: "Nor will the self-inflicted disability of drunkenness excuse the wayfarer from the exercise of such care as is due from a sober man." In Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (vol. 1, p. 93) it is said, in effect,

R. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 689; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Watly, 69 Miss. 145; Scheffler v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 32 Minn. 513; Morrissey v. Eastern R. Co. 126 Mass. 577, 30 Am. Rep. 686; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Greene (Ky.) 19 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 95.

It was said in Ward v. Southern Pac. Co. (Or.) 23 L. R. A. 718, that a railroad company is not guilty of negligence in not keeping a lookout for a trespassing child on the track.

But while a lookout is not required for persons who are trespassing, yet if it is anticipated that such persons will be at a particular place, due caution is to be used. Cassida v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 14 Or. 551.

And in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Grablin (Neb.) Oct. 18, 1898, it was held that a railroad company is liable for injury to a child trespassing if the engineer by the exercise of such lookout as was consistent with his other duties could have seen the child in time to have prevented injury.

And in Texas & P. R. Co. v. O'Donnell, 58 Tex. 27, it was held that a railroad company was liable for injury to a child of tender years which it might have prevented by ordinary care in keeping out look, if the parent had used care in guarding the child.

Where an adult party was injured in a small town but was trespassing on the right of way, although no vigilant lookout was kept, the company was not held liable. Givens v. Kentucky Cent. R. Co. 12 Ky. L. Rep. 960.

And the company was held not liable for failure to maintain a proper lookout where the party injured was trespassing in the yards of the company. Rome R. Co. v. Tolbert, 85 Ga. 447; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Godfrey, 71 Ill. 500, 22 Am. Rep. 112.

Employee on track.

A railroad company was held liable where an employee was properly on the track, stepped off to allow a train to pass, and on stepping back was run over by a detached car and caboose following the train, and the conductor and brakeman were in the cupola of the caboose but no one on the forward car on the lookout. Farley v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 56 Iowa, 337.

And a railroad company was held liable where an employee of a road using an adjoining track was run down and killed by reason of failure of the fireman running the engine to look out. McMarshall v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 80 Iowa, 757.

And the same was held even where the deceased was guilty of the want of ordinary care. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 38 Md. 542.

And where the engineer knew that carpenters were working on an elevated station and backed his engine without looking or warning, the question of negligence was for the jury, and the failure to look out by the engineer showed want of ordinary care. Germann v. Suburban Rapid Transit Co. 37 N. Y. S. R. 380.

But in Nave v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 96 Ala. 284, it was held that the failure to see an employee stationed to flag trains coming from the other direction, is nothing more than simple negligence, which will not authorize a recovery when the plaintiff himself was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to see the train which was visible for more than a mile.

And the inference that a railroad company caused injury by failing to keep a proper lookout, is dispelled by evidence that deceased caught his foot in a cattle guard. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kellem, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 734. See also St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Monday, 49 Ark. 257.

Injuries to passenger.

The railroad company is liable for injury to a that, if the intoxication is such that it prevented the injured person from taking ordinary care to avoid the injury, he cannot recover. See also, Pearce, Railroads, 295; Whittaker's Smith, Neg. 403, note; 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 79. In Beach on Contributory Negligence (p. 403) it is said: "Drunkenness is a wholly self-imposed disability, and, in consequence, is not to be regarded with that kindness and indulgence which we instinctively concede to blindness or deafness or any other physical infirmity."

Disabilities, moreover, of any kind, are to be a shield, and never a sword. It would be a strange rule of law that regarded a certain course of conduct negligent and blameworthy upon the part of a sober man, but that held the same conduct, on the part of the same man when intoxicated, venial and excusable. Drunkenness will never excuse one for a failure to exercise the measure of care and prudence which is due from a sober man under the same circumstances. Men must be content, especially when they are trespassers, to enjoy the pleasures of intoxication cum periculo. When they make themselves drunk, and in that helpless condition wander upon the premises of sober men, and sustain an injury, they will not be heard to plead their intoxication as an answer to the charge of negligence; and the courts consistently hold that such intoxicated trespassers [the notes show that the author is speaking of railroad accidents] have no standing in any form where justice is impartially administered." These authorities, supported by a multitude of cases cited in the notes to the various text-books, established beyond all controversy that the deceased, under the circumstances of this case,—that is, not having been discovered by the engineer,—is to be treated, up to the moment of the collision, as a sober man, and that his helpless condition is not to be assimilated to those cases where the disability has not been self-imposed, and where the helpless condition is treated as a remote cause of the injury by reason of previous negligence or the visitation of Providence. Of course, if the engineer knew, or had reason to know, of his helpless condition in time to have stopped the train and avoided the injury, and failed to do so, he would be guilty of such reckless conduct as would subject him to the punishment of the criminal law, as well as impose a civil liability upon the railroad company. This principle, as we have stated, is peculiar to the self-imposed disability of intoxication, and is as firmly fixed in the law of negligence as it is, as a general rule, in the criminal law of the land. That this is so is evident from the fact that, after the most industrious research, there cannot, it seems, be found in the entire annals of English or American jurisprudence a single decision at common law (nor have we seen any under a statute) in which a recovery has been permitted for injuries inflicted along the line of the road under the circumstances of this case. Even in Missouri and Texas, where perhaps the most advanced doctrine obtains, it has been decided that the action cannot passenger from collision of train with stock on track if the accident might have been avoided by the engineer looking in the proper direction. Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Messino, 1 Sneed, 220; Fordyce v. Jackson, 56 Ark. 594, 601.

And the failure to notify an engineer of the expected arrival of an excursion train with which his train collided in switching, was negligence and rendered the company liable for death of passenger caused thereby, where such injury would have been prevented by keeping lookout. Eddy v. Letcher, 57 Fed. Rep. 115.

Stock.

Under the Alabama statute rendering a railroad company liable for injury to stock from negligence of the company, the company must keep a diligent lookout for stock and will be liable for injury to stock for failure to keep such lookout. Western R. Co. of Alabama v. Sistrunk, 35 Ala. 357; Central R. & Bkg. Co. of Georgia v. Lee, 96 Ala. 444; Louisville & N. E. Co. v. Posey, Id. 232; Mobile & B. R. Co. v. Kimbrough, Id. 127; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Baker, 94 Ala. 682; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Moody, 92 Ala. 279; Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Watson, 91 Ala. 483; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Watson, 90 Ala. 41.

Failure to maintain a steady lookout is itself culpable negligence in Alabama. Western R. Co. v. Lazarus, 93 Ala. 453.

Failure to keep a proper lookout that could have enabled the engineer to have prevented the injury to stock is negligence, and justifies a recovery. Denver & B. G. R. Co. v. Henderson, 10 Colo. 1; Richmond v. Sacramento Valley R. Co. 18 Cal. 361; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Middletown, 46 Ill. 494. (But see Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. North, 142 Ill. 578 reversing 42 Ill. App. 503, infra, which distinguishes this case if not overruling it; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Barrie, 25 L. R. A.

55 Ill. 222; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Legg, 33 Ill. App. 218; Rockford, R. L. & St. L. R. Co. v. Irish, 72 Ill. 404; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Gedney, 44 Kan. 329; Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Hines, 29 Kan. 695, 32 Kan. 619; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 81 Kan. 132; White v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 20 Mo. App. 564; Carlton v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 104 N. C. 365; Snowden v. Norfolk Southern R. Co. 95 N. C. 98; Wilson v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 90 N. C. 69; Washington v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 190.

If a defective headlight only enables the engineer to see fifty or sixty yards ahead, and the train could not be stopped in less space than one hundred and twenty yards, and the stock could have been seen by the use of a proper headlight, the railroad company is liable. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Jones, 71 Ala. 487.

And in Northeastern R. Co. v. Martin, 78 Ga. 603, it was held that a verdict for plaintiff will not be set aside where there was no lookout at the time, on both sides of the cab, the engineer on the lookout on the right side and the fireman busy firing the engine; and the court said that if the railroad relies on a fireman to look out they had better get somebody else to look out when he is busy.

And on the failure to see a mare on a straight track, until within twenty or thirty yards off, where she had run 300 yards down the track in front of the engine, the night being clear and starlight, the question of negligence on the part of the company was one for the jury. Kent v. New Orleans & T. R. Co. 67 Miss. 608.

The engineer is required to use due care and vigilance in keeping lookout for stock, in the Indian Territory. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnson, 10 U. S. App. 627, 54 Fed. Rep. 474; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 10 U. S. App. 640, 54 Fed. Rep. 481; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellidge, 4 U. S. App. 136, 49 Fed. Rep. 356; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cuda, 4 U. S.

be maintained unless the engineer knew, or had reason to know, of the exposed and unconscious condition of the deceased. Yarnall v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 75 Mo. 575; Houston & T. O. R. Co. v. Symplins, 54 Tex. 615, 38 Am. Rep. 632. See also, numerous cases cited in the notes to Kean v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (Md.) 19 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 321.

In the Texas case it will be noted that the court distinctly held that it was the duty of the engineer to keep a lookout to avoid injury even to trespassers; yet a new trial was granted, on the ground that it was not left to the jury to determine whether the injured party was intoxicated or was suffering from a providential visitation,—"a fit." If his lying on the track, insensible to danger, was due to the former, and not to the latter, cause, it was declared that plaintiff could not recover. It may be further observed that this case is cited as an authority in Troy v. Cape Fear & Y. V. R. Co., 99 N. C. 298, and it is remarkable that, even in the two states where it is said the doctrine of comparative negligence obtains, this action could not be maintained. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Ora-

App. 200, 49 Fed. Rep. 353; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Washington, 4 U. S. App. 121, 49 Fed. Rep. 347.

In Hoffman v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 24 Mo. App. 545, it was held that the liability of the company begins after having discovered the peril of the stock, and not that the company is liable for failure to use reasonable diligence to discover the situation of the stock. But this doctrine is denied in Hill v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 49 Mo. App. 520.

A railroad company is liable for injury to stock straying on track where not fenced, if it fails to exercise reasonable care to have a lookout for the stock so as to avoid injury. Hill v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. supra.

Under Ky. Gen. Stat., chap. 37, § 2, the owner of stock killed may recover one half the value of the stock, where he has not received compensation for fencing against road, but a mutual contract to fence by the railroad and owner would relieve the company from liability for failure to keep a lookout for stray cattle. This however may be rescinded by lapse of time. Ohio Valley R. Co. v. O'Daniel, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 225.

But in Howard v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 67 Miss. 247, it was held that the failure to keep lookout because both engineer and fireman are busy with other duties does not render the company liable.

And in Minnesota the common law in reference to the restraint of domestic animals prevails and as to stock trespassing, the employers are not negligent in failing to look out ahead. Stacey v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 42 Minn. 158; Looke v. First Div. St. Paul & P. R. Co. 15 Minn. 350; Palmer v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 37 Minn. 223.

And in Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Noble, 142 Ill. 578, reversing 42 Ill. App. 509, and distinguishing Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Middleworth, 46 Ill. 494, it was held that a railroad company was not bound to keep a lookout for trespassing stock at a place where the company has fenced the track.

In Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Holland, 40 Ark. 338, and Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Finley, 37 Ark. 562, it was held that it was the duty of the engineer to look out for stock wrongfully on the track, and that the company was liable for injury from failure to do so, but these cases were in effect overruled in cases next infra.

And in Arkansas it is now held it is not negligence for a railroad company to fail to keep a lookout for stock. Memphis & L. R. Co. v. Kerr, 5 L. R. A. 429, 52 Ark. 162; Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Shaver (Ark.) Nov. 15, 1890.

And in the absence of a statute requiring a fence against stock, it is not negligence to fail to keep a lookout over the entire breadth of the right of way. Kansas City, S. & M. R. Co. v. Kirksey, 48 Ark. 366.

The railroad company is not liable if it uses all the means at hand to prevent collision, possible, as soon as the animal is discovered, and the engineer is diligent in keeping a lookout. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Bayliss, 75 Ala. 405, 74 Ala. 150; Mobile & G. R. Co. v. Caldwell, 83 Ala. 198.

as section 1186 of the Code, and sections 1298, 1300, of the later edition, which provide that the railroad company shall maintain a lookout always ahead, and be liable for injuries caused for failure so to do, and for failure to give warning, it is held that the liability of the company in such a case for injury to persons on the track is absolute. Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Nowlin, 1 Lea. 423; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Connor, 9 Heisk. 19; Katzenberger v. Lawo, 13 L. R. A. 185, 90 Tenn. 236; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. White, 5 Lea. 1540; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Pratt, 85 Tenn. 9.

Under the provisions of the Tennessee statute, when the motion of the train is reversed, the engine must be placed on the other end of the train with a lookout ahead, or else the company must take the consequences. Knoxville, C. G. & L. R. Co. v. Acuff, 92 Tenn. 26; Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Wilson, 13 L. R. A. 354, 90 Tenn. 271.

And contributory negligence will not defeat a recovery but may mitigate damages. Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Smith, 6 Heisk. 174; Chattanooga R. Co. v. Walker, 11 Heisk. 383; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Humphreys, 12 Lea. 200; Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co. v. Foster, 38 Tenn. 672.

And in East Tennessee & G. R. Co. v. St. John, 5 Sneed, 524, 73 Am. Dec. 149, it was held that the liability for failing to keep a lookout for a boy asleep on the track was the same as under the statute.

In the case of a train breaking in two, it was held that the statute was not applicable, but that the common law was the same, and contributory negligence could be considered in mitigation of damages. Patton v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 13 L. R. A. 184, 89 Tenn. 370.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Robertson, 9 Heisk. 276, it was held that the statute did not apply where an employé in the yard was injured while engaged in his duties in making memorandum.

And under the statute imposing liability for failure to keep lookout for stock this means only at the place where the accident occurred and not all along the line. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Stone, 7 Heisk. 463.

And when headlight is obscured by rain, the company is not liable under the statute for killing stock. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Melton, 2 Lea. 232.

In Byrne v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. (Tenn.) 24 L. R. A. 608, it was held that the precautions required by the statute were not necessary where a person suddenly got on the track before the signal could be given or means applied to stop the train.

And under the Tennessee statute the lookout for stock need only be on the track and not over the entire right of way. Louisville, N. & G. S. R. Co. v. Reidmond, 11 Lea. 205.

In this note cases in regard to lookouts on trains making flying switches are not included—for which see note to Kentucky Cent. R. Co. v. Smith, (Ky.) 18 L. R. A. 63. See also Wallace v. City & S. R. Co. (Or.) post, 663, as to care required to avoid injury to children on the track.

gta. 71 Ill. 177; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Bell, 70 Ill. 103; Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Riley, 47 Ill. 514; Southwestern R. Co. v. Hankerson, 61 Ga. 114. We are unable to understand how, upon principle, the case of one who is asleep on the track can be assimilated, as argued, to that of a self-imposed disability of intoxication, which, as we have seen by all of the authorities, stands upon its own peculiar ground. Being on the track is not itself negligence (Troy's Case), and, if such a person is unexpectedly overcome by sleep, his disability cannot be said to have been self-imposed. Neither are we able to see how the case of a deaf mute walking on the track can be likened unto that of a person who is lying there stupefied by strong drink. A high degree of care is required of one who is deaf, and who places himself in a position of known danger. Still, if the engineer can, by reasonable diligence, discover him on the track and his insensibility to danger, the disability being involuntary, he is entitled to recover. Nor can we perceive any similarity between the intoxicated man and a cow that has strayed upon the track, the cow, of course, not being the author of its insensibility to danger, and the owner really guilty, as is held by this court, of no negligence whatever in turning his cattle out to graze.

The principle of which we are speaking has never been denied by this court as a distinct ground of decision, though the case of a drunken man was used in Deans' Case, 107 N. C. 686, as one of the illustrations of certain very important principles in the law of negligence, which it will be seen hereafter we fully approve. The point did not arise in that case, as it was not found or admitted that the deceased was intoxicated, and the ruling below was simply to the effect that, upon the whole testimony, the defendant owed no duty to look out and discover trespassers upon the track, and therefore was not guilty of negligence. The ruling of his honor was regardless of the fact whether the deceased was drunk or sober, and it was necessary that this court should declare the duty of railroad companies as to persons on the track at places other than crossings, and also to discuss the doctrine of contributory negligence in its relation to the principle commonly called the "Rule in Davies v. Mann." The language used in the opinion is as follows: "If the engineer discover, or, by reasonable watchfulness, may discover, a person lying upon the track asleep or drunk, or see a human being who is known by him to be insane or otherwise insensible to danger, or unable to avoid it, upon the track in his front, it is his duty to resolve all doubts in favor of the preservation of life, and immediately use every available means, short of imperiling the lives of passengers on his train, to stop it." From this language it might be inferred that the duty of the engineer begins only upon the discovery of the person in danger; for, until he does discover him, the duty of resolving all doubts in favor of his preservation from danger cannot very reasonably arise. Taken, however, in connection with other parts of the opinion and the declaration of the court in subsequent cases, it cannot be doubted that it was intended to declare the duty of keeping a proper lookout for all persons who may be on the track. The declaration, however, of a duty, and the effect of intoxication in contributory negligence, are very different things; and the latter question was, for the reasons above mentioned, not presented to the court. It is true that from the opinion it might be inferred that intoxication, if it had been found as a fact, would have excused the negligence of the deceased; but, as we have said, this particular point was not decided, nor do the authorities cited in the opinion support this view. Let us examine these cases. In Houston & T. O. R. Co. v. Smith, 53 Tex. 179, the injury was inflicted upon a man who was walking upon the railroad track, and was negligent. He was held, under the circumstances, to be guilty of contributory negligence, and it is to be noted that there was evidence tending to show that he was intoxicated. In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 279, the action was brought for injuries received by the plaintiff in a collision between a locomotive and the wagon in which the plaintiff was riding. There was nothing in the case about intoxication; but, in the course of his learned opinion, Judge Christy, in discussing the general subject of negligence, remarked that, if the engineer "sees" a person in peril on the track whom he has reason to believe to be badly intoxicated or otherwise insensible to danger, he must use all the means in his power to stop the train and avoid a collision. In East Tennessee & G. R. Co. v. St. John, 5 Sneed, 524, 78 Am. Dec. 149, the accident complained of was to a child eight years of age; and in Meeks v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 56 Cal. 518, 88 Am. Rep. 67, the accident was to a child six or seven years of age. In neither of these cases was the effect of intoxication discussed, and they were evidently cited for the purpose of sustaining the rule imposing the duty upon the engineer of keeping a lookout for persons along the line of the track, and upon that question they are in point. To the same effect is the much-cited case of Isbell v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 27 Conn. 393, 71 Am. Dec. 78; but, as bearing upon the particular question under consideration, it may be noted that the action was brought for the killing of cattle straying upon the track, and that the duty which the law imposes upon an intoxicated person was in no way involved in the decision. The following language, however, appears in the discussion of the general subject: "Or if an intoxicated man is lying in the traveled part of the highway, helpless, if not unconscious, must I not use care to avoid him? May I say that he has no right to incur the highway, and therefore carelessly continue my progress, regardless of consequences? Or, if such a man has taken refuge in a field of grass or a hedge of bushes, may the owner of a field, knowing the fact, continue to mow on or fell trees, as if it was not so? Or if the intoxicated man has entered a private lane or byway, and will be run over if the owner does not stop his team which is passing through it, must he not stop them?" We have quoted the entire paragraph, so that it can be readily seen that this dictum (and it is nothing more) really means, what we all concede, that, if such an intoxicated person is discovered, it is a duty dictated by humanity, as well as the law, to avoid inflicting an injury upon him. If this is not so, what meaning is to be attached to the words "carelessly continue my progress," "knowing the fact," and "does not stop them?" When Mr. Wood (vol. 2, p. 1484) speaks of the duty which is due to persons lying on the track in connection with a child or an animal, he very clearly did not intend to say that, when a drunken man is not discovered, he is to be absolved from the consequences of his own negligence, as the only case he refers to of persons lying on the track is the case of Meeks v. Southern Pac. R. Co., supra, where a child lying on the track was run over and injured. That he did not mean that a drunken man would be excused from exercising the same care that is required of a sober man is evident from his explicit statement of the contrary doctrine, which we have heretofore quoted, and which is sustained by all of the authorities. This is also perfectly manifest from the fact that on the very next page he quotes with approval that part of the opinion in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Miller, supra, which contains the language of Judge Christy to which we have referred, and which indicates that the railroad company is only liable for the failure of duty after discovery of the drunken man. The author says: "And this, we believe, is an accurate statement of the duty of railway companies under the circumstances referred to." It is manifest from this examination that these cases do not sustain the proposition that an intoxicated person is absolved from the duty of exercising ordinary care, and it is but proper to say that they were probably cited for the purpose of sustaining the general principles laid down in the extract which we have quoted.

Having shown, we think conclusively, not merely by the weight but by the entire course of judicial opinion, that the self-imposed disability of intoxication affords no more excuse in the law of negligence than it does in the criminal law, we cannot understand how we could be justified in the abrogation of this principle, which has stood for centuries, simply by reason of what may be implied from the language of an opinion in a case that did not distinctly raise the question. This, it seems to us, would not be following the doctrine of stare decisis, and the argument that a court can arbitrarily reject a fundamental principle of law by calling it a fiction is, we think, wholly inadmissible. If we can do this, there is no reason why the same principle may not be rejected as a fiction in the criminal law; and, indeed, we do not see why we could not dispose of any other well-grounded rule of law in the like summary manner. The supposed analogy with the principle of equity which relieves a wholly intoxicated person against the consequences of his contracts cannot be supported. Equity shields him in such cases when he has been imposed upon by reason of such incapacity, but neither equity nor law ever converts intoxication into a sword, by means of which a drunken man can make a profit out of his self-imposed disability, when a sober man, under the same circumstances, would be entitled to no relief. It would, as Mr. Beach says, be a strange law that would enable a drunken man to recover when under the same circumstances a sober man would be denied all redress; and there certainly can be no more inhumanity in denying a recovery to one who, by an act done in his intoxicated condition, might probably contribute to the wrecking of a train and the destruction of the lives of passengers, than to hang a man for murder committed while wholly unconscious of his act, by reason of the influence of strong drink. The law does not treat such unfortunate persons who may be on the track as outlaws. On the contrary, this court and several others have declared it to be the duty of the engineer to keep a vigilant lookout for them and all other persons; but, when he fails to discover them by the omission of ordinary care (and this is the measure of his duty, — Deans' Case, supra; McAdoo v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 105 N. C. 140), there would seem to be no injustice in denying a recovery to one who has voluntarily stupefied his senses, so as to be unable to provide for his own safety. The engineer is running a train over his own right of way, and by an inadvertence, which amounts simply to the failure to use ordinary care, fails to discover a person who really has no right to be on the track, and who he cannot reasonably anticipate will make it a place of drunken repose. The engineer, when he discovers the man, uses every means in his power to avoid the injury. The man, had he been sober, could easily have escaped; but, by reason of the self-imposed disability of intoxication, makes no effort to do so. Can there be anything wrong in refusing to cast upon the defendant the whole responsibility of the collision, and making it pay for an accident which would not have happened had the deceased been sober, and for which had he been sober, he could not have maintained an action? The law is just, as well as humane, and denies a recovery under such circumstances. Such has always been the law both in England and America. It has been approved by such great jurists as Ruffin, Nash, Pearson, and their distinguished successors, and we feel that we are treading upon safe ground when we follow in their footsteps. If the legislature sees fit to change the law in this respect, it has the power to do so, but we do not think that so radical a change in the law of negligence should be wrought by what we cannot help thinking would be "judicial legislation."

As we have already intimated, the fact that the elementary principle referred to seems to be seriously disputed is the only reason we have said so much in its support, as we believe it to be established beyond all question by the consensus of judicial decision, as well as the opinion of all of the authors upon the subject. If, then, the same degree of care is required of the deceased "as is required of a sober man under the same circumstances," it is plain that his negligence was concurrent with that of the engineer, and he was therefore guilty of contributory negligence. McAdoo's Case, supra, and the authorities cited. Indeed, as we shall hereafter see, his negligence, operating, as it did, up to the moment of the collision, and after the decisive negligence of the engineer, was really subsequent negligence, and goes far beyond what is sufficient to bar a recovery. Had the deceased been looking and listening, as he was required to do, he would have had ample time to have escaped from his peril after the engineer had passed the point when his efforts would have been unavailing to save him. Under this view, he being, in contemplation of the law, able to avoid the consequences of the prior negligence of the defendant, it would seem that, if the train had been injured by the obstruction, his negligence would have been the proximate cause of the accident, and the defendant, and not the deceased, would have been entitled to recover. A sober man, as we have seen very clearly, could not have recovered; and is a premium to be offered to negligence, caused by the self-imposed disability of drunkenness, which prevents one from using ordinary care by looking and listening for the approach of trains which he is bound to know the defendant has a right to run, and will run, over its own property, in the pursuit of its legitimate business? In this case there is a total absence of testimony tending to show that the conduct of the engineer was wanton or willful, and his testimony to the effect that he sounded the alarm, and applied the brakes, and used all other means under his control to avoid the accident, as soon as he discovered the deceased lying on the track, is wholly uncontradicted. The action, then, being founded upon the failure to use ordinary care, is subject, of course, to the defense of contributory negligence, and we cannot conceive of a plainer case than the one now before us. We feel very sure that his honor's failure to apply the principle which we have been discussing entitles the defendant to a new trial.

3. While the foregoing considerations are, in our opinion, sufficient to dispose of this appeal, we deem it our duty, in view of the argument of counsel, to express our approval of certain general principles laid down in Dean's Case, and also our views as to how they should be applied. Leaving, then, the facts of this particular case behind us, we will state that one of the principles referred to is that which imposes upon the engineer of a railroad train the duty of keeping a vigilant lookout on the track, in order to discover and avoid any obstructions that may be encountered thereon. This duty is due to the passengers, and, when consistent with the necessary attention of the engineer and other employés on the engine to its safe and proper management, the duty is likewise due to the owner of cattle running at large, to the owner of other property which, under certain circumstances, may be on the track, and also, as a general rule, to persons who may be on the same at places other than crossings. When, under the particular circumstances of a case, such property or persons may, by the exercise of ordinary care, be discovered in time to avoid a collision, the failure to exercise such ordinary care is negligence, and the plaintiff will be entitled to recover, unless he has been guilty of contributory negligence. Of course, where a person is discovered, and is apparently not unconscious of danger, it is to be presumed that he will observe ordinary caution, and the engineer is not required to stop the train. Although this principle, as applied to persons on the track, does not generally prevail, there seems to be a growing disposition on the part of the courts to recognize it as a common-law duty, and in Georgia and Tennessee it has been imposed by statute.

In Tennessee, however, it was said by Lurton, Ch. J. (Patton v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 89 Tenn. 370, 12 L. R. A. 184. See also St. John's Case, supra), that such is the law without reference to the statute, and he quotes with approval the language of Mr. Wood, who says "that a railroad company is bound to keep a reasonable lookout for trespassers upon its track, and is bound to exercise such care as the circumstances require to prevent injury." 2 Wood, Railway Law, 1267. This language is also quoted with approval by the supreme court of West Virginia, and a recovery was sustained, upon the same principle, for injuries to a child trespassing upon the track. Gunn v. Ohio River R. Co. 36 W. Va. 165. To the same effect is Meeks v. Southern Pac. R. Co., supra, and other cases.

This ruling on our part is supported by the plain intimation, if not, indeed, the decision, of this court in Troy v. Cape Fear & Y. V. R. Co., supra, in which it is said that a person walking upon a railroad track is not guilty of contributory negligence per se, nor does such a "technical" trespass relieve the railroad company of the duty of exercising ordinary care to avoid the infliction of injury, provided such person, after he gets on the track, does nothing "positive or negative to contribute to the immediate injury." The court adopts the principle laid down in the leading case of Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Symphkins, supra, and it may be well to reproduce an extract from the opinion in that case. The court said: "In our opinion, there is a distinction between the duty devolving on the owners of land on which there is a dangerous excavation and that devolving on a corporation invested by law with the extraordinary power of traversing the country with huge cars, whose progress is everywhere attended with danger. They who place such dangerous machines in motion should, we think, be required to take precautions against their injuring any one who may happen to be in their pathway. 'The care in conducting any business should be proportionate to its dangerous nature. Gorman v. Pacific Railroad, 26 Mo. 448, 72 Am. Dec. 220.' The extent of the precaution required of a railroad company depends on all the circumstances. The regulation of railroads exact watchfulness of the engineers, and this rule should operate for the benefit of the public as well as the company.

"Authorities are not lacking in support of the position that a 'reasonable lookout,' varying according to the danger and all the surrounding circumstances, is a duty always devolving on those in charge of a train in motion. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 86 Md. 366; Harlan v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 65 Mo. 22; Hicks v. Pacific R. Co. 64 Mo. 480. The duty of watchfulness has often been enforced against railroads in cases of injuries to cattle trespassing on their tracks, and that, too, in the absence of any statutory provision, or in cases outside of the statute. We prefer that line of decisions holding railroads bound to exercise their dangerous business with due care to avoid injury to others, as correct in principle and sound in policy, and as protecting even a trespasser who is not guilty of contributory negligence." These principles, when applied with a proper regard to the defense of contributory negligence, commend themselves to our judgment as just as they are humane, and they are especially applicable to railroads operating within our state, where, as a matter of common knowledge, the use of their tracks by pedestrians is tacitly acquiesced in. We can see no hardship in exacting this duty of engineers, and holding their principals responsible when they fail to exercise due care in discovering and avoiding injuries to helpless persons between crossings, who are in plain view upon their tracks; and this is really the duty imposed upon them in such cases. As we have stated, this duty has been established by several decisions of this court, and at the present term we enforced it in the case of an injury to a child of tender years, who could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have been discovered by the engineer. Bottoms v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. (N. C.) 19 S. E. Rep. 780. We see no reason to reverse our former rulings upon this important subject, simply because in some of the other states a contrary doctrine is held. We believe that they are founded upon principle, as well as respectable authority; and for these reasons, as well as a due regard to the doctrine of stare decisis, we should adhere to the principles therein enunciated.

4. We have thus dwelt upon the existence and nature of this duty, because it is impossible to discuss the doctrine of contributory negligence, even to a limited extent, unless we have a clear conception of this constituent element, as well as of other terms and definitions relating to the subject. Indeed, it may be safely remarked that no science is more dependent upon the accuracy of its terms and definitions than that of the law. Looseness of language and dicta in judicial opinions, either silently acquiesced in or perpetuated by inadvertent repetition, often insidiously exert their influence, until they result in confusing the application of the law, or themselves become crystalized into a kind of authority, which the courts, without reference to true principle, are constrained to follow. These observations are particularly applicable to the doctrine of contributory negligence, and especially in its relation to what is generally called the "Rule of Davies v. Mann." All along the highway of judicial decision we find it strewn with the wrecks of overruled cases, exploded dicta, and condemned or qualified expressions, that we are inclined to sympathize in the despairing remarks of Judge Thompson that "the whole subject of contributory negligence remains in a state of great confusion and uncertainty." 2 Thomp. Neg. § 7. Mr. Beach, Mr. Patterson, and some other writers attribute much of this obscurity to improper definitions of the rule in Davies v. Mann, and we think, with them, that it is simply a means of determining whether the plaintiff's negligence is a remote or a proximate cause of the injury. Before the introduction of the rule, any negligence on the part of the plaintiff, which in any degree contributed to the accident, was judicially treated as a proximate cause, and constituted contributory negligence, which barred a recovery. Dowell v. General Steam Nav. Co. 5 El. & Bl. 195. Several reasons have been assigned in support of this principle, one of which is that a court of law, unlike a court of admiralty, has "no scales to determine in such cases whose wrongdoing weighed most in the compound that occasioned the mischief," and therefore, if the plaintiff were allowed to recover, "it might be that he would obtain from the other party compensation for his own misconduct." 2 Thomp. Neg. 1146-1154. This was considered a harsh rule, as it left the plaintiff to bear all the damages, although he may have been but remotely, and consequently but slightly, in fault. The doctrine, however, was qualified by the ruling in Davies v. Mann; and it was determined that, although the plaintiff was guilty of a want of ordinary care in contributing to the injury, yet this would not prevent him from maintaining an action if the defendant might have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care on his part. Much confusion, as we have seen, has resulted in the application of this principle, and it has been claimed to be authority for the doctrine of comparative negligence, and it has also been criticised as practically abolishing the doctrine of contributory negligence altogether. A very reasonable explanation of it is made by Mr. Patterson, however, who says: "The rule has been misunderstood and misapplied. It means only that that negligence upon the part of the plaintiff, which bars his recovery from the defendant, must have been a proximate cause of the injury, and that it is not a proximate, but only a remote, cause of the injury when the defendant, notwithstanding the plaintiff's negligence, might, by the exercise of ordinary care and skill, have avoided the injury. Thus stated, the rule is consistent with the theory upon which the doctrine of contributory negligence is based, and furnishes no support for that of comparative negligence." Patterson, Railway Accident Law, 51. Mr. Beach expresses the same view, and adds that "the attempts of the judges to ring a new change, or to find some novel and original phrase in which to express the rule that, whenever the negligence of a plaintiff proximately contributes to cause the injury for which he seeks to recover damages, he has no cause of action, has thrown the law into confusion." Beach, Contrib. Neg. p. 83; Pollock, Torts, 295; Bishop, Non-Cont. L. 459; 2 Wood, Railway Law, 1447; Whart. Neg. 823; 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 18, 19, 27, notes. It must also be observed that shortly after the decision of Davies v. Mann, Lord Campbell, in 5 El. & Bl. 195, understood the doctrine to be the same as stated above. These views have been distinctly adopted by this court in several cases, and are well expressed in Farmer v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 88 N. C. 564, in which Mr. Justice Ashe states that whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence depends upon whether his act "was a proximate or a remote cause. If the act is directly connected, so as to be concurrent with that of the defendant, then his negligence is proximate, and will bar his recovery; but, where the negligent act of the plaintiff precedes in point of time that of the defendant, then it is held to be a remote cause of the injury, and will not bar a recovery, if the injury could have been prevented by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence on the part of the defendant." Thomp. Neg. 1157, note 8; Gunter v. Wicker, supra; Doggett v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 78 N. C. 305; Roberts v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 88 N. C. 560.

Thus, it appears that, where the doctrine of Davies v. Mann is applicable, it excludes contributory negligence; and, if this be so, it would be confusing to say that, notwithstanding the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, he may nevertheless recover if the defendant could, by ordinary care, have avoided the injury. Whether a third issue should be submitted is a matter addressed to the discretion of the judge, but, when he does submit such an issue, it will avoid dispute as to the meaning of terms to omit the word "contributory." This is in accord with the suggestion of Mr. Justice Avery in the well-considered opinion in McAdoo v. Richmond & D. R. Co., supra.

Recurring, however, to the main question, it becomes important to determine what is a "proximate cause," within the meaning of the rule, and it was to this point that the learned argument of counsel for the defendant was chiefly addressed. In Farmer v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., supra, and the authorities cited, it will be seen that this depends upon whether "the negligent act of the plaintiff precedes in point of time that of the defendant;" and this is the view, according to Judge Thompson, which is supported by the weight of English and American authorities. 2 Thomp. Neg. 1157. Counsel insists that, until the actual discovery of the person apparently in danger, the negligence of such person cannot be said in a legal sense to precede that of the defendant; and therefore, unless the injury could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care after such discovery, the plaintiff has no cause of action. It must be manifest that, if this is the correct view, the rule in question would have but little room for application; for when an engineer actually sees a person apparently insensible to danger, and fails to use ordinary care to avoid his injury, he is guilty of such a reckless and wanton disregard of human life that his conduct is so far regarded as willful as to practically place him entirely outside of the law of negligence. Beach, Contrib. Neg. 55. Many cases were cited by counsel in support of his proposition, but, on examination, it will be seen that they come from states where the duty of the engineer to anticipate and keep a lookout for persons along the line of the road is not imposed. The failure to advert to the nonexistence of this duty is but an illustration of one of the many ways by which the doctrine of negligence is confused. In speaking of such decisions, a discriminating writer remarks: "But these cases may rest on the principle that it is no want of ordinary care not to look out for persons where they have no right to be." And it is to be noted that Judge Thompson's "discovery clause," as Mr. Beach disapprovingly calls it (Beach, Contrib. Neg. 55), seems to be based in part upon this very idea. 2 Thomp. Neg. p. 1157, § 7. Judge Thompson, however, very candidly admits that his view is not sustained by the weight of authority, and, after stating that "the practitioner is concerned to know the conclusion of the courts rather than the views of writers," proceeds to lay down the rule which omits the discovery feature, and which has been literally adopted by this court in Farmer's Case, supra, and many others. That a discovery of the danger is not necessary to make the negligence of the plaintiff a proximate cause of the injury is evident from the case of Butterfield v. Forrester, 11 East, 60, the earliest decision upon the subject of contributory negligence, as the negligence there which defeated a recovery was the failure of the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, to discover and avoid a collision with an obstruction which the defendant had negligently placed in the street of Derby. So, on the other hand, in the case of Davies v. Mann, it did not appear that the defendant discovered the historic donkey fettered upon the highway, and it seems that the failure to discover and avoid him was the true ground of the action. It is also to be remarked that in the first case in which the principle of Davies v. Mann was applied by this court it did not appear that the defendant saw the plaintiff in the place of danger; and it was held that, although the plaintiff was negligent, yet it was previous to that of the defendant, who, by the exercise of ordinary care, might have avoided the injury. Gunter v. Wicker, supra. We think that a plain and simple statement of the rule is to be found in Shearman & Redfield in their work on Negligence, volume 1, § 99. It is that "the party who last has a clear opportunity of avoiding the accident, notwithstanding the negligence of his opponent, is considered solely responsible for it." This is entirely consistent with our doctrine, as the negligence of the party injured in such a case may well be considered to have preceded that of the defendant in point of time. See Cooley, Torta, 70, 71, which is cited and commented upon in Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 449, 14 L. R. A. 749; Bishop Non-Cont. L. 463. This view is but another way of stating the principle that "where the negligence of the person inflicting the injury is subsequent to and independent of the carelessness of the person injured, and ordinary care on the part of the person inflicting the injury would have discovered the carelessness of the person injured in time to have avoided its effects, and prevented injuring him, there is no contributory negligence, because the fault of the injured party becomes remote in the chain of causation." The foregoing extract is taken from the able article on "Contributory Negligence" in the America & English Encyclopedia of Law (vol. 4, p. 27), and is sustained by Tuff v. Warman, 5 C. B. N. S. 573, and numerous authorities cited in the notes, and also by our own decisions.

Applying the rule which we have stated to accidents upon railroad tracks, it may be illustrated as follows: First. There must be a duty imposed upon the engineer, as otherwise there can be no negligence to which the negligence of the injured party is to contribute. The duty under consideration is to keep a vigilant lookout (consistent with other necessary duties in running the train) in order to discover and avoid injury to persons who may be on the track, and who are apparently in unconscious or helpless peril. When such a person is on the track, and the engineer fails to discover him in time to avoid a collision, when he could have done so by the exercise of ordinary care, the engineer is guilty of negligence. The decisive negligence of the engineer is when he has reached that point when no effort on his part can avert the collision. Hence, if A., being on the track, and, after this decisive negligence, fails to look and listen, and is in consequence, run over and injured, his negligence is not concurrent merely, but really subsequent to that of the engineer, and he cannot recover, as he, and not the engineer, has "the last clear opportunity of avoiding the accident." If, however, A. is on the track (and here it may be remarked, in passing, that being on the track is not per se negligence, — Troy's Case, supra), and while there, and before the decisive negligence of the engineer, he, by his own negligence, becomes so entangled in the rails that he cannot extricate himself in time to avoid the collision, and his helpless condition could have been discovered had the engineer exercised ordinary care, then the negligence of A. would be previous to that of the engineer, and the engineer's negligence would be the proximate cause, he, and not A., having the last clear opportunity of avoiding the injury. The same result would follow in the case of a wagon negligently stalled, when no effort of the owner could remove it; and there are other cases to which the principle is applicable. These illustrations show how the rule of Davies v. Mann operates in cases where the primary duty is to keep a lookout and to discover, and the principle we have stated should be applied by the courts to the various phases of fact arising upon the testimony, and juries should not be left to determine the case simply under the general language of the rule. This, it seems to us, is the only way in which the rule can be properly applied in the presence of a duty like that which is imposed upon railroad companies as to persons or property upon the track. To say that the principle of Davies v. Mann does not apply until the discovery of the danger is to practically abrogate the duty. It may be here observed that a recovery is permitted by a person who, being on the track when there is no immediate danger, is stricken down by the visitation of Providence, when he might have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary care. There being no negligence in such a case by simply going upon the track, there is no contributory negligence, and the same is true as to children of such tender years as to be incapable of discretion. We have not attempted to discuss the law of contributory negligence in all of its aspects, and our chief object has been to meet the arguments of the able counsel, which were directed against the existence of the duty under consideration and the application of the principle of Davies v. Mann until the actual discovery of the danger. It has been suggested that, when the engineer fails to exercise ordinary care in discovering persons on the line of the track, he is not guilty of ordinary negligence, which all the text-writers and our own court, time and again, have declared is the legal effect of a want of ordinary care (McAdoo's Case and authorities cited), but that his conduct is so willful and wanton that there can be no contributory negligence whatever. Under such a rule, not only will railroads be made insurers against the consequences of the negligence of all persons trespassing upon their property, but even the engineer may be convicted of murder by reason of a mere inadvertence. It is hardly necessary to say that all of the decisions of our court are against such a position, and this is the general current of authority. We think that, in declaring the duty we have been considering, this court has gone as far as a reasonable exercise of its authority permits. If such a revolutionary change is to be made in the law of negligence, or, rather, if the law of negligence is to be altogether abolished in such cases, it should be done by the legislature, and not by this court. "Jus dicere non dare." For the reasons given in the first two divisions of this opinion, we think there should be a new trial.

MacRae, J.:

I concur in the conclusion reached by the Chief Justice that there should be a new trial, but I do not concur in any expressions which indicate that there is a duty upon the defendant's servant, in the absence of reasonable ground of apprehension, to anticipate that a person, sui juris, will voluntarily expose himself to danger.

Clark, J., dissenting:

When a person is walking on the track, the engineer is to presume that, upon sounding the signal, he will get off, and is not called on to slacken speed or stop (Meredith v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 108 N. C. 616), unless he recognizes him in time as an insane or deaf man, or unless it is a child without sufficient discretion. Bottoms v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. [at this term] (N. C.) 19 S. E. Rep. 730. If the man, in a paroxysm or from drunkenness or asleep, is lying on the track, and the engineer sees him in time to avert the injury, and does not do so, the company is liable. Why? Because the negligence of the man does not authorize the engineer to kill him or cripple him; and if, after discovery of his helpless condition, when made in time to avoid injury, the man is killed or crippled, such killing or crippling is wanton or reckless, and the company is liable, though, of course, the negligence of the party on the track continues up to the very moment of the impact. Now, take this state of facts as found by the jury. The man is helpless, lying prone upon a railroad track, and the engineer, by the exercise of ordinary care, in keeping a proper lookout, could have discovered the helpless man in time to have avoided killing or crippling him; but because he was not using ordinary care, and was negligent in that duty, the engineer does not in fact see the helpless man in time, and runs over him. Is not the company liable? But it is said that the company owes no duty to the man lying helpless on the track. This plea is the same as one made of old, "Am I my brother's keeper?" And we are told that that brother's blood "cried from the ground."

In Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 109 N. C. 450, 14 L. R. A. 749, it was held (it is true by a divided court) that the railroad company was liable for killing a man on a short trestle, though the man was walking. The company was held responsible, though the engineer on a rapidly moving train could hardly have had time to calculate exactly where the trestle was, and that, at the respective rates the man and engine were moving, the engine would overtake the man exactly at that spot where he could not easily have stepped off. That case is a precedent, and entitled to due weight as such. If the company is held to liability for striking a walking man (who is expected to step off) because the engineer cannot calculate that he will overtake the man at a particular, dangerous spot, for a stronger reason should the company be liable when the man is down on the track, and the engineer can know that he is in a dangerous place with less trouble than making a calculation, and by the exercise of no other faculty than the use of his eyes in keeping the ordinary lookout, which his duty to the passengers and train in his charge requires him to keep any way. Population is increasing, and likewise the speed and rapidity of railroad trains. It will be more and more impossible to keep people off the track as the country settles up. Their being there is no license to kill or cripple them on sight. The railroad companies have the right of way over their own tracks, but they must use it with reason, and with a regard to human life. "Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non laedas." If the man is walking on the track, he is reasonably to be expected to get off in time, especially if the whistle is sounded. If he does not, clearly the company is not liable. The man is negligent, and the company shows neither wantonness nor recklessness. If the man is crossing the track, he must look and listen. If he does not, and the engine strikes him, it is clearly his fault, and there is no recklessness or wantonness on the part of the engineer; for, as the man has only five feet to go, clearly the engineer could not see him in time to avoid striking him. If the party struck is a mere child, or livestock, and the engineer could have seen them in time to avoid injury, and does not, the company is liable, because of its own negligence in not keeping a proper lookout. Its failure to keep such lookout is such recklessness as makes it liable, for it "owes no duty" to the livestock or the child. If the man is down on the track, he is as helpless and as little to be expected to get off as a little child or livestock. There is no more deadly machine than a modern 60 or 100 ton engine, driving across the country, on its narrow ribbon of steel, at 60 miles an hour. Whatever it strikes fairly is killed, as surely as if struck by a cannon ball. Commerce requires the free use of the track by these deadly machines. But the hand upon the throttle valve must be steady, and a lookout for danger well kept. This is common sense and justice. It can never be made a part of the law of the land that these Goliaths of mechanism can kill or crush whatever they shall find in their path. Livestock and children they must look out for. If, by failure to do this they are injured, the company is liable. The safety of a man lying on the track cannot be insured. He has no business to be there. But if the engineer on a passing train, by ordinary care, in keeping the lookout, which his duty to the safety of the train requires, could see the man (as the jury find) in time to avoid killing him, and does not do so, this negligence in one vested with so important a trust is recklessness, which renders the company liable, notwithstanding the negligence of the party struck by the engine. Respect for the doctrine of stare decisis forbids us to so soon overrule the decisions of this court in the late cases of Deans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 686; Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. supra, and others on that line. The decision in Deans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. supra, imposed no additional duty on railroad companies. The company was and is liable for a failure to keep a lookout if thereby injury is caused to its passengers, to livestock, or to a little child. That decision merely held that the same failure to keep a proper lookout would make the company liable as to a man lying in a helpless condition on the track. This does not, as argued, abolish or affect the doctrine of contributory negligence. The failure of one in charge of so powerful, dangerous, and rapidly moving a machine to keep a proper lookout is recklessness, which makes the company liable whenever the jury find that, by a proper lookout, the helpless man could have been discovered in time to avoid killing him. Human life is worth that much consideration, if it is worth anything.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO &amp; NORTHWESTERN R. CO.,

Appt.,
v.

WEST CHICAGO PARK COMMISSIONERS.

(151 Ill. 204.)

1. After twelve years acquiescence, in common with the city and the general public, in the control of a street by park commissioners, a railroad company will not in a proceeding by them to prevent its placing tracks in the street, be heard to question their authority on the ground that the consent of the city and abutting owners to their control was not technically regular.

2. A party cannot on appeal insist on error committed at his own instance or contrary to his express stipulations upon which the lower court was induced to act.

(June 19, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of complainant in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from laying tracks across a street in the City of Chicago. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. W. C. Goudy, for appellant:

The owners of a majority of the frontage on Washington street, between Halsted street and Central Park, did not consent in writing to the taking of the street for a boulevard.

Thorn v. West Chicago Park Comrs. 180 Ill. 599.

The railway company is not estopped from proving the fact that there was a want of consent by the city, or by the abutting owners.

Mr. A. W. Pulver also for appellant.

Messrs. Mason B. Loomis, W. W. Evans, and Gardner G. Willard, with Mr. Francis A. Riddle, for appellees:

The defendant corporation cannot now question the regularity of any of the proceedings under which the West Chicago park commissioners acquired and have since exercised control over Washington boulevard.

The public were bound to take notice of their several acts and doings as a public body. Swift v. Williamsburgh, 24 Barb. 430.

The company was bound to take notice, and is now estopped from questioning the legality of such proceedings, under which the commissioners acquired and have exercised control over said street as a boulevard.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Counsel for appellant state the question involved in this case to be as follows: "The Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company undertook to lay a railroad track across a public street in the city of Chicago, formerly called 'Washington Street,' but now called 'Washington Boulevard.' The West Chicago park commissioners claimed that the track could not be laid without their permission, resting the claim upon the allegation that the control of the street had been transferred from the city to them, and denying the right of the railroad company to lay the track without a permit. This is the subject-matter of the controversy in this case, and the right of the railway company to so occupy the street depends upon the question as to whether the control of the street had been legally turned over by the city to the park commissioners." With this statement of the controversy, a re-examination of the question as to the extent of the powers of the park commissioners over a street brought within their municipal control under the Act of 1879 will not be necessary. In the late case of McCormick v. South Park Comrs. (filed at Ottawa, June 19, 1894) 150 Ill. 516, that question was discussed and determined, and the holding was that, in respect of streets leading to the park, acquired under the Act of 1879, the park commissioners had authority and control co-extensive with that vested in them of and concerning the parks, driveways, and boulevards under their control, and that, therefore, they had ample power to prevent the erection of a structure without their permission, which, when erected, would extend over and upon the street. And in view of the construction given to the acts there under consideration, it cannot be said that the West Chicago park commissioners have any less power and dominion in respect of streets acquired by them under the later act. 1 Private Laws 1889, § 4, p. 342. 25 L. R. A.

Indeed, there would seem to be no controversy in this case as to the authority of the park commissioners in the premises, if they be found to be in lawful control of the street. In the agreed statement of facts, upon which the cause was submitted in the trial court, it is stipulated, among other things, that appellant was the owner in fee simple of the land now occupied by the portion of Washington street in question, and on either side thereof, long anterior to opening of said street across the same, and had two tracks thereon; that Washington street was opened across said land in 1874, over the tracks of appellant, thereon laid, by condemnation proceedings instituted by the city of Chicago, etc., and that "said railway company was authorized, by the terms of its charter, granted by the legislature of the state, to acquire said property, and to lay its railroad tracks thereon for the conduct of its business as a common carrier. And by the same authority it has the legal right to lay additional tracks parallel with those already constructed, unless the control of West Washington street has been legally transferred from the city of Chicago to the West Chicago park commissioners; and, if such legal control has been acquired by said commissioners, then said railway company has only authority to lay a third track with the consent and permission of said commissioners, which has not been granted. It will therefore be seen that it will only be necessary to determine, so far, at least, as appellant is concerned, whether the park commissioners were in legal control.

The objections of appellant question the validity of the proceedings under which the park commissioners came into control of the street, and the objections are: (1) That consent in writing of the owners of a majority of the frontage upon the street was not first obtained; that is, that the petition purporting to be signed by such owners was in many instances not so signed, but by agents, guardians, officers of corporations, etc., without showing authority to make such signatures, or that the persons whose names were attached were in fact the owners; and (2) that the city of Chicago did not consent to taking of the street by the park commissioners; that is to say, that by the ordinance of the city entitled "An ordinance, consenting that the board of West Park commissioners may take, regulate, control and improve a certain part of West Washington street, from the west line of Halsted street to Central Park," adopted September 29, 1879, it was provided: "(2) Unless the said board of park commissioners shall within thirty days from the approval hereof, select and take the said parts of streets, for the purposes aforesaid, this ordinance shall cease to be of any force or effect, and the consent given, by section one aforesaid, shall be deemed to be withdrawn." And it is insisted that the park commissioners did not select and take the street within the thirty days prescribed in said ordinance, and that this could not be done, within the meaning of the act, by mere physical taking, but that consent in writing of the owners must have been obtained within that period; and this, it is claimed, was not done in this case. It appears that previous to the passage of said ordinance numerous petitions had been presented consenting to the taking of the portion of Washington street in question, the last two of which consented to the taking of the street from the river to the park. That on October 17, 1879, the board of park commissioners adopted a resolution that, in pursuance of the Act of 1879, "consent on the part of the corporate authorities of the city of Chicago having been duly granted, this board will, and does hereby, select and take that part of West Washington street extending from the west line of Halsted street to Central Park, for the purposes named in said act, and will regulate, control, improve, and maintain the same in manner and form as contemplated by said act. This resolution is adopted in accordance with the consent of the owners of a majority of the lots and lands abutting on said street, so far as taken or proposed to be taken by the board, as given or to be given." And that on October 18, 1879, a duly authenticated copy of said resolutions were filed in the office of the city clerk of Chicago. It also appears that on February 16, 1880, a petition was again presented to the said board of park commissioners, purporting to be signed by owners and representatives of owners, consenting to the taking of said part of Washington street. In this petition the signatures objected to by appellant are pointed out in its brief. On the same day resolutions were adopted by the board approving and concurring in the petition, and ordering it and the resolutions to be filed, etc. It is claimed by appellant, as has been said, that these transactions are not sufficient to show consent on the part of the city, or a selecting and taking of the street within the terms of said ordinance, or proper consent on the part of the owners.

While, upon this record, we think it might be fairly claimed that the provisions of the act have been substantially complied with, a consideration of the objections raised must necessarily depend upon the determination beforehand of the question made by appellee as to whether appellant, upon the facts of this case, is in a condition to question the regularity of the proceedings by which the park commissioners acquired, and have since exercised, control over Washington boulevard. If the facts and circumstances shown are such as would render it inequitable and improper for appellant to insist upon these objections, it cannot avail that such proceedings have not been technically formal, and in strict compliance with the statute. Under the state of case here shown it could not be contended that either of the parties to the transfer of the street is competent to insist upon the informalities here set up to render void the transaction; and if the city itself could not insist thereon, appellant certainly, in this regard, is in no better situation. After the exercise of control of the street for many years by the park commissioners, with the consent of the city, though never so informally given, and the expenditure by them of hundreds of thousands of dollars thereon in the way of improvements and betterments, without question of their right so to do, the city would be incompetent to raise the objections here made on principles of estoppel so plain and fundamental as to require no citation of authority. Nor do we think the individual citizen, who, together with all others affected thereby, has for many years acquiesced in the exercise of authority by a municipality, and has all that time contributed by way of payment of taxes to the support thereof, paid special assessments for local improvements, which he has seen undertaken and perfected by the expenditure of vast sums of money, and to all which he made no objection, can, after this, be heard to insist upon want of power in the municipality, upon the ground that in the original acquisition of control some provision of the law was not technically observed. What would have been the result had the objections now urged been made, as in Thorn v. West Chicago Park Comrs., 130 Ill. 594, at the incipency of the corporate control by the park commissioners, or in some appropriate direct proceeding, is not necessary to determine. From 1879, when the park commissioners assumed control of the street in question, there has been, for aught that appears in this record, an acquiescence on the part of the people in the authority of the park commissioners, and the exercise by them of the functions of their office. The state, as well as citizens immediately concerned, for practically 18 years preceding the filing of this bill, has never, so far as we are informed, questioned the regularity of the proceedings whereby the control of the street was transferred from the city to the park commissioners. To now declare such proceedings nugatory, and overturn the authority so long and uniformly acquiesced in, on the grounds here insisted upon, would, irrespective of what the real facts were, be of doubtful expediency, if not contrary to sound policy; for, after such lapse of time and acquiescence, if the spirit of the law has been observed, it cannot avail that the letter has been disregarded. The park act creating the West Chicago park commissioners is to be liberally construed in all courts and places in favor of the jurisdiction and powers thereby conferred, and of the proceedings under the same. Private Laws 1869, p. 354, § 11. And in harmony with the views expressed in McCormick v. South Park Comrs. supra, such construction can be no less applicable to proceedings for the acquisition of streets leading to the park. As said by Cooley, J., in Stuart v. Kalamazoo School Dist. No. 1, 30 Mich. 69: "If every municipality must be subject to be called into court at any time to defend its original organization and its franchises, at the will of any dissatisfied citizen who may feel disposed to question them, and subjected to dissolution perhaps, or to be crippled in authority and power if defects appear, however complete and formal may have been recognition of its rights and privileges on the part alike of the state and of its citizens, it may very justly be said that few of our municipalities can be entirely certain of the ground they stand upon, and that any single person, however honestly inclined, if disposed to be litigious or over-technical and precise, may have it in his power in many cases to cause infinite trouble, embarrassment, and mischief." In that case a bill had been brought by a taxpayer of the district to restrain the collection of school taxes assessed against the complainants, upon the ground, among others, that there had been no compliance with the law in the organization of the district. In passing upon this point the court used the language above quoted, and the holding was that the regularity of the organization of the district, which had assumed to possess and exercise powers of a district regularly organized for thirteen years, without objection, could not be called in question in such private collateral suit.

In People v. Maynard, 15 Mich. 470, the court, by Campbell, J., said: "Even in private associations the acts of the parties interested may often estop them from relying on legal objections, which might have availed them if not waived. But in public affairs, where the people have organized themselves under color of law into the ordinary municipal bodies, and have gone on, year after year, raising taxes, making improvements, and exercising their usual franchises, their rights are properly regarded as depending quite as much on the acquiescence as on the regularity of their origin; and no ex post facto inquiry can be permitted to undo their corporate existence. Whatever may be the rights of individuals before such general acquiescence, the corporate standing of the community can be no longer open to question." And this language was quoted in support of the holding in Stuart v. Kalamazoo School Dist. No. 1, supra. In Jameson v. People, 16 Ill. 257, 63 Am. Dec. 804, by an information in quo warranto, the question was raised as to the corporate existence of the town of Oquawka, and of the authority of the president and trustees to exercise the powers and franchises of a municipal corporation. Pleas were filed showing the organization of the corporation in 1851; the election of town officers from year to year thereafter; that it was generally recognized as a public municipal corporation, and exercised powers and franchises as such, passed and enforced ordinances, levied and collected taxes, made contracts and incurred liabilities, provided police regulation, etc. And it was there said: "Municipal corporations are created for the public good; are demanded by the wants of the community; and the law, after long continued use of corporate powers, and the public acquiescence, will indulge in presumptions in favor of their legal existence. Bank of United States v. Dandridge, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 64, 6 L. ed. 553; Dunning v. New Albany & S. R. Co. 2 Ind. 487; Middlesex Husbandmen & Mfrs. Soc. v. Davis, 3 Met. 133; House v. House, 5 Harr. & J. 125. The law will incline to sustain, rather than to defeat, them. It would seem incompatible with good faith, and against public policy, although irregularities may have intervened in the organization of the town, now to hold that it is not a body corporate; and we do not think the law requires us to do so." See also People v. Farnham, 35 Ill. 562. Worley v. Harris, 82 Ind. 498, was a bill for injunction to restrain the officers of the town of Ellettsville from collecting a tax upon the grounds that the town had not been properly organized, and that no accurate survey and plat of the territory to be embraced had been made, over which it had assumed to exercise its municipal powers. And the court then said: "How long it had been exercising such powers is not stated. It may have been acting in good faith as a corporation, levying and collecting taxes for more than twenty years, for aught that appears in this complaint. Construing the complaint fairly, we may presume that it had been acting as a corporation for many years. Under such circumstances, its right to so act cannot be collaterally questioned." State v. Leatherman, 38 Ark. 81, was information in quo warranto to test the validity of the incorporation of Arkansas City. The court makes use of the following forcible language: "But it had been an existing de facto corporation all the time from 1873 till now, and many things had in good faith been done under it which it would be shocking now to undo. The disastrous consequences would not be confined to the case of Arkansas City. Municipal corporations throughout the state have become numerous. They are not only highly beneficial, but necessary agencies of good government. We can see how many of them may have been heretofore, or may be henceforth, put in operation under the same, or similar mistakes. To declare them all null, after long acquiescence on the part of the state, would open a very Pandora's box of litigation, and produce incalculable hardship and confusion." And, after quoting from Jameson v. People and People v. Maynard, supra, the court says, in respect of the opinions in these cases, that they "are emboldened by them to declare in behalf of the public good that the state herself may, by long acquiescence, and by continued recognition through her own officers, state and county, of a municipal corporation, be precluded from an information, to deprive it of franchises long exercised in accordance with the general law." Without expressing any opinion as to the correctness of the view there taken, the case is important, as showing the extent to which the doctrine has been carried.

But it is insisted by counsel for appellant that the doctrine enunciated does not apply to the case at bar: that appellant is not questioning the validity of the original organization of the municipality, but the legality of the particular proceedings by which control of the street was acquired. So far as the right of appellant to insist upon the objections made is concerned, we can see no difference in legal effect. If the circumstances are such as would preclude it from questioning the one, no substantial reason can exist why it should not be precluded from questioning the other. To have territory within and upon which the powers conferred can operate, is vital to the corporate entity. If the theory of appellant was correct, the same objection might be made to the proceedings by which the commissioners came into control of the park, and, if allowed to prevail, would render their jurisdiction nugatory, and their organization ineffectual, notwithstanding years of acquiescence by the public. Only by the exercise of power upon the selected territory are the contemplated objects of their creation effectuated. Deprive them of the territory, and their power therein is gone, and can be no longer felt. A board of park commissioners, under the act, without the park, would be like a city council, under the cities and villages act, without a city, a village board of trustees without any village. The one cannot exist in practical or legal contemplation without the other. Withdraw the subject over which the municipal power is to be exerted, as the very end and aim for which the corporation was created, and the corporation ceases to exist, except perhaps in legal fiction, and no formality would be necessary to work its dissolution. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 110. And when appellant objects to the proceedings by which the commissioners acquired jurisdiction the objection is deeper than would seem at first view, and goes to the very thing without which the organization would be a dead letter, and, if it were to prevail, would render void all the proceedings of the municipality during the years past, involving the levy and collection of taxes and local assessments, aggregating a vast sum, expended in the making of great and lasting improvements. To so hold at this late day would, in our opinion, be contrary to the clearest principles of public policy. Without prolonging the discussion, we regard the consensus of authority as sustaining the doctrine that, after long-continued acquiescence in the exercise of jurisdiction by a municipality, the validity of the proceedings by which the jurisdiction was originally acquired cannot be called collaterally in question at the suit of a private party. See Swift v. Williamsburgh, 24 Barb. 430; Strosser v. Ft. Wayne, 100 Ind. 443; State v. Central Pac. R. Co. 21 Nev. 94; Rose v. Baltimore, 51 Md. 271, 34 Am. Rep. 307; Sherwin v. Bugbee, 16 Vt. 439.

In view, therefore, of what has been said, it will not be necessary for us to here analyze the proceedings to ascertain whether they have been sufficiently regular as to vest the park commissioners with legal control of the street. It appears from the stipulation of facts filed in the cause August 3, 1892: "That for more than twelve years last passed the said West Chicago park commissioners have continuously been in possession and control of said Washington street as a boulevard as aforesaid, and that during that time the city of Chicago has abandoned the possession and control thereof, and during said time neither the city of Chicago nor any other corporation or person has in any action, suit, or proceeding (other than this suit) called in question the legal right of said commissioners to such possession and control, or of their acts or doings in the premises." Whatever irregularity or informality may have intervened, such as is shown upon this record, has been cured by the long continued concurrent acquiescence of the city, the park commissioners, and of the general public. We are of opinion that appellant is as much bound by such acquiescence, in which it has participated, as the general public or any private member of the community might be, and that therefore, it is in no condition to insist upon the objections raised in this collateral proceeding.

But it is insisted that, having acquired the land before it was included within the city limits, appellant was duly authorized, under its charter, therefore granted, to use such property for railroad purposes, and to lay its tracks thereon, and, having such right anterior to the acquisition of municipal control, it still has the same right, burdened only with the easement of the public in the street. Appellant became the owner of the land in 1865. In 1869 it was included within the corporate limits, and in 1874 the city of Chicago instituted appropriate proceedings in the superior court of Cook county to condemn a strip 100 feet wide across said land for the purpose of extending the street in question. Judgment was rendered in favor of appellant for $8,000 for the land taken and damages to land not taken, and the street extended. Appellant is precluded from this contention by the stipulation upon which the cause was submitted upon the hearing below. As already seen, it was stipulated that the railway company was authorized by the terms of its charter to acquire the property, and lay its tracks thereon for the conduct of its business; and it is then expressly stipulated: "And by the same authority it has the legal right to lay additional tracks paralleled with those already constructed, unless the control of West Washington street has been legally transferred from the city of Chicago to the West Chicago park commissioners, and, if such legal control has been acquired by said commissioners, then said railway company has only authority to lay a third track with the consent and permission of said commissioners, which has not been granted." And it necessarily followed that, if the chancellor found the park commissioners were in legal control of the street named, the "railway company was only authorized to lay a third track with the consent and permission of said commissioners," which it was conceded had not been granted. It is too familiar to require the citation of authority that a party will not be permitted, in the court of review, to insist upon error committed at his own instance, or contrary to his express stipulation upon which the lower court was induced to act. The effect of the stipulation was to withdraw from the consideration of the court the question now insisted upon, if it was found that the legal control of the street had passed from the city of Chicago to the park commissioners, and to submit the case upon the latter issue. The question, therefore, of whether appellant has been deprived of any of its rights under its charter, without due process of law, is not presented for determination. Nor do we find it necessary to discuss or determine whether appellant took its charter powers subject to such future regulation as the legislature, in its sovereign capacity, might provide for the promotion of the common good. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205; Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, § 189, and cases cited. Whatever may be said in respect of the claim of appellant to the ownership of the fee in the street, or its rights under its charter, these rights, under the stipulation, must be regarded as subject to the paramount right of the general public to the use of the street, and its control and improvement, in the discretion of the local municipal authorities, as the public interest may require. Old Town v. Dooley, 81 Ill. 255; Palatine v. Kreuger, 121 Ill. 73; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Chicago, 188 Ill. 458.

The chancellor having found, as we have seen he was justified in doing, that the park commissioners were in legal control of the street, under the stipulation of the parties the decree entered necessarily followed, and will be affirmed.

NOTE.—Rights of mortgagee to benefit of insurance taken in name of mortgagor.

Rights of mortgagee in absence of contract.

The mortgagee is not entitled to the proceeds of a policy, taken by the mortgagor or the owner of the equity of redemption, in his own name, in the absence of any contract to insure for the mortgagee. Carter v. Rickett, 8 Paige, 437, 4 L. ed. 493; Ryan v. Adamson, 57 Iowa, 30; Vandegraaff v. Medlock, 3 Port. (Ala.) 389, 29 Am. Rep. 266; Stamps v. Commercial F. Ins. Co. 77 N. C. 200, 24 Am. Rep. 463; Columbia Ins. Co. of Alexandria v. Lawrence, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 507, 9 L. ed. 512.

Although the policy contained a clause, providing that the assured may assign the policy to E. R. (the mortgagee). Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044.

Or where the policy may say "for whom it may concern." McDonald v. Black, 50 Ohio, 185, 55 Am. Rep. 443.

And in Plimpton v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co., 43 Vt. 497, 5 Am. Rep. 297, it was said that a mortgagee has no claim on the proceeds of a policy obtained by the mortgagor in his own name in the absence of contract, but that was not the question involved in the case.

Where there is a contract or covenant to insure.

A mortgagee is entitled to an equitable lien on the proceeds of a policy obtained by the mortgagor, where the mortgage contained a covenant to insure for the mortgagee, or where the mortgagor contracted or agreed to insure for the mortgagee, fully sustaining the case of CHIPMAN v. CARROLL. Thomas v. Von Kapff, 6 Gill & J. 373; Harard v. Draper, 7 Allen, 267; Doughty v. Van Horn, 29 N. J. Eq. 301; Ames v. Richardson, 29 Minn. 380; Re Sands Ale Brewing Co. 3 Biss. 173; Greet v. Citizens Ins. Co. 5 Ont. App. 593.

And the same was held, where the policy was payable to the mortgagee, as his interest might appear. Hall v. Philadelphia Fire Assn. 64 N. H. 405.

And the mortgagee was entitled to the proceeds 36 L. R. A.

a policy of insurance upon the premises in his own name, and soon after a loss occurs, the mortgagee has an equitable lien on the proceeds of the policy, and such proceeds are not exempt upon the ground that the policy was upon the homestead of the parties.

3. After a loss, the insurance company may be garnished, where the payment of the loss is not conditional on anything remaining to be done.

(March 10, 1894.)

ERROR to the District Court for Miami County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to reach the proceeds of a policy of fire insurance upon property which had been mortgaged by the defendants Carroll to the plaintiffs and subsequently destroyed by fire. Reversed.

Statement by Horton, Ch. J.:

On June 2, 1887, Frank S. Carroll and wife executed a note and mortgage for $1,500 to Daniel L. Chipman, and on the same day executed a second note and mortgage, for $500, to Ephriam Mower. The land described in the mortgages then constituted the homestead of Frank S. Carroll, and the title to the of insurance, where the mortgage contained a covenant to insure, and the owner of the equity of redemption directed his agent to procure insurance, loss if any payable to the mortgagee, and then canceled such indorsement on the policy. Reid v. McCrum, 91 N. Y. 412.

And the mortgagee, holding a policy as collateral, was entitled to a lien on the proceeds as against all parties having notice. Ellis v. Kreutzinger, 27 Mo. 311, 72 Am. Dec. 270.

So he was entitled to an equitable lien, where the mortgage provided for such insurance, and the mortgagor assured him that the policy was for his benefit. Wheeler v. Factors & Traders Ins. Co. 101 U. S. 439, 25 L. ed. 1055.

And the same was held where the mortgage contained a covenant to insure for mortgagee, and an order was given the mortgagee for the funds with which to rebuild, and he then declined to rebuild. Watt v. Gore Dist. Ins. Co. 8 Grant, Ch. 523.

And the mortgagee was entitled to the funds where a lessee covenanted to insure, and the mortgagee rebuilt and claimed the money. Garden v. Ingram, 23 L. J. Ch. 473.

And the mortgagee was entitled to an equitable lien on the proceeds of second insurance policy, taken by the mortgagor in his own name, and assigned to others for prior debts, and payable to them as their interest might appear, where the deed of trust provided that the grantor would not impair the lien, and the second policy caused a scaling of the first. Wilson v. Hakes, 36 Ill. App. 539.

But the mortgagee had only such interest in a second policy taken by mortgagor in its own name, as would make good the scaling, although the mortgage contained a covenant to insure for mortgagee "as its interest might appear" and the companies first insuring afterwards became insolvent. Nordyke & Marmon Co. v. Gery, 112 Ind. 585. See Dunlop v. Avery, 41/rv.

And under Maine Rev. Stat., chap. 49, giving the mortgagee a lien on insurance obtained by the mortgagor, notice must be given the company in same was in him. The mortgage to Chipman contained the following clause: "But if default be made in such payment, or any part thereof, or interest thereon, or the taxes, or if the insurance is not kept up thereon, then this conveyance shall become absolute." Frank S. Carroll transacted the business in negotiating the loans, and Chipman and Mower, then and ever being nonresidents of this state, transacted their business through C. W. Chandler, their agent at Paola, in this state, who was afterwards succeeded by Chandler Bros., and that firm continued acting as the agents of Chipman and Mower. After the execution of the mortgage, the dwelling was insured by Frank S. Carroll, and, by clause attached to the policy, the loss, if any, was made payable to Chipman or his assigns. On November 27, 1889, judgment was rendered upon the mortgages above recited for $1,636.64, with 9 per cent from that date, in favor of Chipman, and for $569.42, with 9 per cent from that date, in favor of Mower, and the land owned ordered sold by virtue of the mortgages. On March 29, 1890, Frank S. Carroll, in his own name, negotiated insurance upon his dwelling with the People's Insurance Company, of New Hampshire, in a sum over $1,200, and with the Burlington Insurance Company, of Iowa, in the sum of $900. On April 13, 1890, the dwelling was totally destroyed by fire. On April 26, 1890, special execution was issued, ordering the sale of the land to satisfy the judgments in favor of Chipman and Mower. On April 28, 1890, Chipman and Mower, by F. M. Chandler, of the firm of Chandler Bros., their agent, filed an affidavit for garnishment against the insurance companies, stating the amount of the judgments; that the same were still in full force, wholly unpaid, and not subject to any counterclaim or set-off; that execution had been issued thereon, but would not be returnable for more than thirty days; that Frank S. Carroll and Jennie C. Carroll had not property enough, subject to execution, to satisfy the judgments, or even the half thereof; that the money due from the insurance companies was not exempt,—and reciting other material facts. On the same day a garnishee summons was issued to the insurance companies, and served by the sheriff, by delivering copies thereof to N. W. Wells, as the manager and agent of the companies at Paola, in this state, and by delivering a copy thereof to the defendants Frank S. Carroll and wife. On May 10, 1890, another garnishment summons was issued, and served May 12, 1890, on the Kansas state superintendent of insurance. On May 10, 1890, and immediately after receiving a copy of the garnishee summons, Frank S. Carroll went to Kansas City, Mo., and attempted to make an assignment of the insurance due from time, or else no lien will be allowed. Burns v. Collins, 64 Me. 215.

And under a covenant in the mortgage stipulating that the mortgagor should insure in some company to be approved by the mortgagee, he was not entitled to insurance obtained by the mortgagor in his own name without the knowledge of the mortgagee. Stearns v. Quincy Mut. F. Ins. Co. 124 Mass. 63, 26 Am. Rep. 647.

And the mortgagee is not entitled to a lien on the proceeds of a policy payable to a second mortgagee, under a covenant to insure in the first mortgagee, but he would have a lien as against the mortgagor. Dunlop v. Avery, 90 N. Y. 592, reversing 23 Hun. 509. See Nordyke & Marmon Co. v. Gery, 112 Ind. 535.

And a party having a bill of sale of personalty, where the deed contained a covenant to insure, but did not provide for the application of insurance money, is not entitled to the funds as against an assignee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor, where the bankruptcy was before the fire. Lees v. Whiteley, L. R. 2 Eq. 143, 35 L. J. Ch. 412, 14 Week. Rep. 634, 14 L. T. N. S. 472.

In Grange Mill Co. v. Western Assur. Co., 118 Ill. 356, reversing 17 Ill. App. 299, in a case of vendor's lien, it was said that a mortgagee is entitled to the insurance to the extent of his lien, if the mortgagor agreed to insure for his benefit, and the company had notice of his claim, even if the loss was payable to another.

Who may maintain an action for the proceeds.

There is some conflict in the decisions as to the proper party to maintain an action for the proceeds of a policy obtained by the owner, loss if any payable to the mortgagee as his interest may appear; but some courts hold that the action may be maintained by both mortgagor and mortgagee jointly. Winne v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 91 N. Y. 185; Williamson v. Michigan Fire & Marine Ins. Co. 86 Wis. 393.

Or where the policy is assigned as collateral for the debt. Boynton v. Clinton & E. Mut. Ins. Co. 18 Barb. 254.

Where nonjoinder of mortgagee is waived by failure to object by demurrer or answer, and the action would be barred if brought by the mortgagee, it was held that the owner could recover on a policy, payable to the mortgagee. Carr v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 109 N. Y. 504.

Other courts hold that a mortgagee is the proper party plaintiff in an action to recover the proceeds of a policy obtained by the owner or his lessee, loss if any payable to the mortgagee as his interest may appear, if his claim exceeds the amount of insurance due, and this seems to be the weight of authority. Motley v. Manufacturers Ins. Co. 29 Me. 387, 1 Am. Rep. 591; Maxcy v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. of Manchester, 54 Minn. 372. Berthold v. Clay Fire & Marine Ins. Co. 2 Mo. App. 311; Cone v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 60 N. Y. 619; Travelers Ins. Co. v. California Ins. Co. 8 L. R. A. 769, 1 N. Dak. 151; Hammel v. London Queen Ins. Co. 50 Wis. 240, 41 Am. Rep. 1. But see Atna Ins. Co. of Hartford v. Baker, infra, and cases following.

So where a policy on chattels was issued in the name of the owner, payable to the mortgagee. Roussel v. St. Nicholas Ins. Co. 9 Jones & S. 279.

And the mortgagee should sue on a policy procured by the owner of personalty, on account of whomsoever it might concern at the time of loss. Rogers v. Traders Ins. Co. 6 Paige, 583, 3 L. ed. 1111.

So where the mortgagee obtained a policy payable to him in case of loss, to the extent of his interest he may recover if the insurance does not exceed his debt. Hadley v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 55 N. H. 111.

So where the mortgagee paid the premium on a policy insuring the mortgagor, loss to be paid to the mortgagee, he was the proper party to sue thereon. Chamberlain v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 55 N. H. 249.

And he should sue in his own name, where he held a policy by assignment, in a mutual company the People's Insurance Company to one S. Schullien. On May 27, 1890, the People's Insurance Company filed in the action its answer as garnishee, in which it stated that, by its policy No. 69,967, it insured the one-story frame building and additions of Frank S. Carroll for $1,200, and on May 28d received proofs of loss, by fire, of April 18th, and afterwards received notice of the alleged assignment to Schullien, and that it was ready to pay the $1,200 due under the policy to the party entitled to receive it. On June 4, 1890, Frank S. Carroll and wife filed their verified answer to the affidavit for garnishment, stating (1) that Mower and Chipman should not maintain their action, because no general execution had been issued upon the judgments of Chipman and Mower prior to the filing of said affidavit; (2) that the property and credits sought to be garnished were the proceeds of their homestead, and exempt from execution; (3) that they had assigned their claim against the People's Insurance Company to Schullien; (4) that they denied every allegation in said affidavit. On June 11, 1890, said Schullien filed his answer in said garnishment, setting up the alleged assignment to him. On June 24, 1890, a trial was had upon the matters under the pleadings. On July 16, 1890, the court decided the issue between Chipman and Mower and the People's Insurance Company, in substance, as follows: "That the insurance company pay the sum due from it to the clerk of the district court for the use of said Frank S. Carroll and Jennie C. Carroll, and that upon the payment of that sum to the clerk of this court the People's Insurance Company, garnishee, be, and it is hereby, discharged; and that said Daniel L. Chipman and Ephriam Mower pay the costs herein, taxed at $——." Daniel L. Chipman and Ephriam Mower excepted, and brought the case here on August 21, 1890. In the month of February, 1891, Frank S. Carroll, the principal defendant in this case, died; and thereupon Chipman and Mower revived this case in the name of his surviving widow, Jennie C. Carroll, and her children.

Mr. John C. Sheridan, for plaintiffs in error:

By his contract with this mortgagee Carroll agreed to keep his dwelling insured for the benefit of the mortgagee and when he obtained insurance he cannot be heard to say that he intended it for a purpose in violation of that agreement.

Where a mortgagor, who has agreed to insure for the benefit of the mortgagee, obtains insurance in his own name, the mortgagee has an equitable lien on the proceeds of the policy although it had not been assigned to him.

1 Jones, Mortg. §§ 400, 407; Carter v. Rockett, 8 Paige, 487, 4 L. ed. 498; Thomas v. Von- and the by-laws so authorized such suit. Barnes v. Union Mut. F. Ins. Co., 45 N. H. 21.

And under Va. Code, § 2415, providing that a person for whom a covenant is made may maintain an action thereon, a mortgagee under a deed of trust may recover on a policy, loss if any payable to the mortgagee as his interest may appear, if his debt exceeds the amount due on the policy. Tilley v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co., 66 Va. 811.

And in Colby v. Parkersburg Ins. Co., 87 W. Va. 789, it was held that a mortgagee may recover on a policy obtained by mortgagor, loss payable to the mortgagee as his interest may appear, although his mortgage did not cover all the property insured, as "his interest may appear" does not refer to his interest in the property, but to the amount of his debt.

And in Ripley v. Astor Ins. Co., 17 How. Pr. 444, and Hathaway v. Orient Ins. Co., 17 L. R. A. 514, 124 N. Y. 408, it was stated that the mortgagee was the proper party to bring an action on a policy obtained by the owner, loss if any payable to the mortgagee; but that was not the question involved.

So where the mortgagees had taken the property and policy in satisfaction of the mortgage, they were the proper parties plaintiff, where the policy was obtained by the mortgagor "loss if any payable to mortgagees as their interest might appear." Bartlett v. Iowa State Ins. Co., 77 Iowa, 86.

In Meriden Sav. Bank v. Home Mut. F. Ins. Co., 50 Conn. 396, it was held that the mortgagee could sue, where the company insuring had by its instrument recognized the claim of the mortgagee, although it was said that the mortgagee could not sue on a policy under seal made with another for its benefit.

And if the mortgagees paid for the policy, and it was delivered to them, made in the name of the owner but payable to the mortgagees as their interest might appear, they might maintain an action thereon, if the policy covered no property outside of the mortgage and did not exceed such interest, 25 L. R. A.

Hopkins Mfg. Co. v. Aurora Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 48 Mich. 148.

And a mortgagor cannot maintain an action, where the mortgagee is insured and it does not appear that the mortgage debt is still unpaid. Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Coverdale, 48 Kan. 448.

If the mortgagee consents, or the mortgagor has paid off the mortgage debt, the mortgagor may maintain an action on a policy payable to mortgagee, or payable to the mortgagee as his interest may appear, or assigned to the mortgagee, or where the mortgagee renounces all claim. Patterson v. Triumph Ins. Co., 64 Me. 500; Ennis v. Harmony F. Ins. Co., 3 Bosw. 518; Graves v. American Live-Stock Ins. Co., 46 Minn. 180; Billings v. German Ins. Co., 34 Neb. 502; Jackson v. Farmers Mut. F. Ins. Co., 5 Gray, 52; Turner v. Quincy Mut. F. Ins. Co., 109 Mass. 568; Coats v. Pennsylvania F. Ins. Co. of Philadelphia, 58 Md. 172, 42 Am. Rep. 827; Worley v. State Ins. Co. of Des Moines (Iowa), 28 Ia. L. J. 580.

And a mortgagee may maintain an action on a policy taken by the mortgagor, loss if any payable to the trustee, where the policy contained a provision for subrogation to the mortgagee by the company. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Olcott, 97 Ill. 439.

Where the mortgagee paid for the policy and took the same in the names of the mortgagor and himself, loss if any payable to himself, he might maintain an action thereon. Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Foster, 93 Ill. 121.

And a mortgagor who pays the debt and premium for insurance may maintain an action on the policy obtained by the mortgagee in his own name. Norwich F. Ins. Co. v. Boomer, 52 Ill. 442, 4 Am. Rep. 618.

So a suit was properly brought by the mortgagor for the use of A. B. the assignee of the mortgage, where the policy was issued to the mortgagor, loss if any payable to the mortgagee. Illinois F. Ins. Co. v. Stanton, 57 Ill. 864.

And in St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Johnson,

Horton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment upon the mortgage of Frank S. Carroll and wife to Daniel L. Chipman was rendered November 27, 1889, for $1,636.64. The insurance policy which is involved in this case was obtained by Frank S. Carroll on March 29, 1890. The dwelling was burned and loss occurred on the 13th of April, 1890. The judgment rendered has not been paid or satisfied, in whole or in part. The insurance company issuing the policy admitted that it is ready to pay $1,200 due under the policy to the party entitled to receive it.

The question that we are called upon to decide in this case is whether Chipman has an equitable claim or lien upon the money due on the policy. If there was no covenant in the mortgage, or agreement between the parties, that the premises would be insured for the benefit of the mortgagee, the mere fact that Chipman's mortgage covers the property insured, and the insurer is personally liable for the debt, gives Chipman, the mortgagee, no corresponding claim upon the policy, or the proceeds of it. 1 Jones, Mortg. § 401; Lees v. Whiteley, L. R. 2 Eq. 148; Ames v. Richardson, 29 Minn. 330; Stearns v. Quincy Mut. F. Ins. Co. 124 Mass. 61, 26 Am. Rep. 647. But where a mortgage provides that the mortgagor shall keep the premises insured for the benefit of the mortgagee, and, in fulfillment of this covenant, he takes out a policy loss if any payable to the mortgagee as his interest may appear, in the absence of code provisions authorizing such action.

In Martin v. Franklin F. Ins. Co., 38 N. J. L. 140, 20 Am. Rep. 372, it was held that the owner if he has still an insurable interest to be protected by the policy may maintain an action in his own name on a policy issued to him. "loss if any payable to V. as mortgagee," stating that the insurer may obtain indemnity against the mortgagee by paying the money into court, and if actions be pending at the same time by both the owner and mortgagee the court can protect the insurer, thus intimating that either may sue.

It was said in Van Buren v. St. Joseph County Village F. Ins. Co., 28 Mich. 398, that the mortgagee could not maintain an action on a policy obtained by the mortgagor, loss if any payable to the mortgagee, as it is the mortgagor's interest that is insured, but this was not the question involved.

In Chandos v. American F. Ins. Co., 19 L. R. A. 321, 34 Wis. 184, it was stated that the assured was the party to maintain an action, where the loss was payable to mortgagee as his interest might appear; but this was not the question involved in the case.

Cases involving the question of the invalidity of insurance policies are not here included, neither are cases as to the mortgagor's rights in insurance taken by the mortgagee for his own benefit.

of insurance in his own name, which is not assigned to the mortgagee, or made payable to him, the mortgagee is regarded as having an equitable lien upon the proceeds of the policy. 1 Jones, Mortg. § 400, and cases cited. It was expressly ruled in Miller v. Aldrich, 31 Mich. 408, that "where the agreement to keep insurance for the benefit of the mortgagee was merely verbal, but the mortgagor had acted upon it by obtaining such insurance, and his grantee, having knowledge of the agreement, subsequently surrendered this policy, and took another, which was not payable to the mortgagee, it was held that he was nevertheless entitled, in equity, to have the insurance money applied in payment of the mortgage debt." In this case the mortgage stipulated, "If the insurance is not kept up thereon, then this conveyance shall become absolute." To explain this provision, it was competent for Chipman, the mortgagee, to prove, if he could, that there was a verbal agreement between the mortgagors and the mortgagee that the insurance referred to in the mortgage was for the benefit of the mortgagee. This agreement would not vary or contradict the terms of the mortgage. It would tend to explain the language of the mortgage, and show what the parties intended thereby. Again, if there was no insurance clause in the mortgage, yet if, to obtain the loan secured by the mortgage, it was verbally agreed between the parties that insurance was to be kept up on the mortgaged property by the mortgagors for the benefit of the mortgagee, as additional security, and subsequently the mortgagors, acting upon this agreement, obtained insurance, with loss payable to the mortgagee, and, after this expired, took out another policy, not payable to the mortgagee, the latter would be entitled to an equitable lien on the proceeds of the policy if any loss by fire occurred. The court committed error in refusing to receive the evidence offered tending to show the verbal agreement, if any, at the time of the loan between the parties, concerning the application of the insurance which was to be kept up on the mortgaged premises.

It is insisted that, as the mortgage was merged in the judgment, any agreement to keep up the insurance on the premises for the benefit of the mortgagee lapsed. The agreement to keep insurance for the benefit of the mortgagee, if any such agreement was made, was for the protection of the mortgagee, or rather as an additional security for his debt. The judgment did not extinguish the mortgage debt, either in whole or in part. The mortgagee, after his mortgage was merged in the judgment, was as much interested in protecting the property by insurance as prior thereto; and if the mortgagee would have had an equitable lien upon the proceeds of the policy, if taken before judgment, he would clearly have a lien upon the proceeds after judgment, if no sale had taken place. It was decided in National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. v. Union Ins. Co. of San Francisco, 88 Cal. 497, that "where the loss is payable to the mortgagee of the property, and occurs after sale under foreclosure, but before the time for redemption has elapsed, the mortgagee is entitled to recover the loss, as the foreclosure is no extinguishment of his debt until the deed has been made and the time for redemption has expired." Dunlop v. Avery, 23 Hun, 509; Ames v. Richardson, 29 Minn. 830.

The claim that the proceeds of the policy are exempt because obtained from a policy upon the homestead is not tenable. If the dwelling house had not been destroyed by fire, it and the premises with which it was connected could have been sold in satisfaction of the judgment, as both the husband and wife jointly executed the mortgage. If the insurance company had rebuilt and replaced the dwelling house after its destruction by fire, it could also have been sold, with the premises, to satisfy the judgment. The proceeds of the policy of insurance merely take the place of the dwelling house destroyed by fire, and, while they would be exempt as against general creditors, they are not exempt if Chipman, the mortgagee, has an equitable lien thereon under the mortgage given by the husband and wife, and the agreement—if any exists—with them to keep up insurance for his benefit.

The judgment will be reversed, and cause remanded.

F. C. DICKSON, Receiver of Douglas County Bank.

(.....S. Dak. ....)

*1. K. delivered to a bank a certain sum of money, to be paid over to W. when he should present to the bank a warranty

*Headnotes by KELLAM, J.

NOTE.—As to when a deposit is special so that the title remains in the depositor, see Mutual Aco. Assn. v. Jacobs (Ill.) 16 L. R. A. 516, and nota. 35 L. R. A.

deed, properly executed, conveying to K. certain lands, together with an abstract showing good title in W., and took a receipt from the bank reciting the purpose for which the money was so left. Subsequently, and before such deed and abstract were presented, or the money paid over, the bank failed, and a receiver was appointed by the court. Held, that the money so deposited was a trust fund, and did not become assets of the bank, nor pass to the receiver as such.

2. The fact that upon its receipt the bank gave credit to K. as of a deposit, and mingled the money so deposited with its own, without the knowledge or consent of K., did not change the character of the transaction.

3. Under such circumstances, K. had the right to follow and reclaim the money so deposited as a trust fund, and it was the duty of the court to direct its receiver to pay the amount over to K.

(April 2, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Douglas County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding brought to reach a fund in the possession of the receiver of the Douglas County Bank on the ground that it had been left with the bank as a special deposit. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert Dollard, for appellant:

The trust fund must be traced into specific assets in the hands of the receiver, or there must be cash on hand with which the trust fund is intermixed, before payment thereof can be ordered under the law.

As the assets of the bank were in course of administration in equity no priority could be given one cestui que trust over another, who had a claim against the general assets of the bank, where he was unable to trace his trust funds into particular assets, if a trust could be enforced at all under such circumstances.

Central Nat. Bank of Baltimore v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. ed. 698.

What the court says in McLeod v. Evans, 66 Wis. 407, 57 Am. Rep. 287, although unnecessary to the adjudication of that case, goes to the extent of repudiating the doctrine that the trust property or its proceeds must be in existence in the assets, although undistinguishable in the mass thereof, and substitutes this, that so long as there are assets, if the trust fund went to the benefit of the estate, the trust is an equitable lien thereon.

There are other claims against the bank, of the same character as that of the respondent, amounting to $7,786.08, and from the usual course of the administration of an estate of this character it is clear, even at this stage, that the assets will not satisfy all of these claims, or any considerable part of them.

He who seeks equity shall do equity.

This rule would not give respondent a right to demand that in the equitable distribution of the assets of the estate his claim should be paid in preference to all others equally meritorious merely because he secured permission to bring a suit against the receiver and prosecuted that suit in advance of others having similar claims.

1 Story, Eq. Jur. pp. 588, 589, 596.

Section 4660 of the Compiled Laws prescribes the rule for administering estates of the character sought to be effected in this action. That section provides that an insolvent estate, when administered in equity, shall inure to the benefit of all creditors in proportion to the respective claims or demands.

It may be insisted that the case under consideration is like a creditor's bill. The first answer to that proposition is that it is not a creditor's bill. And the second is that the filing of a creditor's bill operates as an equitable levy on the property of the debtor, and thereby he gains a priority over other creditors similar to that priority given in law to the levy of an execution.

As against the assets of the bank in the hands of the appellant no levy, either legal or equitable, could be made by the respondent, as they were in the hands of the court and any proceeding against them, without its authority, would have been an unwarranted invasion punishable as for contempt.

20 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 141, 142, and notes.

Mr. G. P. Harben, for respondent:

The law favors the vigilant, and in the case at bar the respondent, by commencing his action as he did, obtained an equitable lien on as much of the cash received by the appellant as was necessary to pay the respondent the sum of money so received in trust from him by the Douglas County Bank.

The money in dispute was placed in defendant's bank to pay to E. C. Ward on presentation of a warranty deed and abstract to certain lands. The bank failed and defendant Dixon is the receiver. The object of this action is to declare the deposit the trust fund.

Although the relation between a bank and its depositor is that merely of debtor and creditor, yet the fund does not change its character from the fact that the money has been deposited in bank to the credit of the depositor. If the money in his hands was impressed with a trust in favor of another the deposit will remain subject to the trust.

Kellam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the facts are simple and undisputed. On and prior to the 9th day of June, 1898, the Douglas County Bank was a banking corporation under the laws of this state, doing business at Armour, in said Douglas county. On that day respondent, Kimmel, left with such bank $265, to be paid to E. C. Ward, on presentation by him of a warranty deed conveying to Kimmel certain described land, with an abstract showing good title in the grantor. The bank gave Kimmel a receipt therefor, reciting that it was so received for such purpose. On the 17th day of June following, and before the deed was presented and the money paid over, the bank failed, and respondent, Dickson, was appointed its receiver, and as such received and took possession of all the assets and property found in the possession of the bank, of which only $259.71 was cash. Subsequently both Kimmel and Ward demanded their money of the receiver, and this action does not involve any controversy between Kimmel and Ward, but simply whether the receiver of the bank should be required to pay over the amount, or so much thereof as the money on hand will pay; or whether the cash so found on hand at the time of the failure of the bank is assets in his hands, to be distributed with and as the other assets of the bank. The court below ordered the receiver to pay over to respondent the said $259.71 so found in the bank at the time of its failure and taken possession of by him, and this appeal is from such order. In the affidavit of Humbert, secretary of said bank, it is stated that when this money was so left with the bank it "was treated the same as any other deposits of said bank, and mixed with the other money therein." It is not intimated that this was done with the knowledge of Kimmel, or that he in any manner consented to it. Upon these facts it would appear that the money was left with the bank in trust for a particular purpose. The bank could not afterwards, without the acquiescence of Kimmel, change its relation to him from that of a bailee or trustee to that of a general debtor. We apprehend that no different principle is involved because one of the parties happens to be a bank. Suppose, under the same circumstances, Kimmel had left the money with Humbert personally, and he had failed and made an assignment, would this money, so found in his possession, pass to his assignee as his property? If so, when and how did it become so? That he, or the bank in this case, had, without the consent of Kimmel, diverted the money and used it for some other purpose, ought not to affect Kimmel's rights. Abuse of a trust can confer no rights on the party abusing it, or on those claiming in privity with him. It is not claimed that the $259 found in the bank's vault when it failed is the very money, or a part of it, deposited by Kimmel, and it is not necessary that it should be so. If the money delivered to the bank had been used by it in its business, it had presumably either paid its debts pro tanto, or increased its assets; and the general creditors of the bank would be in the same condition if the money found in its possession were paid over in execution of the trust as though the money deposited had been kept separate, and the identical money received had been so paid over. Peak v. Ellicott, 80 Kan. 156, 46 Am. Rep. 90, was a case entirely analogous to this. Peak had left with the bank of which Ellicott, upon its failure, became assignee, money to pay a note, which the bank was to send for. As in this case, he took a receipt showing the purpose for which the money was left. The bank passed the amount to the credit of Peak. After the failure of the bank, it not having paid the note, Peak brought action against the assignee, asking the same relief as is asked in this case, to wit, that the assignee be required to pay over the amount in full as a trust fund. The supreme court reversed the trial court, holding that the transaction constituted a trust; that the relation created was not that of a debtor and creditor, but rather that of principal and agent, or bailor and bailee; and that the subject of such trust did not pass to the assignee as assets of the bank. It was held further that the manner in which the bank had treated the fund by crediting it to Peak and mixing it with its own money did not affect his right to claim the amount from the funds on hand. Ellicott v. Barnes, 81 Kan. 170, was a similar case, and the same rule controlled. McLeod v. Evans, 66 Wis. 401, 57 Am. Rep. 287, applies the same principle, with the same result, where a draft had been left for collection with a banker, who afterwards, and before the depositor had received its proceeds, suspended, and assigned. The court held that the proceeds of the draft constituted a trust fund, which did not pass to the assignee, and, there not being sufficient cash in the hands of the assignee to pay the amount, that the same should be a lien upon the assigned estate. The same principle, though to somewhat different facts, was applied in People v. City Bank of Rochester, 96 N. Y. 32, and again in People v. Bank of Danville, 89 Hun, 187.

The suggestions of appellant that this money is imperatively needed to meet immediate expenses in administering the bank's estate, can have little weight when the money itself is no part of the estate, but belongs to another. There would be no justice in requiring Kimmel to furnish means to assist in settling the affairs of the bank. On behalf of appellant it is further urged that the answer shows that at the time of its failure the bank held a large amount of other special deposits of the same character as this $265; and it is insisted that by the order appealed from Kimmel is given a priority to which he is not entitled over other equally meritorious claimants. It is doubtful if the proceedings convey the meaning which counsel thus draws from them. The answer of the receiver is evidently framed upon the theory that, notwithstanding the circumstances of this deposit, it was a general deposit, and concludes with admitting the indebtedness of the bank on account of it. After stating how and for what purpose it was made, it proceeds: "And it is alleged that said $265 was deposited on account of the plaintiff as herein stated, and not otherwise, and was carried to the credit of the plaintiff by the defendant corporation the same as any other deposits of said bank, and the money constituting said sum of $265 was mixed with other money deposits of said bank, and its identity destroyed.

And that, after the deposit of said $265, and previous to the 17th day of June, 1893, said defendant bank received on deposit moneys from its depositors to the amount of $7,786.63, to be paid out the same as said $265, the same being funds belonging to depositors, and no part of which have been paid to said depositors, which was mixed with its general deposit funds, of which said $265 formed a part at the time of its deposit. The defendant further alleges that the total amount due depositors by said defendant bank on said 17th day of June, and which remains unpaid, is the sum of $20,778.08, and defendant states that, except said $259.71, cash on hand, the assets of said defendant bank consist of horses, equities, and rights of action; admit that the plaintiff and said E. C. Ward have each demanded said $265, and defendants have each refused to pay the same; and admit that defendant corporation is indebted to plaintiff in said sum of $265 as aforesaid, and no part thereof has been paid." Upon this point the affidavit of Humbert, the secretary of the bank, is as follows: "That the said $265 deposited by plaintiff as aforesaid was treated the same as any other deposits of said bank, and mixed with the other money therein. . . . That after the deposit of said $265, and previous to the 17th day of June, 1893, said defendant bank received on deposit money to the amount of $7,786.63, which was mixed with the deposit funds of said bank, and all of which was paid out by said defendant corporation prior to June 17th, except said sum of $259.71." Reading the answer of the receiver and the affidavit of the bank's officer together, I think we ought to understand, not that the bank had received and held over $7,000 of special deposits of the same character as the $265, but that between the dates named that amount had been deposited generally, and had been treated by the bank, and used and paid out, the same as the $265. To us these statements do not mean that the bank held other special deposits, delivered to and received by it for, and so appropriated to, a particular purpose or trust; and, even if they were so intended, there is nothing before us to indicate that any such depositor ever has, or ever will, assert his rights. The plaintiff having established his right to be paid, no question of priority is presented until it is shown that there are rival claimants in position to and disposed to raise the question, and that they will suffer by allowing plaintiff to be presently and first paid. Payment to him ought not to be denied or delayed upon a bare suspicion that others similarly situated, now sleeping on their rights, may eventually assert them.

The order of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

(.....Cal.....)

1. The declaration in a state constitution that a certain city is the seat of government and shall so remain "until changed by law" does not withdraw this provision from the possibility of amendment, although the section itself provides for change by statute approved by the people.

2. An amendment of the state constitution by changing the seat of government to another city on condition of a certain donation of land and money, and an approval by certain officers of the site donated is not such an amendment as the legislature is authorized to submit to the vote of the people, since it would not upon adoption by the people become an effective part of the constitution without subsequent acts and the approval thereof by certain officers and the exercise of discretion by the commission.

The action of the legislature in this instance did not legally or constitutionally affect the status of affairs with respect to the seat of government of this state.

Section 1 of article 20 of the present Constitution says: "The city of Sacramento is hereby declared to be the seat of government of this state, and shall so remain until changed by law; but no law changing the seat of government shall be valid or binding unless the same be approved and ratified by a majority of the qualified electors of the state voting therefor at a general state election under such regulations and provisions as the legislature, by a two-thirds vote of each house, may provide submitting the question of change to the people."

The court knows that no law of any character has ever, at any time, been enacted as above required, or in any manner whatever.

Section 1 of article 20, as it now stands, requires affirmative action to bring about or authorize a removal of the seat of government, and if those provisions be not abrogated by 35 L. R. A.

appropriate language in a valid amendment providing for a different method, or abolishing all conditions, the proposed amendment must fail.

The provisions of the constitution of the state of California are not grants of power, but restrictions upon the power of the legislature. Where the constitution prescribes a mode of procedure, that mode is the measure of power.

Section 1, article 20, of the State Constitution requires legislation to carry out its provisions and the provisions have not been made. The alleged amendment does not provide the means or terms of removal, but bluntly says it is removed.

Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Nevada, New York, North Dakota and Wisconsin have provisions of constitution relative to amendments quite similar to California, and they each submit amendments under general law.

The following states have constitutional requirements similar to California, and submit under special act or special joint resolution, viz.: Georgia, Maryland, North Carolina, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, Virginia and West Virginia.

The following states, with different provisions, submit under general law: Alabama, Arkansas, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Maine and Nebraska.

In the following states the laws or constitutions provide that proposed amendments be submitted by the governor, viz.: Georgia, Maryland, Oregon, Tennessee and Texas.

In the states of Delaware and Maryland the concurrence of the governor is a prerequisite to proposal.

In the states of Delaware, Kentucky, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Michigan and New Hampshire the machinery for submission is contained in the constitution.

In the following states all amendments are submitted under special acts or joint resolutions, regardless of difference in language of constitution: Georgia, Idaho, Kansas, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Montana, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, Washington and West Virginia.

In State v. Grey (Nev.) 19 L. R. A. 184, the court holds that wide latitude shall be indulged in favor of propositions to amend the constitution.

In State v. Cunningham, 17 L. R. A. 145, 33 Wla. 90, the secretary of state of Wisconsin, acting under law almost identical with section 1195, Pol. Code of this state, was restrained from submitting a proposition to the voters because of invalidity of the act to be voted on.

178, in which a voter successfully opposed the submission of a proposition under a general law because the matter to be submitted was invalid, there was no question as to validity of the general law.

See also Oakland Paving Co. v. Tompkins, 72 Cal. 5.

The flat question as to the validity of laws for submitting proposed amendments has not in a single instance been called in question.

In Constitutional Prohibitory Amendment, 24 Kan. 700, it was claimed that there had not been any provision whatever for its submission, but the decision was based upon the fact that the proposition had in fact been submitted, and had received the sanction of a very large majority of the electors.

This general law must fail, because it is an attempt by the legislature to delegate to other persons the duty imposed upon it by section 1 of article 18 of the Constitution, and such legislative duty cannot be delegated.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the last session of the legislature a proposition for an amendment to section 1 of article 20 of the Constitution was adopted by the vote of the two thirds of the members of each house, in the following terms: "Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 23. Submitting to the people of the state of California an amendment to the constitution, amending section one of article twenty of the Constitution of the state of California, relative to changing the seat of government from the city of Sacramento to the city of San José. The legislature of the state of California, at its thirtieth session, commencing on the second day of January, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three, two thirds of all the members elected to each house of said legislature voting in favor thereof, hereby proposes that section one of article twenty (miscellaneous subjects) of the Constitution of the state of California be amended so as to read as follows: Section 1. The city of San José is hereby declared to be the seat of government of this state, and shall so remain until changed by law; but no law changing the seat of government shall be valid or binding unless the same be approved and ratified by a majority of the qualified electors of the state voting therefor at a general state election, under such regulations and provisions as the legislature, by a two-thirds vote of each house, may provide, submitting the question of change to the people; provided, that the state shall receive a donation of a site of not less than ten acres and one million dollars before such removal shall be had. The governor, the secretary of state, and the attorney-general are hereby authorized to approve said site, and upon the approval thereof, and the payment of one million dollars into the state treasury, the legislature shall provide for the erection of the necessary building and the removal of the seat of government." The present action was brought by the respondent as a taxpayer and citizen of the state, to restrain the defendant, as secretary of state, from certifying the said amendment to the clerks of the respective counties of the state, and from doing any other act with intent to have the said amendment submitted to the electors of the state, and from incurring any expenses in connection with said amendment, or with any attempt to secure a vote thereon by the people, upon the grounds, as contended by him, that, by reason of the failure to comply with certain constitutional requirements, the amendment was never legally adopted, and, also, that, by the terms of the proposition itself, it is inefficient as an amendment to the constitution, and would be inoperative if approved by the people; and that, as a taxpayer and citizen, he is entitled to this relief against the improper expenditure of public moneys. Judgment was rendered by the court below in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

The court made findings of fact in reference to the adoption of the amendment substantially as follows: On the 11th of March, 1893, while the legislature was in evening session, and after the hour of 10 o'clock in the afternoon of that day, the proposed amendment was introduced and read in the senate, and, after the roll had been called upon a motion for its adoption, the secretary of the senate announced that 28 senators, including Senators Hart and Voorhies, had voted for the amendment, and 7 had voted against it. Immediately upon the announcement of the vote what purported to be a true copy of the proposed amendment was transmitted to the assembly, with the announcement that it had been duly adopted by the senate; and at the hour of 10 o'clock and 15 minutes P. M. the senate adjourned. On the same evening, between the hour of 10 o'clock and 15 minutes and 11 o'clock P. M., the rules of the assembly were suspended, and the amendment was voted upon in that house, and received the votes of 57 members in its favor, and 7 against it. Immediately thereon one of the assemblymen who had voted in favor of its adoption gave notice of his intention to move for a reconsideration of the vote, and at 11 o'clock P. M. the assembly adjourned. On the 18th of March (the intervening day being Sunday) another assemblyman who had voted for its adoption moved the reconsideration of such vote, and immediately thereafter, upon his motion, the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table, and during the afternoon session of that day the copy of the amendment, as sent to the assembly, was returned to the senate, with the announcement that it had been duly adopted by the assembly, and the legislature adjourned sine die, without any action by the assembly upon the motion for a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment had been adopted. When the senate convened on the 18th of March, the journal was corrected so as to show that Senator Voorhies had voted "No" upon the adoption of the amendment, instead of "Aye," as it had been recorded. Thereupon Senator Hart, who had been opposed to the measure, stated that he had voted "No," but had changed to "Aye," because he had ascertained before the announcement of the vote that 27 votes had been cast in favor of the amendment, and that he had changed his vote for the purpose of giving notice of a motion to reconsider, and that, when the vote was announced, he attempted to make such motion, but an adjournment was had before he could present the motion. He therefore asked to have his vote recorded against the amendment. The matter was referred to the committee on judiciary, which reported that he had earnestly endeavored to defeat the measure when before the senate, and recommended that his personal statement be entered upon the journal. The motion of Senator Hart to have the journal corrected was denied, and the journal was approved, showing 27 votes, including that of Senator Hart, in favor of the proposed amendment, and 8 votes against it. The copy voted on in the assembly differed from that voted on in the senate by the omission of the words "of this state," in section 1, immediately after the words "seat of government," and in having the word "laws" instead of "law" in the first sentence. Upon these facts, the respondent, in his argument, has presented various reasons for the affirmance of the judgment, but the conclusion that we have reached concerning the character and effect of the proposed amendment renders it unnecessary to consider the other propositions presented by him.

Article 18 of the Constitution provides two methods by which changes may be effected in that instrument,—one by a convention of delegates chosen by the people for the express purpose of revising the entire instrument, and the other through the adoption by the people of propositions for specific amendments that have been previously submitted to it by two thirds of the members of each branch of the legislature. It can be neither revised nor amended, except in the manner prescribed by itself, and the power which it has conferred upon the legislature in reference to proposing amendments, as well as to calling a convention, must be strictly pursued. Under the first of these methods the entire sovereignty of the people is represented in the convention. The character and extent of a constitution that may be framed by that body is freed from any limitations other than those contained in the Constitution of the United States. If, upon its submission to the people it is adopted, it becomes the measure of authority for all the departments of government,—the organic law of the state,—to which every citizen must yield an acquiescent obedience. The power of the legislature to initiate any change in the existing organic law is, however, of greatly less extent, and, being a delegated power, is to be strictly construed, under the limitations by which it has been conferred. In submitting propositions for the amendment of the constitution, the legislature is not in the exercise of its legislative power, or of any sovereignty of the people that has been intrusted to it, but is merely acting under a limited power, conferred upon it by the people, and which might with equal propriety have been conferred upon either house, or upon the governor, or upon a special commission, or any other body or tribunal. The extent of this power is limited to the object for which it is given, and is measured by the terms in which it has been conferred, and cannot be extended by the legislature to any other object, or enlarged beyond these terms. The legislature is not authorized to assume the function of a constitutional convention, and propose for adoption by the people a revision of the entire constitution under the form of an amendment, nor can it submit to their votes a proposition which, if adopted, would, by the very terms in which it is framed, be inoperative. The constitution itself has been framed by delegates chosen by the people for that express purpose, and has been afterwards ratified by a vote of the people, at a special election held for that purpose; and the provision in article 18 that it can be revised only in the same manner, and after the people have had an opportunity to express their will in reference thereto, precludes the idea that it was the intention of the people, by the provision for amendments authorized in the first section of this article, to afford the means of effecting the same result which in the next section has been guarded with so much care and precision. The very term "constitution" implies an instrument of a permanent and abiding nature, and the provisions contained therein for its revision indicate the will of the people that the underlying principles upon which it rests, as well as the substantial entirety of the instrument, shall be of a like permanent and abiding nature. On the other hand, the significance of the term "amendment" implies such an addition or change within the lines of the original instrument as will effect an improvement, or better carry out the purpose for which it was framed. Experience may disclose defects in some of its details, or in the practical application of some of the principles or limitations which it contains. The changed condition of affairs in different parts of the state, or the changes of society or time, may demand an enlargement of some of these limitations, or an extended application of its principles. So, too, some popular wave of sociological reform, like the abolition of the death penalty for crime, or a prohibition against the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors, may induce a legislature to submit for enactment, in the permanent form of a constitutional prohibition, a rule which it has the power itself to enact as a law, but which might be of only temporary effect.

Section 1 of article 20 of the Constitution is as follows: "The city of Sacramento is hereby declared to be the seat of government of this state, and shall so remain until changed by law; but no law changing the seat of government shall be valid or binding unless the same be approved and ratified by a majority of the qualified electors of the state, voting therefor at a general state election, under such regulations and provisions as the legislature, by a two-thirds vote of each house, may provide, submitting the question of change to the people." The designation of the seat of government of a state may not properly fall within the definition of a constitution, but as it is a matter which is of public interest, and concerns the entire state, it is frequently made a part of that instrument, with the qualification that it shall so remain until changed by law. This declaration that the city of Sacramento is the seat of government of this state is a part of the constitution, and may be amended in the same manner as any other portion of that instrument. The provision that it shall so remain the seat of government until changed by law, whether such law is to be passed like any other law, or with the limitations prescribed in this section, is immaterial. The section of the constitution in which this provision is contained is not thereby withdrawn from the possibility of amendment. By this section the constitution provides that the seat of government may be changed in the manner therein prescribed, but the mode of effecting such change is not limited to the one thus provided. The legislature might have provided for changing the seat of government to San José by passing a law under the provisions of this section, but, instead of attempting this course, it has seen fit to seek to accomplish the same result through an amendment to the constitution. Either of these courses was open to its choice, and, if the amendment proposed by it were such as is within its power to submit for the approval of the people, the course adopted by it is without objection, for it must be left to the discretion of the legislature to determine which of two methods open to its selection it will adopt. The proposed amendment is, however, ineffective in accomplishing the object expressed in the title of the proposition. Article 18 of section 1 of the Constitution provides that, if a proposed amendment is ratified and approved by the people, it "shall become a part of this constitution." By the terms of the proposed amendment, however, its operative effect is limited upon the donation to the state of not less than ten acres in land and $1,000,000 in money, and the approval by the governor, the secretary of state, and the attorney-general of the site so donated. The section of the constitution which is to be superseded by the proposed amendment fixes the seat of government at Sacramento, and so long as that section remains a part of the constitution, the seat of government will remain at Sacramento until changed by law. But, if the proposed amendment should be adopted by the people, it would obliterate this section from the constitution without leaving any constitutional declaration by which the seat of government would be located in any part of the state. Although the first section of the amendment is in terms the declaration of an existing fact, the concluding portion shows that the amendment, as a whole, has reference to a future state of facts which may never come into existence. The proviso in the amendment is a limitation upon the declaration that the seat of government is at San José, and postpones the effect of that declaration until the conditions in the proviso have been complied with. Under established rules of construction applicable to constitutions, as well as to statutes, the effect of a proviso to an act is to render the proviso a limitation upon the body of the act, and to deprive the substantive part of the act of all effect inconsistent with the terms of the proviso. The effect of the amendment, if approved by the people, would be that the seat of government will at some future time be at San José, provided a donation of $1,000,000 in money and ten acres of land shall be made. Until the donation of money and land shall have been made, and the site donated approved by the designated officers, the removal of the seat of government cannot take place; and the declaration in the first sentence that "the city of San José is hereby declared to be the seat of government of this state" would be ineffectual, for the reason that the amendment would fail to become an operative part of the constitution. The "removal" for which the legislature is directed to provide in the last clause of the proposed amendment is the removal from Sacramento to San José, and not a subsequent removal from San José, as is suggested in one of the briefs filed herein. By the existing constitution the seat of government is fixed at Sacramento, and is to remain there until changed; and by the terms of the proposed amendment there can be no removal except in accordance with the terms of the proviso upon which it is conditioned, and which limits the removal from Sacramento to San José to those terms. This removal is conditioned upon the approval of the site that must be donated before the declarative portion of the section can have any operation, and is the removal which is referred to in the proviso which declares that the donation shall be made "before such removal shall be had." If any additional argument is needed, it is found in the current history of the adoption of the amendment, and also in the entitling of the proposition for the amendment, which declares it to be "relative to changing the seat of government from the city of Sacramento to the city of San José." The provision in the proposed amendment for a law providing for its subsequent change from San José would not, upon its approval by the people, become an operative provision of the constitution, for the reason that that city will not, upon the mere approval of the amendment by the people, become the seat of government, so that the proposition of the legislature, instead of amending the constitution, either by changing any of its terms, or adding thereto some other limitation, would take away the provision which now exists, and place in its stead a provision which is incompatible with the requirement that it shall become a part of the instrument. The legislature was not authorized by the framers of the constitution, nor do the terms of that instrument permit it, to propose any amendment that will not, upon its adoption by the people, become an effective part of the constitution; nor is it authorized to propose an amendment which, if ratified, will take effect only at the will of other persons, or upon the approval by such persons of some specific act or condition. The amendment proposed is neither a declaration by the people of a principle or of a fact, nor is it a limitation or a rule prescribed for the guidance of either of the departments to which the sovereignty of the people has been intrusted. If adopted, it would have merely the effect to present the option to any one so disposed of making a donation of land and money for the purpose of having the seat of government at San José. Such a proposition is legislative in character, rather than constitutional, and, being conditional in its terms, would be ineffective in accomplishing a change of the seat of government from that already fixed by the constitution. Even if it should be conceded that its approval by the people would incorporate its terms into the constitution, it would take from that instrument the existing declaration fixing the place for the seat of government, and leave the state without any constitutional seat of government until the conditions upon which the declaration rests have been performed. As there is no limitation of the time within which these conditions are to be performed, and no obligation for their performance, it follows that the seat of government would have no established location. But the donation of the money and land does not bring the provision into operation, for, until after the site that may be offered has received the approval of the designated officers, there can be no act of the legislature tending to the removal. Instead, therefore, of there being any declaration by the people of a place for the seat of government, a commission is substituted whose judgment is to be taken instead of the judgment of the people, and to which is assigned a discretion which should be exercised by the people themselves. We do not mean to say that a legislative provision in a constitution that has been ratified by the people would be nugatory. If placed there, it must be observed by courts and citizens; but, for the purpose of determining the extent of the power conferred upon the legislature to propose amendments to the constitution, we must assume that it is only such amendments as may naturally and reasonably belong to the elements of a constitution. The amendment proposed substitutes for, or rather superadds to, the will of the people another will or judgment, without which its own will can have no effect, and which is therefore made the controlling judgment before the amendment can have any operative existence. As the proposed amendment is therefore only a proposition for the people to submit to some other individuals or body to determine whether there shall be a change of the seat of government, we hold that it is not such an amendment as the legislature has been authorized to submit to their votes. If the people shall at any time desire a removal of the seat of government from Sacramento, this result can be readily effected, either by a law passed in accordance with the existing provisions of the constitution, or by a proposal on the part of the legislature for such an amendment to the constitution as will afford them an opportunity to give immediate effect to their desire by a direct vote upon the question.

The judgment and order of the court below are affirmed.

We concur: Beatty, Ch. J.; Fitzgerald, J.; DeHaven, J.; Garoutte, J.

Paterson, J., concurring:

At the argument it was contended by respondent that the judgment should be affirmed because the proposed amendment was never finally disposed of by the assembly, the whole matter having been laid on the table; that it was not passed in the senate by a two-thirds vote of all the members thereof, the record showing that Senator Hart's vote ought to have been recorded in the negative; that the house did not act upon the measure that was passed by the senate; that the proposed amendment is on its face void, because in contravention of public morals, being an offer on the part of the state to abandon its property at Sacramento, and change its seat of government to San José, for a bribe or consideration of $1,000,000 and ten acres of land; and that, in any event, it is void for uncertainty, there being nothing to show who is to pay the money or donate the land, or how long the people will have to wait for a tender of the property,—how many propositions may be made and rejected before it can be known where the seat of government is to be permanently located; and that no one can know where the seat of government would be in the event of a failure of the governor, attorney-general, and secretary of state, or a majority of them, to act upon any proposition for a site that might be offered. It must be admitted that there are serious questions involved in some of these contentions. We agree with the majority in holding that the proposed amendment is ineffective on account of the conditions contained therein, but there is another ground upon which we also desire to place our conclusion.

The language of section 1 of article 20 of the Constitution is plain. No law changing the seat of government shall be valid or binding until said law has been ratified by a majority of the qualified electors of the state, voting therefor at a general election; and that law must first receive the sanction of two thirds of the members of each house, and have been approved by the governor. No law has ever been passed by the legislature proposing to change the seat of government from Sacramento to San José, or providing under what regulations or provisions the question of a change of the seat of government should be voted upon. The proposed amendment was not put in the form of a bill. It was neither printed nor read on three several days, nor was the measure declared to constitute a case of urgency. It was not considered by the governor. Therefore it is not a law. It is true the legislature has by a general act provided how proposed amendments to the constitution may be submitted when no other mode is provided by law for their submission (Stat. 1883, p. 53; Stat. 1891, p. 165), and such provisions may be, and doubtless are, sufficient for the submission of proposed amendments generally; but the seat of government cannot be changed by any law, whether it be an ordinary act, or in the form of a proposed amendment to the constitution, unless it has been regularly introduced, taken the regular course, received the approval of two thirds of the members of each house, and been approved by the governor.

Appellant claims that section 1 of article 20 of the Constitution can be amended by proceedings under section 1 of article 18 of the Constitution, and for that purpose the Acts of 1883 and 1891, supra, are sufficient legislation to submit the proposed constitutional amendment to the people; that sections 1 and 2 of article 18 are the only sections relating to amendments, and that they contain no limitation as to amendments; that section 1 of article 20 provides for the removal of the state capitol by a law under the constitution as it now exists, while section 1 of article 18 provides for amending any section of the constitution, including section 1 of article 20. It is claimed that the court below and counsel for respondent confounded the question of removal of the state capitol with the question of amending the constitution. A glance at the proposed amendment, however, is sufficient to show that its sole object is a removal of the seat of government from Sacramento to San José. With the word "Sacramento" substituted for the word "San José," the proposed section is identical with the provision of the constitution, down to the condition of removal. If the framers of the constitution intended to permit the seat of government to be removed by the proposal and submission of a constitutional amendment under section 1 of article 18, it is difficult to see why they inserted the provision in section 1 of article 20, requiring the proposal to change the seat of government to be submitted to the people at a general election, under such regulations as two thirds of all the members of each house should provide, by an act regularly introduced, passed, and approved, as other acts of the legislature are introduced, passed, and approved by the governor. If section 1 of article 20 can be amended in the manner proposed, then the seat of government may be removed by a simple resolution, indorsed by two thirds of the members elected to each house, and the regulations under which the question of removal is to be voted upon may be adopted by a bare majority of each house, and submitted to the people at a special election, held at any time. But such was clearly the thing which the framers of the constitution did not intend to allow to take place, when it provided that the question must be voted upon at a general election, and that no law changing the seat of government should be valid until it had received the sanction of two thirds of the members of each house of the legislature proposing the amendment, and the regulations upon which the question should be submitted were provided by the same number of members, and had been approved by the executive. It is intended that a bare majority of the members of the legislature should not have the power to call for an election upon so important a question. The time for voting upon the question was fixed at a general election, for the purpose of giving the people ample opportunity to fully deliberate upon the question of public policy and public economy necessarily involved in the issue, and when the greatest number of electors would probably assemble at the polls. That it was the purpose of the framers of the constitution to make the subject of the removal of the seat of government an exception to the general rule, and to place a check upon hasty action thereon by requiring the greatest deliberation on the part of those who proposed the amendment, as well as those who should vote upon it, is manifest, not only in the language of the section itself, but in the history of the seat of government in this state, and the debates upon the subject in the constitutional convention. The Constitution of 1849 provided that the Pueblo de San José should be "the permanent seat of government until removed by law; provided, however, that two thirds of all the members elected to each house of the legislature shall concur in the passage of such law." Soon after the adoption of that constitution (November 13, 1849) a proposition was made to the legislature offering a large donation to the state if the seat of government should be located permanently at Vallejo, and an act was passed "to take the sense of the people of California upon the subject to the permanent location of the seat of government." Stat. 1849-50, p. 412. On February 4, 1851, an act was passed providing for "the permanent location of the seat of government" at Vallejo, provided M. G. Vallejo should submit a satisfactory bond for the performance of his proposition, and furnish a state-house for three years. Stat. 1851, p. 430. On February 4, 1853, a resolution was passed by the legislature calling upon Vallejo for payment of his proposed donation of $370,000, and to state his intentions and wishes respecting the location of the seat of government. Stat. 1852-53, p. 309. Vallejo having asked to be released from his obligation on account of his inability to comply with the condition, an act was passed providing that the seat of government on and after February 5, 1853, should be at Benicia, provided Vallejo should release the state from all claims for damages (Stat. 1853, p. 24); and on May 18, 1853, such release having been given, it was provided by "An act for the permanent location of the seat of government" that the "city of Benicia, situated on the straits of Carquines, shall be and remain the permanent seat of government in accordance with the constitution." Stat. 1853, p. 217. On February 25, 1854, the legislature passed an act repealing the former act, and providing that the permanent seat of government should be and remain at the city of Sacramento. Thus the matter rested until the subject again came up in the constitutional convention of 1879. Meantime, however, that state had spent $2,500,000 in state capitol buildings and grounds at Sacramento. In the convention Mr. Edgerton, introduced a proposition providing that the seat of government should remain at Sacramento until changed by law, but that no law proposing a change should be effectual until submitted to the electors of the state at a general election, and approved by a majority of two thirds of all the votes cast. But the section (sec. 1, art. 20), as proposed by the committee and finally passed, reads as above quoted. During the argument one member of the convention moved to strike out all of the section after the word "remain;" also to strike out the words "by a two-thirds vote of each house." To show the temper of the convention in regard to the matter, we quote briefly from some of the speeches made during the debate on these proposed amendments: "Mr. Wicks: It should not be left to the caprice of demagogues and politicians. We were cursed by such fickleness in the earlier history of our state. The state, too, has spent a great deal of money here in Sacramento, and has acquired a valuable property. Mr. Barbour: Suppose Sacramento washes away. Mr. Wicks: There is no danger of Sacramento washing away. This building never will be washed away. Mr. Ayers: I do not see any necessity for the amendment. I think that the section as it is now is conservative enough. It requires a two-thirds vote of the legislature to submit the question. I think that is strong enough to prevent anything like rash action with reference to the removal of the capitol. Mr. Brown: Now, I do not see there is any antagonistic feeling against Sacramento as to state capitol, but to attempt to bind the future entirely to this place I think would be wrong, and when the matter is provided for here that, by a certain action of the legislature, the matter shall be submitted to a vote of the people, it seems to me that that should be sufficient. Mr. Schell: I believe this section is right. I believe that, whenever we seek to tear up the foundations of the state capitol, it should be at the instance of two thirds of the legislature. At least two thirds of the legislature ought to vote in favor of submitting it to the people first, and then the people may by a majority vote remove it. It is not an ordinary question that ought to be submitted to merely a majority of the legislature. Mr. White: I desire to say that I am going to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Santa Clara, and that I have no feeling of malice; and if there is any feeling, except by the gentleman himself, I do not know it. We desire merely to give the power to the people to move the capitol at any time they wish. We do not intend to tie down the legislature to a two-thirds vote if we can help it. Mr. Tinnin: The capitol has been located here at immense expense. It is true, I think, that it was a great mistake in placing it here, but it is here; and it has cost the people of the state a great deal of money, and it should not be removed unless some great calamity or misfortune befalls this city which necessitates that removal. Mr. Tully: There has been a good deal said here in reference to lobbying, and I don't know any section that has been adopted or anything that this convention could do to encourage lobbying more than to adopt this amendment. There would be a fight every time the legislature met for a majority to move this capitol, perhaps down to Los Angeles, or some other prominent place." & Const. Conv. pp. 1388, 1389.

It is a rule of construction applicable to constitutions as well as to statutes that general words are qualified by particular clauses, and that effect must be given to all the provisions of the constitution, if possible, that no word or clause may become redundant; and, as said before, if it had been the intention to permit the removal by resort to the remedy provided in section 1 of article 18, there would have been no necessity for the other and more difficult remedy provided by section 1 of article 20. The only alteration attempted by the proposed amendment is of that portion of the section which fixes the seat of government. No principle of the organic law was in any manner affected, and it would be a clear violation, not only of the spirit, but the letter, of the provision that the seat of government shall not be removed except in a particular way, to hold that the purpose may be accomplished in another and easier way. That which cannot be done by direction cannot be done by indirection. Two rules of procedure have been prescribed by the constitution,—one for amendments of the organic law, and the other for a change of the seat of government. The contention of respondent, if sustained, would result in the nullification of one provision of the constitution by another. While one section of the constitution would provide for removal only in a particular way, another section of the same instrument, relating to general subjects, would authorize the removal in an entirely different manner, and the last clause of the section would accomplish no purpose whatever. It is conceded, of course, that the people may adopt any amendment of the constitution which is proposed in the manner prescribed by the instrument itself, but neither the legislature nor the people can disregard the provisions which limit and prescribe their power. It would be competent, of course, for the legislature to propose, and the people to approve, an amendment of section 1 of article 20 to provide a different method from that which now exists of changing the seat of government. That power might be delegated to the legislature alone by a majority vote, but, until some other method has been adopted by amendment to the constitution, the seat of government must remain at Sacramento until it has been changed by a law passed, approved, and ratified in the manner now prescribed by the constitution. If the members of the convention had been told at the conclusion of their debate that, notwithstanding all the care they had taken to secure the deliberate judgment of two thirds of both houses, and the approval of the governor, or his reasons for disapproval, before the question of removal could be again submitted for decision, even at a general election, the time would come when the legislature would claim the right to precipitate the question at any time it saw fit, by resolution introduced and passed within an hour, and under resolutions prescribed by a general act, and passed by a bare majority, can any one doubt, in view of the importance they attached to the matter, that they would have declared in express and unmistakable words that the rule prescribed by section 1 of article 18 should not apply to the subject of removal of the seat of government? What could the members of the convention have expected to accomplish by the precautions provided for in section 1 of article of 20? They certainly did not expect those desiring to procure an amendment effecting a change of the seat of government to follow the difficult procedure therein prescribed, when there was an easier way by following section 1 of article 18.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (Div. 1).

Lena DICKSON, Resp't.,

v.

OMAHA & ST. LOUIS R. CO., Appt.

1. A railroad company is liable to an employe for failure to keep its fence in repair, as required by statute, if he is injured without his fault in consequence thereof by collision of a train on which he is employed with an animal upon the track.

2. Collision of a train with an animal on the track which derails the front pair of small wheels under the engine is the proximate cause of an injury to the

NOTE.—Obligation of railroad company to employes as to fencing track.

Statutory duty to fence.

On the question of liability of railroad companies for injuries caused to employes by failure of the company to fence against stock, as required by statute, there is a direct conflict of authority, although there are not many cases as yet directly on this subject. Wisconsin, New York, and Missouri courts have held that the railroad company is liable, while Minnesota, Iowa, and Illinois courts have denied the application of the statute to employes or exonerated the company on account of risk assumed by the employe. The decision in Illinois is based on a New York case which has since been overruled.

In California the railroad company has also been held liable, but the question of statutory requirements was not discussed.

clearly in accord with the weight of authority under Wis. Laws 1881, chap. 193, providing that railroad companies shall be liable for all damages to persons by failure to fence or have cattle guards, an engineer is protected by this statute and does not assume all risks, as he may assume that the company will comply with the law, and the right to damages is absolute under the statute. Quackenbush v. Wisconsin & M. R. Co. 62 Wis. 411.

And under N. Y. General Railroad Act, 1860, section 44, requiring railroad companies to build fences and rendering them liable for damages to stock, it is the duty of the railroad company to see that the track is clear and protected, and it is liable for injuring a brakeman by reason of a horse being on the track where not fenced. (Overruling Langlois v. Buffalo & R. R. Co. 47 N. Y. 468. Erhardt, 7 L. R. A. 587, 119 N. Y. 468.

In Langlois v. Buffalo & R. R. Co. 19 Barb. 364, it was held, under N. Y. Laws 1860, p. 238, providing engineer, who, after reversing his engine and applying an air brake, goes out on the running board to the steam chest and is killed by the derailling of the engine as it strikes a switch less than a thousand feet from the point of collision.

3. Disobedience by an engineer of a rule requiring a train to be kept under control and prepared to stop in case the track is obstructed does not affect the liability of the company for his death caused by a collision with an animal on the track, where the road was not fenced as required by law, if the most diligent care and careful control of the engine could not have prevented the collision after the danger appeared.

4. A railroad engineer is not negligent in remaining on his engine after the front pair of small wheels under the engine are derailed and he has reversed his engine and put on air brakes, even if this is not the safest and most prudent course.

5. An instruction that a railroad engineer assumes the danger of a defective fence, if it was known to him "as well as to the company," is misleading, if there was no proof of his actual knowledge, since it might imply an obligation on his part to inspect and ascertain such defects.

(July 2, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Daviess County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of defendant's husband. Affirmed.

Statement by Macfarlane, J.:

This action is brought by Lena Dickson, widow of James Dickson, deceased, against the Omaha & St. Louis Railway Company, to recover the sum of $5,000 for alleged negligence of the railway resulting in the death of Dickson, near Evona, Mo., on May 16, 1891. The petition avers that on that day deceased was in the employ of defendant as locomotive engineer, and was operating one of its locomotives attached to a freight train. While so operating said engine a collision occurred with a bull which had strayed upon the track through a defective fence, by reason of which collision the engine was thrown from the track and overturned, thereby killing Dickson; that the bull got upon the track, and the accident occurred, at a point where the law required the defendant to erect and maintain the fence; that defendant was negligent, in that, although it was required by law to maintain said fence, it failed to do so, and, by reason of said negligence, plaintiff's husband was killed; and she prayed damages as above. To the petition the defendant entered a general denial, which it supplemented with the allegations that, if the fence was defective, Dickson knew of such defect; that, at the time of the accident, Dickson was violating the rules of the company, in running his engine at a high, forbidden, and dangerous speed; that the injury was not due to the collision with the bull, but was caused by striking a three-throw switch at great distance from the point where the collision occurred; and that, after the collision with the bull, Dickson might have avoided all injury by the exercise of ordinary care. The testimony offered tended to show that on the morning of May 16, 1891, Dickson, then operating one of defendant's that railroads shall be liable for all damages which shall be done by their agents or engines, to cattle, horses, or other animals, and imposing an obligation to fence, the railroad company is not liable for killing a party employed to ring the locomotive bell where his death was caused by cattle on unfenced track derailling the locomotive.

This and the next case, infra, of McMillan v. Saratoga & W. R. Co. are virtually overruled by the case of Donnegan v. Erhardt, supra.

In McMillan v. Saratoga & W. R. Co., 20 Barb. 449, a complaint, for damages caused by a locomotive being thrown from the track, and killing the engineer, by reason of a horse being on the track, through want of repairs in fence and from defective cow catcher, was insufficient in that it failed to allege actual notice to defendant, and he was more likely to know of defects in fence than the company or officers elsewhere located, and in using such a locomotive he was grossly negligent himself and the complaint was dismissed.

The railroad company is liable where a brakeman and baggage master was injured through defective fence and cowcatcher, and the car was thrown from the track by collision with a bull; the question of plaintiff's knowledge of danger was for the jury. (Denying authority of Sweeney v. Central Pac. R. Co. infra.) Magee v. North Pacific Coast R. Co. 78 Cal. 423.

The statute is not referred to nor discussed in the opinion.

In Sweeney v. Central Pac. R. Co., 57 Cal. 15, it was held that an engineer supposed to have knowledge of no fence, assumes the risk occasioned from collision with cattle—and there can be no recovery for his death unless (1) caused by neglect to fence;

(2) that the defendant did not know of neglect to fence; (3) that the employé did not know the danger.

But the authority of this case is denied in Magee v. North Pacific Coast R. Co. supra.

In Atochison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Reesman, 60 Fed. Rep. 370, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 2511, p. 659, providing that for failure to fence, a railroad company shall be liable in double the amount of damages done by reason of stock escaping from the inclosure, it was held that a brakeman not at his post as required by the rules of the company could not recover for injuries received, but it was stated that if he had been at his proper place he could have recovered where such injuries were caused by derailment of the train from stock on the track.

In Blair v. Milwaukee & P. du Ch. R. Co., 20 Wis. 257, where a passenger was injured, it was said that any person who, without fault on his part, is injured from failure of the railroad company to fence against cattle, as required by statute, may recover for damages sustained without any other proof of negligence on the part of the company.

But in Fleming v. St. Paul & D. R. Co., 27 Minn. 111, it was held a statute providing that a railroad company shall be "liable for all damages sustained by any person" in consequence of failure to fence was construed as limited by the general proposition of law that employés assume the risk of their employment, where fireman was killed by derailment of locomotive from running over a cow, where the road had never been fenced.

In Patton v. Central Iowa R. Co., 73 Iowa, 306, where a fireman on a freight train was injured, it was held that a railroad company does not owe to its employés the duty of fencing the road, there being no statutory obligation to fence, and employés assume such risk in taking employment, al-trains as engineer, was approaching the station at Evona, going east. When the engine was about 950 feet west of the west switch, and moving at from fifteen to twenty miles an hour, it collided with a bull which had strayed upon the track through a defect in the railroad fence along the right of way. The bull was carried on the cowcatcher about 100 feet, and then rolled on the track in front of the engine. The only effect of the collision was to derail the front pair of small wheels under the engine. These kept on the ties, close to the rails. All the rest of the train kept the track for 850 feet, and until the west switch was reached. After colliding with the animal, Dickson reversed his engine, and applied an air brake with which the engine was fitted. He then climbed through the window of his cab out onto the running board of the engine, and, after walking its length, stepped down upon the steam chest, and there stood until the west switch was reached. The engine, when it reached this switch, was running about twelve miles an hour. Upon striking the switch, with its front small wheels derailed, the engine was thrown over; and Dickson, who was then standing upon the steam chest, was also thrown to the ground, and crushed to death by some part of the engine or tender. The fireman jumped off within 60 or 70 feet from the place where the bull was struck. When last seen, Dickson was leaning over, watching the derailed wheel under him, which was moving over the ties. After the application of the air brake on the engine, the train began to slow up until its speed at the switch was reduced to about twelve miles an hour. One of the rules of defendant was as follows: "Freight trains must be under control when approaching and passing through all stations, and be prepared to stop in case the track is obstructed." At the conclusion of the testimony, defendant unsuccessfully demurred to the evidence. Any other necessary facts will sufficiently appear in the opinion. The case was submitted to the jury upon instructions given by the court, which need not be set out here. Some instructions asked by defendant were refused. They will be sufficiently noticed in the opinion. The judgment was for plaintiff, for $5,000, and defendant appealed.

Messrs. Theodore Sheldon and E. E. Aleshire for appellant.

Mr. Alexander H. Waller, for respondent:

Plaintiff's petition states a good cause of action. The Missouri statute is mandatory, and enjoins upon railroad companies the positive duty of fencing their tracks with lawful fences and maintaining the same, and was designed for the protection of persons, including employees operating trains, as well as animals.

1 Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2611, p. 659; Isabel v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 484; Donnegan v. Erhardt, 7 L. R. A. 527, 119 N. Y. 472; Magee v. North Pacific Coast R. Co. 78 Cal. 432; Blair v. Milwaukee & P. du Ch. R. Co. 20 Wis. 257; Stuetgen v. Wisconsin Central Co. 80 Wis. 499; Keyser v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 56 Mich. 559, 56 Am. Rep. 405, 66 Mich. 390; Sherman v. Anderson, 27 Kan. 333, 41 Am. Rep. 414; Fordyce v. Jackson, 56 Ark. 597; Walkenhauer v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 17 Fed. Rep. 136.

Any failure or neglect to comply with the though this fireman did not know much about the probability of meeting cattle on the road. The Iowa Code, § 1239, provided for double damages for injuries to stock from failure to fence.

In Dewey v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 81 Iowa 373, it was held that where the bars were down in a fence and horses were on the track, and the conductor in the cab directed the engineer to "pass them," and was killed by derailment of the train, there could be no recovery, but it was said it would have been otherwise if the engineer had been killed, as the conductor was the superior officer. That the bars were down would not render the company liable under statute.

And in Wabash R. Co. v. Brown, 5 Ill. App. 580, (see also 2 Ill. App. 518), under a statute providing for double damages for injury to stock through failure to fence, it was held that an employé who was injured had no right of action against the railroad company, and that he had no right of action at common law, following Langlois v. Buffalo & R. R. Co. 19 Barb. 364, which has since been overruled.

Liability in absence of statute.

It seems that a railroad company is not liable to an employé for injuries caused by stock being on the track through failure to fence, where a fence is not required by the statutes to protect the owners of stock. So an engineer injured by a cow on a bridge, causing derailment of engine in the Indian Territory, cannot recover, as he assumed all risk. Manson v. Eddy, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 148.

Neither common law nor statute in Colorado requires a railroad company to fence its track, and where there is no obligation there is no liability for the death of engineer caused by the engine being derailed by cattle. Cowan v. Union Pac. R. Co. 36 Fed. Rep. 43.

And under Tex. Rev. Stat., arts. 4240-4244, requiring cattleguards at inclosures and rendering the railroad company liable for all damages from failure to construct and maintain, it was held that the only purpose is to protect inclosures, and the law does not require a road to be fenced, nor cattleguards put in because it is fenced, but if not put in the road is treated as not fenced, and the railroad company is not liable to the engineer for injuries caused by such failure. Ward v. Bonner, 80 Tex. 168.

But in Eames v. Texas & N. O. R. Co., 63 Tex. 600, it was held that the failure to keep the right of way free from bushes and undergrowth, so as to enable the engineer to see stock near the track, will render the company liable to one in charge of ditching train, engaged in repairing the track, where the defendant had knowledge of the condition of the road. The question of fence was not discussed.

And in Prather v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 80 Ga. 427, it was held that there could be no recovery where an employé disregarding orders in regard to sitting on flat cars, was killed by the car being derailed by a cow suddenly jumping on the track, from a place where she could not be seen. No question was made as to lack of fence or as to any statutory requirements. The decision implies that if the employé had been at his place a recovery would have been allowed.

positive requirements of any statute or municipal regulation enacted for the purpose of protecting life and limb is negligence per se.

Schlereth v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 98 Mo. 515; Esuin v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 96 Mo. 294; Crumpley v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 93 Mo. 38; Mast, Wood, & S. § 397, p. 789.

The immediate cause of Dickson's death was the wreck of his engine at the switch.

Beach, Contrib. Neg. 1st ed. pp. 32, 33.

There was no proof of negligence on Dickson's part. This question was submitted to and decided by the jury, however, against appellant.

Barry v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 98 Mo. 70; Wilkins v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 101 Mo. 106.

Where a person finds himself suddenly exposed to great danger, and does what he thinks best for his safety, he is not guilty of negligence, though he may not have acted wisely.

Hass v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Iowa) Feb. 2, 1894; Adams v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 74 Mo. 560, 41 Am. Rep. 333; Segrist v. Arnot, 86 Mo. 208, 56 Am. Rep. 424.

The substance of the ninth instruction is that if the defect in the fence "was known to Dickson as well as to the company there can be no recovery in the case, unless," etc. This is not the law. The master and servant in cases like this do not stand on equal footing, and not only must the servant have knowledge of the defect, but of the danger also.

Waldhier v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 87 Mo. 46; Mages v. North Pacific Coast R. Co. 78 Cal. 432.

There was no evidence, direct or circumstantial, tending to show that Dickson had any knowledge whatever of the defect in the fence or the danger arising therefrom. Instructions must be predicated on the evidence.

Rodney v. McLaughlin, 97 Mo. 481; Stone v. Hunt, 114 Mo. 74; Bean v. Western N. C. R. Co. 107 N. C. 745.

The evidence showed that Dickson had been running over that part of appellant's road several months averaging a round trip every ten days. There was no other testimony whatever from which the jury might infer notice on his part of the defect in the fence. From the face of the entire record the verdict was for the right party and had the instruction in question been given the verdict could not have been different. Hence appellant was not prejudiced by the court's action.

Fortune v. Fife, 105 Mo. 488; Haniford v. Kansas, 103 Mo. 182; Fitzgerald v. Barker, 96 Mo. 661.

Macfarlane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The only negligence charged, as ground for recovery, is the failure on the part of defendant to observe the statutory requirement to so keep its fence in repair as to prevent cattle from straying on its railroad. Defendant insists that the statute requiring railroad companies to make and maintain fences on the sides of their roads is designed solely to prevent injuries to the domestic animals of adjacent landowners, and does not create a duty from defendant to its employes. The duty of a master to his servant requires the exercise of reasonable care, not only to provide safe, adequate, and suitable machinery and appliances for his use, but also such care to keep the premises upon which he is required to work in a condition reasonably safe and secure for the performance of the duties required of him. The degree of care must depend largely upon the character of duties required of the servant, the peril to which he is exposed from failure to observe it, and the opportunity he has for avoiding the dangers. There are but few, if any, duties a servant is called upon to perform which are attended with more hazards than those attending the running and management of locomotives and trains upon railroads, and the care the law requires of the master, in respect to providing reasonably adequate and safe engines and cars, is no greater than that required in furnishing a reasonably safe track, and keeping it free from obstructions. The dangers from defects are as great in one as the other, and the care should be commensurate with the dangers. Henry v. Wabash Western R. Co. 109 Mo. 498, and cases cited. We are taught by common experience that cattle and other animals, unless restrained, will stray upon the tracks of railroads, and cause serious and dangerous obstructions to the operation of trains thereon; thereby imperiling the lives, not only of persons carried, but, to a greater degree, of each employe engaged in the duty of managing them. We can see no reason why, at common law, the railroad company would not as well be required to use reasonable care to prevent such obstructions as to see that the ties and rails are sound, and the roadbed secure. I can conceive of no more adequate method that could be adopted by a railroad corporation for keeping domestic animals off the track of its road than that of inclosing it by fences. So it has been held that if the want of a proper fence makes a railway unsafe, and an accident happens to a passenger in consequence, the company are responsible to him, although they are under no obligation to the adjacent landowner. Burton v. North Eastern R. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. 549. It is true that the statute requiring railroad corporations to fence their tracks only, in express terms, gives to the owners of cattle or other animals killed or injured in consequence of a neglect to perform this duty a right of action, yet it has been held in this state that the law was designed likewise for the protection and safety of the traveling public. Briggs v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 111 Mo. 178, and cases cited. The United States Supreme Court, in discussing the Missouri fencing law, and its constitutionality under the police power, uses this emphatic language: "In few instances could the power be more wisely or beneficially exercised than in compelling railroad corporations to inclose their roads with fences, having gates at crossings, and cattleguards. The speed and momentum of the locomotive render such protection against accident, in thickly settled portions of the country, absolutely essential. The omission to erect and maintain such fences and cattleguards, in the face of the law, would justly be deemed gross negligence." Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 522, 29 L. ed. 466. Thus, while the statute only imposes upon the corporation, as a penalty for the nonobservance of the law, double damages for animals killed or injured, the duty to fence is made obligatory. The duty is absolute and unqualified, and is reasonably supposed to have been intended for the protection of all persons upon railroad trains, who are exposed to danger by such obstructions, whether they be passengers or employes. The right of a passenger to recover for personal injuries incurred on account of such negligence has been declared (Blair v. Milwaukee & P. du Ch. R. Co. 20 Wis. 254; Fordyce v. Jackson, 56 Ark. 597; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wilson, 79 Tex. 871, 11 L. R. A. 486), and also of a parent to recover for the death of an infant child who wandered upon a railroad track, by reason of a defective fence, and was struck by a train. (Keyser v. Chicago, & G. T. R. Co. 56 Mich. 559, 56 Am. Rep. 405; Struetgen v. Wisconsin Central Co. 80 Wis. 498; Isabel v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 484; Singleton v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 7 O. B. N. S. 287; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Grablin (Neb.) 56 N. W. Rep. 797). We are of the opinion that a right of action also accrues to an employe, engaged upon a railroad train, for injuries received without his own fault, by reason of the negligence of the corporation in failing to comply with the fencing statute. It has so been held, under a similar statute, by the New York court of appeals. Donnegan v. Erhardt, 119 N. Y. 472, 7 L. R. A. 527.

2. It is said, in the next place, that the defective fence was not the direct and proximate cause of the accident. "The proximate cause of an event must be understood to be that which, in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new cause, produces the event, and without which that event would not have occurred. Proximity in point of time or space, however, is not part of the definition. That is of no importance, except as it may afford evidence for or against proximity of causation." Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 26. Under this definition, there can be no doubt that the negligence in failing to keep the fence in repair was the immediate cause of the obstruction of the track, which, in a natural and continuous sequence, produced the derailment of the engine, and consequent injury. Without the defective fence, the derailment and injury would not have occurred. The negligence was clearly the direct cause of the injury.

3. It is further insisted that the negligence of deceased in disobeying the plain and positive rule of defendant, which required that "freight trains must be under control when approaching and passing through all stations, and be prepared to stop in case the track is obstructed," was also a proximate cause of the injury, which directly contributed thereto, and which prevents a recovery. It may be admitted that deceased was acting in violation of the rules of defendant at the time the engine collided with the bull, and was in consequence negligent; but we are unable to see any proximate and natural connection, as a cause, between this negligence and the derailment of the engine, and injury and death of plaintiff's husband. Mere negligence, without a resulting damage, can no more be pleaded as contributory negligence to defeat an action than it can be charged as an original cause of action. The connection, as a producing cause, must be made to appear in either case. "It must appear, in order to defeat the right of action, that but for plaintiff's negligence, operating as an efficient cause of the injury, in connection with the fault of defendant, the injury would not have happened." Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 84. It appears impliedly from the rule itself, and directly from the testimony of the superintendent and train dispatcher of defendant, that the purpose of the rule was to avoid collisions, obstructions, and misplaced switches at stations. It appears further that the collision which resulted in the derailment of the train occurred nearly a thousand feet from the first switch of the station yards. It does not appear that the engine could, by the most diligent care, have been held under such control as would have prevented the collision after the danger appeared. But it is said that the derailment did not occur immediately from the collision, but that the wheels ran safely on the ties until the switch was reached,—the distance of nearly a thousand feet,—and the engine was then thrown from the track by reason of coming into the switch in a derailed condition. We do not see how this circumstance changes or shifts the proximate cause of the accident from that of the collision with the bull to that of the violation of the rule in question, or how the disregard of the rule became a direct and contributing cause of the injury. There was no intervening cause between the collision and the final disaster, except the contact with the switches, which there is no pretense that deceased could have avoided. We can speculate and theorize as we may as to what course of conduct might have avoided the disaster, but the fact remains that the direct cause was the obstruction of the track, which was brought about by the negligence of defendant, and the consequences of which could not have been avoided by any degree of care deceased could have exercised. What might have been the result, had the rule been observed, is mere speculation.

4. Again, it is argued that deceased was negligent in remaining on the engine while running a thousand feet with two wheels off the rails. This contention is untenable, for two reasons: First, because it does not appear from the evidence that the course adopted by deceased was not the safest and most prudent, in the circumstances; and, second, when suddenly exposed to great and imminent danger, he was not expected to act with that degree of prudence and wisdom which would otherwise have been required of him. The evidence shows that deceased, as soon as he had reversed his engine, sounded the alarm, and put on the air brakes; got out of the cab onto the running board and steam chest, where he remained until the engine was overturned. According to the evidence, he thus assumed the safest position he could have taken. The evidence further shows that when an engine is running rapidly, with two of its wheels off the rails, and jumping from tie to tie, it pitches and jars to such a degree that it is exceedingly difficult and dangerous to jump therefrom. One witness, an engineer, in testifying as to his own experience in riding an engine under similar circumstances, stated: "It was impossible to jump. The jar of the engine riding the ties was such that a man had no control of himself. If he jumped he would fall under. He would have no use of his limbs at all. I could not gather for a spring." With this evidence we could not say that deceased was negligent in remaining on the engine. Nor can we say in the circumstances, that he would have been chargeable with negligence, though he did not adopt the safest and best course to avoid injury. Adams v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 74 Mo. 554, 41 Am. Rep. 333; Siegrist v. Arnot, 86 Mo. 208, 56 Am. Rep. 424.

This disposes of the questions raised on the demurrer to the evidence, as well as to complaints made to the rulings of the court in giving and refusing certain instructions.

5. Complaint is made of the refusal of the court to give the following instruction requested by the defendant: "The jury are instructed that if the defect or bad condition of the fence, whereby the bull came upon the track, was known to Dickson as well as to the company, there can be no recovery in this case, unless the evidence shows and the jury believe that Dickson notified the company of such defect in the fence, and was induced to remain in the company's employment by its promise that the fences should be repaired." The instruction evidently intended to inform the jury as to the risks deceased assumed in case he knew of the defective fence, and continued to run trains over the road without objection. But we think the instruction, as asked, was misleading, and did not properly declare the law, in that it required the jury to find that as a fact the defect in the fence was known to deceased "as well as to the company." The language is susceptible of the interpretation that deceased was under the same obligation to inspect and ascertain existing defects as was required of the corporation. There was no positive proof that either Dickson or defendant had actual knowledge of the defects. It was the duty of the defendant to use reasonable care, by proper inspection, to ascertain whether defects existed. This duty, from the situation of the fence with respect to the track, and from the nature of the employment and duty of an engineer, could not justly have been required of deceased. A proper and careful discharge of his duty required constant watchfulness of the machinery he was operating, and of the track before him; and the rapidity of his movement made it impossible to examine into the condition of fencing 50 feet away, though he had time and opportunity to do it. We think deceased could not have been chargeable with notice of the defect unless it had been shown that such defects were so common and apparent that they could not have escaped his observation while properly attending to his business. It could not be said of him, as of the master, that he would be chargeable with knowledge if he could have known by the exercise of due care. Before he can be charged with having assumed risks of injury from defects in fences, it was necessary to have shown that he had knowledge of them, but knowledge may have been inferred by the jury from the nature of the defects, and the opportunity for observation. The instruction, as asked, was improper; and the court was not required, as in criminal cases, to correct it, or give a proper one on the question intended to be covered.

No error being shown, the judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Adolphus A. ELLIS, Attorney-General, ex rel. Henry M. REYNOLDS,

v.

William MAY.

(.....Mich.....)

1. A statute requiring voters to be sworn as to their inability to read English before allowing a person to mark their ballots for them is mandatory and not merely directory in respect to the oath.

2. It is not an unreasonable restriction of the right to vote to require an oath that a voter is unable to read English before allowing another to mark his ballot, on the ground of such inability.

3. Deputy United States marshals have no right to mark ballots, or to see them marked, or to know for whom the electors are voting at a congressional election in a city having a secret ballot.

4. Unidentified illegal votes should be taken away from the total vote proportionally according to the entire vote returned for each candidate.

5. The relator in a quo warranto case to test title to an office has the opening and closing.

(McGrath, Ch. J., dissents from propositions 1 and 3.)

MOTION for judgment of ouster against defendant in a quo warranto proceeding to test the title to the office of clerk of Wayne County upon the return of the findings of the jury upon issues which had been sent down to the Circuit Court of Oakland County for trial. Motion granted.

NOTE.—Upon the subject of irregularities in taking ballots under the Australian ballot system, see Bowers v. Smith (Mo.) 16 L. R. A. 764, and note. 25 L. R. A.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr Jasper C. Gates, for relator in support of the motion:

The burden of proof was on the attorney-general and he had the right to open and close.

1 Greenl. Ev. 15th ed. §§ 74-77; 1 Thomp. Trials, § 237.

Going back to the common-law rule would be of no avail to this respondent, because in all such cases it was well settled that the attorney-general had precedence and the right to reply.

1 Taylor, Ev. 8th Eng. ed. § 890, and notes.

Even if the circuit judge had been wrong in giving us the opening, it was a matter to be governed by his discretion, and no ground for new trial unless such discretion was abused and a manifest wrong and injury was thereby done to respondent.

The statute does not exclude evidence as to the contents of a ballot unlawfully shown after it has been marked and before it is deposited.

Any law which should make the office depend, not on the votes of the electors, but on pieces of paper which may chance to get into the ballot box on election day, would be contrary not only to the spirit, but to the letter of the constitution.

Messrs. F. A. Baker, Edwin F. Conely, and Orla B. Taylor, for defendant, contra.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an information in the nature of quo warranto to determine the question whether the relator or the respondent received the greater number of legal votes cast in the county of Wayne at the general election held November 8, 1892, for the office of county clerk. The original election returns, as certified by the inspectors of election and returned to the office of the county clerk, show that the relator received 26,821 votes, and the respondent 26,799, or a majority for the relator of 22 votes. A recount was had under Act No. 208 of the Public Acts of 1897 (3 How. Stat. § 234a), by which it was shown that the respondent received 26,847 votes, and the relator 26,729, or a majority for the respondent of 118 votes; and the board of county canvassers were directed to issue the certificate to the respondent. May v. Wayne County Canvassers, 94 Mich. 505. In the present proceeding eight replications were filed to respondent's plea. Respondent demurred to these replications. The cause was heard on these demurrers at the October term, 1893, and the demurrers overruled, with leave to the respondent to plead over. The decision of these questions is reported in Atty-Gen. v. May, 97 Mich. 570. Rejoinders were filed by respondent to these replications, denying the facts therein set forth, and putting himself upon the country. The cause was subsequently sent down to the Oakland circuit court for trial of these issues of fact. Forty-nine special questions were submitted to the jury for their findings, and, by their answer to question No. 46, they have found that Henry M. Reynolds received the greatest number of votes cast for that office, and that he had a majority over May of 1,926 votes. The trial court has returned the proceedings into this court, and relator now asks judgment of ouster against respondent.

The cause has been very ably argued upon both sides, and the issues now to be determined are narrowed down to two or three points. The principal question is raised under the sixth replication, the substance of which is set out in Atty-Gen. v. May, supra. In that it is alleged that in the fourth precinct of the Fifth ward of the city of Detroit the chairman of the board of inspectors of election illegally and wrongfully received 750 ballots, and illegally and wrongfully deposited the same in the ballot box, said ballots having been marked and shown to persons who were not lawfully assisting the voters or any of them in the preparation of their ballots before said ballots had been deposited, and that the same were shown in such a manner as to disclose to the persons to whom they were shown some or all of the names of the candidates voted for upon said ballots; that said ballots were so deposited unmarked and unchallenged by the board of inspectors; that said votes went to make up the large majority of 553 votes in favor of respondent; that, by reason thereof, the election in said precinct was rendered wholly invalid, illegal, and of no effect upon the election for the office of county clerk; and that, by reason thereof, the said relator was elected by a majority of 565 votes. The objection to this replication was that it tendered an immaterial issue, and that it was not averred that the election in said district was so invalid as to effect the disfranchisement of all the electors therein. It was said by this court in the opinion overruling the demurrer: "It is alleged that 750 ballots were exhibited contrary to law: that the election in said precinct was therefore void, and that, with those votes thrown out, the relator was elected. The allegation is not confined to the canvass and recount, but to the illegality of the vote. If the respondent's position be true, that the replication alleges simply that the canvass and the recount of the votes cast at this precinct were invalid and illegal, the fair import of the language is that it attacks the legality of the entire vote of the entire precinct." Issue was joined upon this replication.

By the respondent, and it became one of the questions of fact to be found by the jury. By the answers to questions 18 and 14, the jury found that Henry M. Reynolds received in all the townships and voting districts of said county, not including the fourth district of the Fifth ward of Detroit, 25,910 votes, and that William May received in such townships and wards, not including the fourth district of the Fifth ward, 23,984. To question No. 46, the jury found that Mr. Reynolds received 1,926 majority over Mr. May. Many questions are raised over the findings under certain other of the replications, but, as the determination of the question arising under the sixth replication must settle the controversy in favor of Mr. Reynolds, the relator, we need not enter fully upon a discussion of the other questions. All of the votes in the fourth district of the Fifth ward of Detroit were discarded by the jury.

The testimony on the part of the relator showed that the inspectors of election in that district were Alois Diemel, Edward Fierz, John Manquin, Bernard Zentowski, Peter Brinker, and John Vandergyp; that no one was designated by the board to assist voters in the preparation of their ballots; that William F. Schneider and John Erhard were United States supervisors of election, and that Joseph Diemel and Peter Knauss were deputy United States marshals for that district; that the greater part of the voters were Poles, Germans, and Italians, and that from six to seven hundred of these voters were assisted in marking their ballots because they could not read English; that none of the voters thus assisted were sworn as to their ability to read English; that the only persons who actually marked the ballots for such voters were Alois Diemel, John Vandergyp, Joseph Diemel, and Peter Knauss; that during the election the marking of ballots for voters in this district as above described was seen and observed by the United States officers of election and the deputy United States marshals above named. On the part of the respondent, it is shown by the testimony, and admitted, that this large number of voters were assisted in marking their ballots, and, as claimed, because they could not read English; and that none of them, thus assisted, had been sworn as to his inability to read English. It is not denied that these deputy United States marshals saw how these ballots were marked, but it is claimed that this method was adopted because it was believed that, on account of the large registration and the great number of voters needing assistance, the proper vote of the district could not be cast if the work of assisting voters were to be done only by Diemel and Vandergyp in company with each other. It was also shown that Diemel and Vandergyp were designated by the board to assist voters in marking their ballots.

1. It is contended by counsel for respondent that the court was in error in its direction to the jury that "if any voter was not first sworn as to his inability to read English, and allowed his ballot to be marked for him, or allowed any one to see his ballot when it was marked, he thereby lost his right to vote at that election, and that it was unlawful for any inspector of election to mark the ballot of any elector who had not been sworn as to his ability to read English." Upon this point it is contended that the statute under which this portion of the charge was given is not mandatory, but directory merely, and that the provisions requiring assisted voters to be first sworn, as construed by the court below, is unconstitutional, because it puts unreasonable restrictions upon the right to vote. Section 82, Act No. 190, Pub. Acts 1891, provides: "When any elector shall make oath that he cannot read English, or that because of physical disability he cannot mark his ballot, or when such disability shall be made manifest to said inspectors, his ballot shall be marked for him in the presence of at least two of the inspectors by an inspector designated by the board for that purpose, who is not a candidate on said ticket." By section 26 it is provided: "If any elector shall show his ballot, or any part thereof, to any person (other than one lawfully assisting him in the preparation thereof) after the same shall have been marked, so as to disclose any of the candidates voted for, such ballot shall not be received or deposited in the ballot box. In case such elector shall so expose his ballot, his name shall be entered on the poll list with a minute of such occurrence and such elector shall not be allowed to vote thereafter at such election." Section 45 of the act provides: "Any person who shall . . . disclose to any other person the name of any candidate voted for by any elector, the contents of whose ballot shall have been seen by such person. . . . shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court." These provisions were intended to secure the entire secrecy of the ballot, except so far as was absolutely necessary to enable such elector as could not read English to have assistance in marking it. The only test under this statute which the inspector, who is designated to assist the voter, can apply to determine whether the elector can read English is that the elector shall make oath of the fact. No other test is permissible, and it is unlawful for any inspector to assist in marking a ballot for any elector who claims that he cannot read English until such elector shall have first made oath to the fact. The construction contended for by the respondent cannot be given. Such interpretation would allow a voter to be assisted upon his own mere statement that he could not read English, and give inspectors unlimited discretion to mark ballots. The intention of the legislature was to limit the marking to those who made the oath, or to those who from physical disability could not mark them. This intent is evidenced by the other portions of the statute above quoted, as, by section 26, if the ballot is seen after it is marked by any other than the inspector lawfully assisting, so as to disclose any of the candidates voted for, such ballot shall not be received or deposited in the box; and, under section 45, a penalty by fine and imprisonment is imposed upon any one so disclosing his ballot. These provisions are mandatory, and the court very properly so charged the jury. These very sections were under consideration in Atty-Gen. v. McQuade, 94 Mich. 439, and there held mandatory. Similar provisions were also held mandatory in the following cases: People v. Onondaga County Canvassers, 129 N. Y. 395, 14 L. R. A. 624; People v. Dutchess County Suprs., 135 N. Y. 523; State v. Walsh, 63 Conn. 260, 17 L. R. A. 864; State v. Ellis, 111 N. C. 124, 17 L.
